THE LOVE OF MEN.

A STORY OF WEST AFRICA.

I.

BANG! crash! and out of the cook-house belonging to a certain bungalow in Accra, inhabited by Dick Lockhart and Tom Willoughby, shot Friday, the cook, followed by an apparition of "size eight" and one leg of a pair of duck trousers.

"There! take that, you black-faced scoundrel!" exclaimed an angry voice, with astonishing energy for the coast, "and don't let me set eyes on you again in a hurry if you value your skin."

Friday pulled a grimace, and rubbed himself soothingly, for the remark had been made in a most impressive manner; then he walked away.

"Hallo! what's up?" asked another voice, and a man's head and shoulders, in dishabille, appeared through a window of the bungalow.

"What's up, indeed?" exclaimed Tom Willoughby, displaying the rest of the duck suit; "why, the very deuce. I've just found that ugly scoundrel, Friday, sound asleep, without having made the faintest attempt to prepare the dinner, and here it's six o'clock, and we asked Fulwell and Eyre to come at half-past," and he fumed and strutted like a true Britisher.

"Never mind," replied Dick, the owner of the head and shoulders, in a cheery voice. "We'll have to cook the dinner ourselves, that's all; I'll be ready in a jiffy," and he disappeared.

Tom did not feel very reassured, and he knocked two small black boys' heads together, who happened to be onlookers, as a let off to his feelings. He cheered up somewhat, however, when Dick appeared in a spotless suit, and a twinkle in his blue eyes, and set to work.

"Aprons first, then soup," said he, "and then work for dear life."

"Are aprons a kind of caviar?" asked Tom wickedly.

"No, silly—to keep your togs clean; here, take this," and he threw one across the table at him. "Now for it—first comes soup; well that of course only wants boiling, with a little salt and pepper thrown in. You can do that while I get to the fish."

"Do you know anything about it?"

"Of course I do. It's as simple as A. B. C.; you simply dip it in something sticky, then in bread crumbs, then fry it. Look slippy with that soup while I get it ready. Joints and entrées must be tinned things."

The soup was completed, and looked—well, dubious.

The fish also was completed, and looked—well, more dubious, but they put it aside, and hoped for the best.

"Can you make any sweets?" asked Tom.

"No, that I can't," was the prompt reply.

"Blest if I can," said Tom, and they looked at each other.

"I know, the cookery book," exclaimed Dick, and a second later they were poring over it.

"See here—custard pudding's as easy as wink. You get the things while I read it out."

"No; I'll read it out," put in Dick hastily: "it's sure to want a light hand, and mine's heavy."

"Rats! You haven't got to handle it at all. Besides, you can't read, and we haven't time for you to spell the words," for which Tom got the frying-pan at his head, but ducked in time. "Look sharp, there's no time to waste," he continued. "Boil one and a half pints of milk with two ounces of lump sugar, and pour it, boiling hot, over three eggs lightly beaten. Well, that sounds easy enough; you begin it while I see if the cloth is laid properly," and he went off, looking very knowing, and taking the book with him.

"Flavour with nutmeg or anything else preferred, and pour into a tart-dish," he shouted from the sitting-room. "Look sharp, they'll be here in ten minutes."

"All right, it's done," came the response, "but it doesn't look right."

"Nonsense, it must be right; it's like the book."

"Perhaps that isn't all."

Tom picked up the book. Then he pulled a face, and exclaimed:

"By Jove! you've got to place the dish in another, three parts full of boiling water, and bake it slowly for forty minutes."

"Well, we haven't got another dish, so I can't. It'll just have to bake itself the best way it can."

"Perhaps we'd better change the name," called Tom. "Let's call it Montifiore pudding, and say it's new."

"Right you are. Here they come," and at the same moment a whoop was heard outside, and Captain Eyre rode up in his go-cart.

"What ho, you fellows!" he called. "Fulwell's just behind. He didn't know which sash to put on, and it hindered him rather. Ah, there he is," and they glanced down the road.

At the same instant Major Fulwell's cart caught in a deep rut, the pole was jerked out of the Kroo boys' hands, and back went the gallant Major into the road. He rose furious, but the Kroo boys, from a long and varied experience, knew better than to stay, and were already vanishing in the distance as Dick and Tom came to the rescue.

"Never mind, Major, the sash looks lovely," said Tom wickedly; and, after shaking his fist threateningly after the retreating figures, the Major allowed himself to be collared by his two hosts and hoisted up the bungalow steps.

Dick Lockhart had lately come in for some money, and the dinner was in honour of the event. They set to work promptly, once all seated, and the courses progressed rapidly; too rapidly, in fact, for no one seemed to be eating anything.

Dick kept his face, and swore at the cook's disgraceful cooking, but Tom exploded over the pudding. Instead of baking forty minutes slowly, it had baked forty-five minutes rapidly, with the result that the Captain asked mildly, if he might be favoured with the recipe and—a pick-axe. This was the signal for a general uproar, and the story came out, whereupon the two guests solemnly announced that nothing but a double allowance of champagne and an extra cock-tail would appease them. This was agreed to, and the hilarity increased.

On dessert and speech-time arriving, the Major congratulated Dick on his good fortune, and the Captain and Tom emphasized their feelings practically on his broad back.

The Queen and the Army were then toasted, and lastly Dick rose.

He first thanked them all heartily, then said, with a light in his eyes that bespoke some unusual cause for gladness, "and now, gentlemen, I have some news for you. Miss Bolton, whom I hope to marry directly I arrive in England, started out to Accra in the last boat with an aunt, who has been ordered a sea voyage. They are coming out here with the idea of returning at once with me. She knows you all well by name, and is looking forward to meeting you. May I ask you to drink to the good voyage and quick arrival of the sweetest girl in the world—my future wife?"

They rose instantly, and drank the toast with mingled expressions of congratulation, and pleasure. The idea of ladies among them was pleasing to all, even if only for two weeks, for the bungalow was on the outskirts of Accra, and they saw little enough of ladies' society.

When dinner was over they adjourned to the verandah, and Tom got his banjo. They loved a good comic song, these coasters, and were soon shouting choruses lustily, with palpable enjoyment. Finally the guests began to think about going home, and after taking leave somewhat boisterously, and coming back twice to clap Dick on the back and congratulate him again, they departed.

Before they turned in, Dick linked his arm through Tom's, and said affectionately, "You're quite sure you don't mind Miss Bolton and her aunt coming to the bungalow, old chap? I can easily get somewhere else for them to go if you'd rather, but it will only be for ten days."

"Of course not, I'm delighted," replied Tom readily. "We will show them all round, and we might make it a bit daintier, eh?"

"Yes, I have been thinking about it. We'll get some new curtains, and a few other things. You're bound to like her; everyone does," and his eyes shone. "I'm not going to leave her any more now I've got this money; that's why I'm so awfully glad about it," and in his exuberance of spirits he vaulted the table and vanished into his little room.

II.

"It's no use, I can't tell him," and Nellie Bolton gripped the ship-rail tightly, and gazed before her with white lips.

A man stood beside her, and he, too, gripped the rail till his knuckles stood out, but he looked at her, not across the sea.

"I don't see how you can help it," he said.

"I could be ill, or something, and let auntie tell him."

"He wouldn't be satisfied. Why won't you tell him yourself?"

"I am afraid," she said slowly. "I never was afraid of anything before, but I daren't look Dick Lockhart in the face and tell him I don't love him."

"Is it anger you fear, because you may be sure I shall not be far away?"

"Oh, no," hastily, "he will not be angry, but I know just how he will look at me, and just what a wretch I shall feel. He has looked like it before. Once when I was offended with him about something, and would not have anything to do with him all the evening, and once when I flirted very much with someone else. He is so good, Dick is, he doesn't understand people not being as good as himself. I believe I am always a little afraid of him. I suppose I ought never to have got engaged to him, but he was so masterful and determined about it. It would be all right if he wouldn't expect so much of me, but I can't alter my nature, and I never could be what he expects a woman to be. I don't know that I even want to," and she raised her beautiful face to his with a half-plaintive, half-childlike air.

And Horace Belcher looked back at her with his soul in his eyes.

"You don't expect women to be angels, do you?" she asked.

"No, I like them natural, with a few sins to correspond with my own. I like you, Nellie, just as you are, with all your wilfulness and follies, and all your thousand and one winsome ways. I love you, child, and I know I can make you happy. I do not ask anything of you, but that you love me in return."

"Ah!" and she heaved a sigh of content. "That is how I like to be loved, then I am not afraid. Dick talks to me sometimes about women leading men and inspiring them, and that sort of thing, and it oppresses me dreadfully. I don't want to lead or inspire anyone. I want to enjoy myself. It sounds horribly selfish, but I'm not altogether selfish. I can look after anyone who is ill or wants help, but I can't be ideal. I couldn't possibly live up to his standard."

"Why haven't you broken off your engagement before?"

"Partly because I was afraid, and partly because I didn't care for anyone else. I thought we should get used to each other aftewards, but now, of course, it's all different." And she dropped her eyes to the heaving waters and veiled them with their long silken lashes.

For some minutes they stood in silence, while his hand strayed to hers and closed over it.

"If only I could have written," she said presently.

"Yes, but it's impossible. He'll put off in the first surf-boat to the ship. Are you quite sure you won't go ashore with him and learn to forget me?"

"Oh, no, no," and she moved a step nearer, "now I know you, I could never go to him—never. Surely you won't desert me now?"

"No, a thousand times no," he breathed hastily, adding, after a pause, "but he has the first right."

"The right of choice is mine," she declared. "It will be much better for him in the end, because I never could have become what he wants me to. I will tell him all about it to-morrow."

* * * * *

The usual crowd gathered on the sands the following day when the steamer hove in sight, for in Accra, as in all colonial seaports, the arrival of the outward-bound steamer is one of the features of the week. No one felt quite the same interest in the homeward vessel, unless he happened to be going by it, and then, Heaven knows, he was glad enough. But the outward-bound brought letters and papers from the dear homeland, and eager eyes welcomed her.

But perhaps never before had a single pair of eyes expressed such a whole world of waiting delight as did Dick Lockhart's that sunny morning when the Cabenda anchored off Accra.

His friend, Tom Willoughby, could scarcely take his eyes off him.

The latter did not go out to the ship. He thought it would be nicer for them to meet alone, and when Dick had started in the surf-boat he went back to the bungalow to see that all was ready.

The boat had arrived in the afternoon, and so it was dark when at last he heard the click of the gate, and hastened to the door to greet them. But only one footstep fell on his ear, and that a slow, dragging one, and the greeting died away from his lips, as, with a strange wonder and sudden sense of dread, he stood and waited.

Then Dick entered and stood in the light, and a broken utterance escaped his friend's lips.

"Dick, old man," he exclaimed anxiously, and laid his hand on his arm.

But Dick only stared straight before him blankly, looking as if some great blow had shattered his reason for the time being.

Tom led him to a chair, and gently forced him into it, and then he mixed him something to drink and held it to his parched, dry lips.

It seemed to revive him a little, and he sat up and buried his face in his hands.

Tom looked round the room, and with the quick divination of love hurriedly pushed aside such of the preparations he could reach, which he knew would seem the greatest mockery.

Presently Dick rose and commenced pacing the little room.

At last he spoke.

"It's all over, Tom," he said, in a forced, unnatural voice. "She never really cared for me, and now there's another chap; he met her on board, and they fell in love with each other. I feel as if I could wring his neck, but where's the use? It wouldn't make her mine again, it wouldn't give me back what I have lost—nothing will. She has made me a hard man in one stroke," and he set his lips, stern and relentless.

"No, not that, Dick," and Tom spoke with a seriousness that was new to him. "When you say that, you virtually acknowledge that you have gone under because of a girl. If I were you I would fight it out with myself to the end. I wouldn't let my life be spoilt for such a girl as that."

"But I loved her," he muttered half fiercely, "and love isn't child's play with me. It's everything—just everything. I—I—" he stopped short and caught his breath—"I feel as if I were going mad, Tom," he finished brokenly.

"Poor old chap," was the low reply. "If I were you I should just give way for a bit, and have it out by myself. You'll feel better afterwards," and he led him to a chair by the table.

Dick hesitated a moment, then leant his head down on his arms, and let his feelings find vent.

Tom stole softly away, but he came back presently, and stayed with him all through that long, bitter night. And in the bitter days that followed, when a sharp attack of fever laid the stricken man low, he nursed him hourly with never failing tenderness.

For if the love of men does not equal that of women, it comes strangely near it sometimes.

By H. HUNTER.

No. 3.—How King Indrad Went to Seek the Lord of the World.

IN the days when the gods lived among men, King Indradyumna sat on the throne of Malwa, and there was peace in the land. This was the time which our fathers have called the Golden Age. The earth was fair and beautiful to look upon, no evil thing had found its way into any corner of it; morning and evening the people brought their offerings of jungle flowers and wild fruits, and laid them on the sacred stone; and no man was jealous of his neighbour.

Now the Queen of King Indradyumna was curious to behold the face of an immortal, and inquired diligently of her maids and tirewomen concerning them; but none knew where was their dwelling place, and not the wisest at King Indrad's court could say what shape they assumed, or under what form they appeared.

But the Queen's curiosity consumed her like fire; it gave her no rest, so that her health suffered; and, as King Indradyumna had no heir to his throne, he began to grow uneasy. So one morning a royal proclamation was fastened up at the great gate of the Palace. Riches and honour with a place at the King's right hand were promised to the man who, by a certain day, should bring to the Chamberlain the news which the Queen desired.

And because of the reward offered by the King, many men of the city went up and down searching for the Blue Mountain, where it was said the Greatest of All had made his dwelling.

The appointed day came, and no man presented himself. Then the King rose up and, descending the steps of the throne on which he had been sitting, threw dust upon his beard, and with a loud voice called upon Heaven to assist him.

Just then a crow flew in at the open window, and perched himself on the back of the throne. "Who is he," said the crow, "that calls upon Heaven when the Lord of the World is visiting the earth?"

But when the King began to explain the crow cut him short. "And pray, Mr. King," said he, "what steps have you taken to find Him whom you desire to see? A proclamation! Robes of honour, rewards of money! Didst thou then, O King, expect men to find the Great One without faith in their hearts and love in their bosoms? Marvel not that your searching has been in vain. Now, if King Indrad be not of too proud a stomach to take advice from such a poor creature as a crow, let him tear down the proclamation at the gate of his Palace, and send the crier through the city, calling upon all men of clean hearts and sound consciences to present themselves before him on the morrow at the hour of morning sacrifice. Then let the King send to the East and to the West, to the North and to the South, and haply if it please Nárrayan, the King's desire may be accomplished. And for this saying, O King, I give thee a sign."

Whereupon the black crow changed immediately to a white dove, and flew away through the open window.

On the morrow, King Indrad sat at the great gate of the Palace to receive the men of clean hearts; but at the hour for sacrifice, behold there were but four who had ventured to answer the summons — a leather-dresser, a barber, a grass-cutter, and a weaver. These, rubbing their foreheads in the dust, proclaimed themselves the servants of the King.

Then King Indrad sent them forth; one to the East, one to the West, one to the North, and one to the South, bidding them search throughout the land for forty days, and inquire whithersoever they went for the Great God, who was Lord over all the earth.

Now when the forty days were expired, those who went to the West, and to the North, and to the South, returned; but he who went to the East returned not; so King Indrad comforted his Queen, and told her that the omen was favourable, since the weaver would have returned had he met with no better success than his fellows.

Now the weaver had journeyed on till he came to the great jungle, inquiring of all he met, but without finding any to tell him where the Lord of the World might be found.

Digitized by Google

"We have heard of him," said many, "but no man hath seen him, or knoweth where to seek the Blue Mountain which stands upon the earth, but whose top is in the heavens."

Only one queer little old fellow whom he had met several times had answered briefly in a gruff voice: "Further on, further on," and the weaver, believing the gruff little man, had kept going "further on," convinced that he must surely find the Lord of the World, if he sought diligently after him.

So he pressed forward, thinking only of his errand, and not counting the time. Through thicket and thorn, through bush and through brake, he plodded, feeling neither hunger nor thirst, neither fatigue of body nor weariness of mind, animated only by one desire—to reach the Blue Mountain and find the Lord of the World.

The jungle-folk watched in wonderment as the man passed along, but none offered to molest him or sought to do him harm.

The tiger ceased to growl, and, creeping behind the tall canes, waited in silence whilst the weaver went by. The leopard and the panther looked on in amazement, and, having stared their fill, trotted off into the gloom. Only the jackals gamboled about him, and the birds piped in the trees.

Now and again a black crow came out of the jungle and flew round his head, alighting each time on the ground a few yards in front of his feet. When the crow had done this for the third time the weaver accepted it as an omen, and, addressing the crow, said, "Crow, crow, which way must I go to find the Blue Mountain? Pray tell me, good crow," and the crow answered. "Further on, further on."

Then plucking up courage the weaver tramped along bravely, for, said he, "both the old man and the crow say the same thing, so it must be right." Moreover, the crow kept him company, which he thought was a good sign, and, whenever he put his question, the crow always returned him the same answer.

At last, about the end of the third day, the crow flew into a tamarind tree by the side of the path and disappeared. Then the weaver saw straight before him a hut from which blue smoke was rising, and shouting his thanks to the crow he hurried up to the hut, which he reached just as a woodman entered it.

"Good evening," said the weaver. "Rest is sweet after toil," but the woodman answered not a word.

The table was set for a meal; the woodman motioned his guest to a seat, and a woman brought water to pour on his hands. A carpet was spread for him in a corner of the roof whereon to sleep; and when he opened his eyes in the morning, lo! there was the Blue Mountain, with the sun shining on it from afar.

Now the woodman knew, when he saw him, what the weaver had come for, and was jealous lest he should discover the shrine which the Lord of the World himself had set up in the heart of the Blue Mountain.

"For," said he, "King Indrad will surely offer to build him a temple, and I shall lose my god, and where shall I look for another?" So for three days he kept silence, while the weaver abode in the house waiting for a favourable omen.

In the night, as the weaver lay awake on the roof with his face to the stars, a jackal barked in the jungle. "Ah!" said he as he listened, "the time is at hand."

In the morning the woodman took fruit and flowers and went off to the mountain; but when the weaver sought to accompany him he made excuses, saying "To-morrow, friend, to-morrow," and this he said every day, hoping to weary the weaver. But every day the weaver renewed his attempt. So the woodman bethought him of a plan whereby he might keep the weaver in the jungle and the secret of the Blue Mountain from the ears of King Indrad.

"Marry my daughter," said he to the weaver, "and settle down in the wood, then will we go together and offer sacrifice in the Blue Mountain."

"Agreed," said the weaver. So he married the woodman's daughter, but the secret shrine of the Lord of the World seemed as far away from him as ever; for the woodman continued to go there alone, making always the same answer to the weaver which he had made him before. But in this he reckoned without counting the woman whom he had given the man to wife.

"Hearken!" said she, joining hands with her husband, "and I will tell thee what thou must do. Keep thy bed like a sick man, and leave the rest to me."

Then she went to her father, and with tears and entreaties implored him, till, moved by her supplications, the woodman consented to take the weaver with him.

"But," said he, "he shall go thither blindfolded, since if he know the way, he will return to his master, and I shall be as naught in the eyes of King Indradyumna. He shall see the Lord of the World in his secret dwelling-place, but the way thither he may not know."

So the wife said to her husband:

"Take this bag of mustard-seed, drop it as you go, and all will be as you wish."

Now, on a certain morning in the same week, everything being ready, the woodman blindfolded the weaver, and off they went together through the forest to the Blue Mountain.

When they reached the shrine, the bandage was removed from the weaver's eyes, and he beheld a blue stone figure under the shade of a spreading fig-tree, and close to a fountain of water bubbling up from a cleft in the rock.

Presently the woodman left him, and went to gather his daily offering of jungle flowers.

Then the weaver called on the Lord of the World, and, behold a crow flew out of the fig-tree, and, suddenly taking a glorious form, soared up into the blue heaven above, and was lost to sight.

"How easy," thought the weaver, "is the path to eternal bliss from this holy spot!" and, climbing into the tree, would have tried to follow the crow; but a voice cried to him saying: "First go back to thy master, and tell King Indrad the good news that the Lord of the World has been found."

At this moment the woodman returned, and when he heard from the weaver all that had happened it made him very unhappy. "Ah!" thought he, "this weaver's going to be a troublesome fellow. Now if I can contrive to leave him behind I shall hear no more of him. He can never find his way through the jungle alone, so shall I keep the secret of the Blue Mountain from the strangers who covet it for themselves."

Then, dissembling his voice: "Well, well," said he aloud, spreading out his flowers, "not a single one of the five blossoms of Heaven in the whole bunch. That comes of dreaming, Master Weaver. Just wait while I gather a few from the purple patch under the banyan."

Off slipped the woodman, leaving the weaver at the shrine.

At last, tired of waiting, the weaver went home, finding his way easily enough by the seed he had dropped in the morning. When the woodman saw him he was troubled; and, running to his daughter, promised that whatever her husband asked of him he would grant it.

"He wants nothing, poor fellow," said she, "but to be allowed to depart to tell King Indrad that the Lord of the World has been found."

"Let him go in peace," answered the woodman.

So the weaver went.

Now it fell out that when the good news was told to the King his heart swelled within him, and he cried:

"Is there any on earth to compare with me—the man whom the Greatest of All has chosen to build his temple?"

But a voice answered him:

"O, King! thou shalt indeed build my temple, but me thou shalt not behold."

So when the road through the great jungle was cut, and the King reached the foot of the Blue Mountain, the stone image had vanished.

Then the King sent for carpenters and masons, and built a magnificent temple by the sea, but there was no man on earth found holy enough to consecrate it.

King Indrad, plunged in despair, had worn himself to a shadow, when one day the Queen, grieved to see her lord so distressed, happened to say:

"Oh, dear! I wonder now if Brahma would consent to do you this service?"

"Best of councillors," said the King; "I will set off immediately."

So King Indrad went to Heaven to beg Brahma to come down and consecrate the temple which he had built for the Lord of the World to dwell in. But he was gone so long that nine generations of kings had reigned upon the earth before he returned; and the temple itself was claimed by another. So at Brahma's suggestion the matter was referred to a crow—a wise old bird which sat perched on the branch of a tree in the temple gardens, listening to all the talk that was going on below. The crow declared that it was King Indradyumna who had built the temple; and the King, believing that the last difficulty had been surmounted, besought the Lord of the World to appear before him that he might set up his image on the holy spot. Yet for all this, King Indradyumna found not the god.

Now, one morning, long after Brahma had gone back to Heaven, the King rose up early, and went for a walk on the sands. Slowly he paced along, pondering how he could induce the Lord of the World to take up his residence in the stately temple which looked down on the mysterious sea. Suddenly he spied a queer little fellow sitting on a block of timber which had been thrown up by the waves.

"Good morning," said the gruff old man. "What brings you out so early?"

Then the King opened his mind to the stranger, who directed him to take the block of wood to the temple and the Lord of the World would tell him what further to do with it.

So the King collected a great army, and went down with 5,000 elephants to drag the block up to the gates. They pulled and tugged for a week, but the timber defied all efforts to move it, till a crow, who was watching them, said: "Send for the woodman who lives over against the Blue Mountain. Not one of you has thought of the poor servant in your haste to buy favour of the master."

Now when the block was brought up to the temple, the King saw that it was rough and ragged, and full of defects; and, marvelling that the Lord of the World should have chosen such a sorry piece, he sent for carpenters to trim and dress it. But when the chisels were put to the wood, behold! the iron lost its edge, and curled up as if it had been tin.

"Ho, ho!" said the King, "what is this we have here? No log that ever grew can resist steel."

"Indeed!" said the crow, "and pray how old art thou, who pretendest an acquaintance with all the trees in the forest? Thou art of yesterday, O man! but this timber has seen a thousand such as thee. Saw ye not the undying fig tree by the water of life in the Blue Mountain, and have ye no eyes that ye cannot recognise it again? You have eyes, O King! but you see not the mystery which lies at the heart of the world. Think ye then ye would know the Lord thereof were he to reveal himself unto thee? Go now, leave the log in the temple. At the end of twenty days thou mayst return. It will be according to thy willingness to serve and thy power to obey."

Then the crow flew away and was seen in that part no more.

So the King sealed up the door of the temple with his own seal, and swore that for twenty days no man should enter it. But the Queen, tormented with curiosity to learn the secret of the shrine, gave the King no peace; and the fond, foolish man, being persuaded by the silly woman, opened the door before the end of the appointed time.

Alas! for King Indradyumna; from that hour he beheld no more the light of the sun, and the noonday was even as the night. Then he prayed to the god, and a voice said: "Ask what thou wouldst."

"I ask," said the blind King, "that none who come after me may say I built this temple and taught men to walk humbly before the Lord of the World."

Thus it fell out that the Queen also did not escape, for King Indradyumna was the last of his line.

A RASH VOW.

Charles Riguelet had been left an orphan in early childhood, and had been brought up by his uncle, the curé of the parish, who had educated and destined him for the priesthood. The gentle, generous old man stripped himself of all he possessed to help his poor people, and died when Charles was nearly twenty, leaving him nothing but his blessing and his books.

The young man was exempt from military service in view of his future calling, and for some months time hung very heavily on his hands. He felt he had no real vocation for the priesthood, but then he had neither money nor influence to help him in any other career.

On fine evenings he was in the habit of walking out to Croissey and climbing up into the branches of an old yew-tree, where he used to dream impossible dreams and watch the setting sun, with its thousand gorgeous tints lighting up the surrounding country.

One night, just as the moon was rising, he heard voices beneath him, and his ear caught the words: "The last time!" uttered in tearful tones by a woman's voice.

Her sobs were audible, and then he heard a man say tenderly:

"Courage, Louise, my dear one, the time will soon pass. Be brave."

"But it's a shame!" cried a clear young voice indignantly. "They have no right to take you away from us! Eugène, why did you not tell them that you were just going to be married, and had a young sister to keep?"

"I am afraid, Christine, that would not have done much good. You see, until I am married they will not regard me as a family man, and it is our duty to sacrifice ourselves for the good of our country."

"And they'll send you away to some horrid climate where you'll die of fever, like Piérre and Etienne last year!" sobbed the girl.

"My little sister, you know I would have done anything I could in honour to have stayed with you and Louise, but the only way of escape I could have found was by providing a substitute, and that you know was impossible with our straitened means."

"Louise and I would have sold all our trinkets and everything nice we had."

"I know you would," interrupted her brother, "but that would not have brought in nearly enough."

"Then I will sell myself!" cried Christine recklessly. "I am young, and they say not bad-looking, and I swear on this cross which contains our mother's hair, that if any man will take your place, I will marry him when he comes back!"

"Child, child, you are over-wrought and don't know what you are saying! Thank Heaven there is no one to hear you!" said Eugène, stroking her cheek and looking nervously round.

Charles Riguelet felt distinctly uncomfortable, but it was too late to acquaint them of his presence. He could not, however, resist the temptation of looking down to see the face of this devoted sister.

The lovers were standing close together, and Christine was facing them with flashing eyes and the little gold cross raised in her right hand so that it glittered in the moonlight.

Her brother and Louise seemed to be reasoning with her in a low tone, and after a few minutes conversation they all turned to go.

Riguelet could just see the knot of ribbon and the fatal number in the young man's hat as they passed beneath him.

A couple of hours later, when Eugène and his sister were pretending to eat their last meal together, and Louise was sitting beside him with tearless eyes and a drawn, strained look upon her pretty face, there came a sharp knock at the door which made them all start and look fearfully at one another.

"Come in!" said Eugène, pulling himself together.

The door opened and showed an old sergeant, who asked in a gruff voice:

"Are you the conscript Livon?"

"Yes, sergeant."

"Then that's for you," he said, throwing an official-looking letter on to the table.

Eugène took it up and opened it with trembling hands. He began to read it, first mechanically, then feverishly, and finally let it fall from his hands with a dazed and bewildered expression on his face.

It was a formal release from military service.

"But, how, what does it mean?" he stammered.

"Why it means that someone has come forward to serve in your place," said the sergeant. "But it's a pity to my thinking. It does a young man good to smell powder early in life! However, I expect you're glad enough, and someone else too," he added, with a sly look at Louise, who was clinging to her lover with a radiant face.

"Well, good-night," said the old man, moving towards the door. Then he suddenly remembered something, and turning round, asked:

"Where is Mademoiselle Christine Livon, your sister?"

"There she is," answered Eugène, pointing to the young girl who was devouring the contents of the precious document.

"That's for you, mam'selle," he said, throwing another letter on the table.

"You will stop and drink a glass of wine with us, sergeant? We must celebrate this joyful occasion," said Eugène cordially.

The old man accepted and sat down with them, while Louise busied herself about the duties of hostess which Christine seemed to have entirely forgotten. The old sergeant watched her light, deft movements and the taste with which she laid out the simple repast, and turning to the young man said jokingly:

"I admire your choice. You're better off here than you would be in barracks. Your health, young ladies!"

He raised his glass and looked first at Louise, then at Christine, but the girl was as pale as death, and the letter he had given her was crushed up in her right hand as she sat staring blankly at the table in front of her.

"What's the matter, Christine?" cried her brother anxiously. "The letter? Has anyone dared to annoy you?" and he took it quickly from the girl's unresisting hand.

"Read it aloud," she said in a hollow voice. He did so:

"Mademoiselle,—I am going to replace your brother, for you need him and I have no one to miss me, I am alone in the world. I saw your grief to-night and it went to my heart. I send you a ring that belonged to my mother, and the only condition I make is that, if you have any kindly feeling for me, you place the gold cross I saw in your hand in a nitch in the old yew-tree at Croissey, so that I may fetch it before I start to-morrow morning. If I live I will bring it back to you in three years, if not I will send it to you. Do you remember the vow you made upon it?

"Adieu."

"What does this mean?" said Eugène slowly. "Can't you throw any light upon it, sergeant?"

"Evidently someone overheard you talking, and he is playing the friend in need."

"But why did he not come forward and speak, like a man?"

"Oh, I dare say he felt shy, or perhaps he's romantic and thought he would make more impression this way," chuckled the old man. Eugène shook his head and frowned

"I can't accept such a substitute. I will not allow my sister to sacrifice herself to an utter stranger. I will come with you, now—let me just—" and he made as though he would tear the letter to pieces.

"Stop, Eugéne," cried Christine, waking up from her reverie at these words. "I accept him! Give me the letter, it is my affair. He makes no demand upon me, he is noble and generous, and I will send him the gold cross. I'm glad he didn't come himself," she said after a pause. "Have you seen him, sergeant?"

"Yes, for a minute or two."

"He's not lame or hump-backed or anything of that sort, is he?" she asked anxiously.

"My dear young lady, is the French army made up of such people?—such a one would not have been looked at for a second."

"But do you think he's nice?" she persisted.

"Yes, I should think so, very nice."

"Very well then," she said, detaching the cross from its chain, "will you put this where he can find it, and say no more to him, but keep your eye upon him and bring him back safely and tell me that he is a brave soldier."

The old sergeant's eyes were a trifle dim as he took the young girl's pledge of sisterly devotion and heard her pathetic words.

Eugène and Louise saw that it was no good reasoning with the wilful girl, and looked on in silence, trusting that the future would bring a way out of the difficulty.

When the three were alone again, Christine turned to Louise, and said with a grave smile:

"Now I am engaged too, and my pledge is with a soldier of France."

Eugène and Louise were married very soon after this, and Christine, who lived with them, seemed to have changed from a merry, romping child, into a grave, thoughtful maiden.

A year later the great war with Germany broke out, and Eugène had to go to the front; but this time, his wife and sister, like true French women, choked back their tears, and bade him God-speed with brave faces as he went forth to meet the invading force.

He escaped unhurt till the attack upon the village of Le Bourget, when he got separated from his fellows and was trying to hold his own against three stalwart Germans. His strength was failing when he heard a voice shout:

"Conscript, save your life for your wife and sister. Let me settle these fellows!" and with that a young officer dashed up and cut down two of his opponents. The next moment the officer's horse was shot under him, and, as he fell, the remaining German sprang forward bayonet in hand, but Eugène was too quick for him, and succeeded in disabling him before he reached the French officer.

This incident was the beginning of a strange and firm friendship between the two men. It seemed especially strong on the officer's side, and he found many opportunities of ameliorating the sufferings of his subordinate during the long and disastrous campaign.

When all was over, and the remnants of the French army were allowed to return to their homes, Eugène was greatly exercised in his mind as to how he could show his gratitude to his friend.

At last, learning that Lieutenant Riguelet had neither home nor friends to go to, he timidly suggested that he should share what remained to him and his wife. Louise and Christine had taken refuge in Bordeaux with an aunt of the former, and it was there that Eugène proposed to settle for the present.

Lieutenant Riguelet accepted the kindly offer most readily, and received a warm welcome from the wife and sister of the man he had so generously befriended.

It soon became evident that a powerful attraction drew him and Christine together, and in due course he asked Eugène for his sister's hand. He had decided to leave the army, and had been fortunate in obtaining an appointment in one of the large city firms of Bordeaux.

"Nothing would please me better," said Eugène, "but remember, my sister has not been brought up like you; she has not had much education, and you might find after a time that you had made a mistake, and if she ever guessed that it would break the poor child's heart, for I believe she is very fond of you."

Riguelet soon overruled these objections, and convinced Eugène that nothing could ever alter his love for Christine. "I have watched her with loving, jealous eyes," he said, "and I am determined that no other woman shall ever be my wife."

Eugène went to his sister and told her of his friend's offer. For a moment the girl's eyes shone with a happy light, and then her face became suddenly grave.

"But, Eugéne, I am not free, the three years have not passed yet," she faltered.

"My dear child, you surely don't think any more of that foolish escapade?"

"Of course I do. My word was given, and I consider myself bound by it till I am released by the return of the token."

"But suppose you never get it? Suppose he is dead?"

"Then he will send it to me, or I will mourn him as my betrothed. You should be the last to tempt me to slight him, Eugéne, for if he had not come forward in our hour of need, you might never have been married to Louise."

"Yes, that's true enough, but I can't bear for you to lose the love of a man like Riguelet for an unknown adventurer, who has perhaps forgotten all about you by this time."

He saw that his words pained her, and added gently:

"Perhaps you don't love Riguelet?"

"It is just because I do love him that I dare not contemplate the prospect of becoming his wife. It is so hard to keep my word now that I have met him, that I am afraid of myself!"

Seeing that further conversation only made her more miserable, Eugène left her and told his friend the whole story of his sister's rash vow and the weight she still attached to it. Riguelet listened without any sign of disappointment and merely asked to see Christine alone.

She received him with evident emotion and listened to his earnest pleadings with tears in her eyes and sorrow at her heart, but she remained true to her resolution.

"At least tell me if you could ever have loved me," he said, taking her hand in his.

"I do love you," she said, raising her eyes to his, "and it is because I love and honour you that I would not have your wife's name stained by a breach of faith."

"Thank Heaven!" he exclaimed. "I have won you for my very own! It was I who served in your brother's place and sent you that letter, but I would not redeem your promise till I was sure that you loved me."

She trembled violently, and her hand involuntarily sought the ring which she always wore on the chain round her neck.

"But the cross?" she murmured. "You were to bring it back."

"Unfortunately that is no longer in my possession," he said sadly. "One day before going into action I gave it to the old sergeant and charged him to return it to you. I had come to the conclusion that it would be unfair to claim your promise, and had I not met Eugène I should never have sought you out. As you have not received it I fear he must be dead."

Christine looked earnestly at him. His words and manner had every appearance of truth, but the disquieting thought oppressed her that Eugène, treating the whole thing as a joke, had persuaded Riguelet to play this part.

"You will think me hard and unbelieving," she said slowly, with evident effort, "but I dare not marry till I am released from my vow, either by the return of my pledge or the expiration of the three years."

He left her with mingled feelings of anger at her incredulity and admiration for her staunch adherence to her word.

The next day he left for Paris, where he tried in vain to get tidings of the sergeant, but all he could ascertain was that he had been severely wounded during the war, and had not been heard of since. With a heavy heart he set out on the return journey and arrived late at night at the bachelor abode he had hoped so soon to quit. On his table he found a note in Christine's writing. He tore it open and read the one word "Come."

She was waiting for him, and one glance at her face told him all was well. In her right hand she held the little gold cross.

"But how did you come by it?" he asked, when the joy of meeting had been eloquently, if silently expressed.

"The day after you left, a hospital nurse called to see me and gave me a small packet which she said she had promised a dying man to deliver into my hands. She had been looking for me for a long time and then traced me through inquiring about Eugène. I opened it and found the cross inclosed in a touching letter from the dear old sergeant. He has nothing but praise to say of you and hopes we may long be spared to each other."

The first journey the young people made after their marriage was to the old yew tree at Croissey.

PART THE FIRST.

"The Ambitions of Youth."

SUMMARY.

The opposing factions in the public games of ancient Constantinople were known as the "Blues and Greens." The Emperor and Empress favoured the Blues, and consequently the enmity that existed between the two factions was so strong that they could not meet in the streets without coming to blows.

Rhesus, a country youth from Sicily, lands at Constantinople with his friend, Proclus, and with a fixed determination to become famous as a gladiator. He adopts the cause of the Greens, and the first contest in which he takes part is a chariot race, which he would have won had it not been for the foul play of Hermiot, his opponent of the Blues.

Rhesus falls in love with Eutasia, a pretty little waif of the circus, of twelve years, who speedily becomes warmly attached to him.

CHAPTER III.

Calm Before Storm.

After that night the frenzy of the factions abated somewhat, though they still plotted against each other in secret, using every influence, honest or dishonest, to raise their own partizans to the places of public power.

But the balance of gain remained with the blues, so implacable was the hatred of the wilful Theodora to the green, the colour her father Acacius favoured so much that he had been the keeper of the beasts for it up to his death.

One day, when idling in the house, Proclus told his friend with great gusto of how his father had taken him, when quite a child, to the hippodrome, and Acacius had sent his three daughters—Theodora, Comito, and Anastasia—round the crowded ring to beg for largess; and how the green faction had treated them with contempt, the blue with pity.

"Little Comito, I well remember," said he, "she was better-looking than her sister, our present Empress, and but for falling into evil hands, would doubtless have captured the affections of Justinian for herself. But Theodora was the boldest of the three, and lost no opportunities, and she must have played her nets skilfully to have ensnared the nephew of Justin so completely that he made a fresh law to render their marriage legal, as all the world knows."

"And in three years she has forgotten her origin—or affects to have forgotten it—and has turned upon her father's friends," mused Rhesus.

"As your little charge, Eutasia, will some day forget you," rejoined the cynic.

"I trust not; I think not," said Rhesus. "She is of a better mind than that, I trow."

"You are a country youth yet, for all my teaching, Rhesus. Now, I have seen so many of these waifs and strays——"

"That you brand them all with the same degradation!" retorted Rhesus hotly. "A plague on city manners, if these be such! But I know your satire is skin-deep only, Proclus; that beneath it all you hope with me that the little maid may grow up better than the rest. It shall not be my fault if she does not."

"You might have a worse desire, a worse mission," said Proclus, "and if you are sincere in it, you must keep a careful watch on the doings of Marcen, and the attentions of that fiery young Hermiot who lost us the chariot race."

"That will I," said his friend.

And would have said more, but just then a soft hand closed over his mouth, and another over his eyes, and a merry voice cried:

"Say who, Rhesus; say who?"

Who, indeed, but the subject of their talk?

As Rhesus uttered her name, her warm arms slipped round his neck, and her red lips met on his forehead.

"Ah! I have heard some of your secrets!" she cried, in her gladsome voice. "You don't want me to grow up like the others—I don't want to!—I don't think I shall! You are jealous of Marcen and Hermiot—I don't like them a bit! There, Rhesus, you see I can understand a great deal more than you think, if I am only twelve and-a-half—though they say I look four years older!"

And she came and stood before him on tip-toes, to increase her little height. Proclus slipped out of the room while she spoke, and they heard him fingering the strings of his harp in the outer court.

"You are too precocious for one so young and fair," said Rhesus chidingly, stroking her sunny locks with an unsteady hand. "You should not listen to such talk."

"But I have listened, Rhesus," she answered merrily, "and I am glad I have, because I know now that you like me and will take care of me. I love you very much, and I was afraid you did not care for me. Now I am happy."

And with a sweet confidence in him that completed her conquest, she nestled to his side and looked into his eyes with those clear blue orbs of hers so intently, that he put up his hand to cover them, as in play. He felt somehow abashed before the gaze of those earnest eyes, the eyes of a waif of the circus; it seemed as though he were not worthy of the love of the pure soul that gazed through them. The charioteers and city idlers who haunted the hippodrome and the lower quarters of the palace did not live lives of the best kind, and Rhesus doubted his fitness, after some months of mixing with these roysterers, to take little Eutasia's happiness and destiny into his own keeping for ever. He never doubted, from the first, that she would agree, that her childish liking would develop into later love, that he would never find another fair to so encharm his heart. The only thing he doubted was his own worthiness; he was twenty-one and very philosophic—an Epicurean of the Epicureans.

"I am glad you are happy, my sunny one," he said, stroking her soft cheeks and resolving to risk the hazard of following his desire, "and most glad that you like me so well. Will you promise me, 'Tasia, to let me call you my own, to be my little sweetheart—to marry me when you grow old enough?"

There was a child's amused pleasure in her laughing eyes as she promised gaily, a child's delight; and yet a strange light dawning there that was something more, and Rhesus felt, now that this soul was committed to his keeping, now that he had prejudiced this one sweet maid against all the world for his sake, something of manhood's responsibilities upon his young shoulders.

"So we are sweethearts indeed, now, little 'Tasia," he said, kissing her tenderly, "and you must let me come and take you out in the day and protect you from the rough gladiators of the arena, and I will see that old Sibron's wife takes care of you and dresses you well. And Proclus will be our friend always. You like him also, don't you, sunny one?"

"Yes. He is very cruel in his talk sometimes, but he is not cruel, really. I think I like him next to you, Rhesus. And next to him I like Marcen, who is so clever with his sword."

Awhile longer they talked, until the twilight shadows crept across the marble floor; and then Proclus came in and began to tease Eutasia so that the tears stood on her cheeks, and Rhesus had to intervene on her behalf, and tell his friend what they had agreed in his absence. Then, with a couple of sturdy slaves, they sent her to old Sibron's house.

Proclus laughed when she had gone, but at last confessed that Rhesus had done right, and promised to aid him to the utmost until she grew old enough to know her own mind.

"After that," said he. "I shall clear my hands of you."

So Rhesus won that little heart for his own, and thereafter the days glided by for him in continuous content in that city between the seas.

"You are too precocious for one so young and fair," said Rhesus.

Though he still wore the badge of green, and sometimes drove a chariot for the faction in the races, he thought more of Eutasia than of aught else.

Together with Proclus and some of the quieter folk of their acquaintance—for he had cried, "Enough!" to the gay life so gaily begun—they went to the various pleasure haunts round the city, to the many festivals, or voyaged up and down the narrow strait and by the verdant shores of the Euxine Sea.

The time passed very pleasantly for those wild and troubled years, and while plots and counter-plots seethed round them, and the fortunes of the factions rose and fell, and the exactions of the ministers and rebellious murmurs of the people grew apace, and the rumours of foreign war began to emanate from Court, Rhesus watched his sweet Eutasia upgrowing into a lovely girl on the verge of womanhood, her increasing beauty and charm giving still greater promise for a time of love's fulfilment. Year by year she grew in grace and loveliness, till all the gilded youth of the city were at her feet, and costly presents were daily left at Sibron's door.

Those the old curmudgeon kept for his own use, and guarded Eutasia well, and as for the girl herself, she never once wavered, never once failed in her childish promise. Hermiot, who was one of the most daring of her admirers, Rhesus had met and defeated in a duel, and Marcen had apparently taken the plain warning and so left her unmolested.

That heart was his, and his alone, and that knowledge kept Rhesus back from the easy ways of sin that the others trod, and made him a true man. For he grew in strength and, statue and skill, as she in beauty, and when he had reached and passed his four and twentieth year, he was one of the most sought after and idolised of the gladiators who pursued their calling for the love of it, rather than for the lust of gold.

And also, though that added not to his popularity, young Rhesus gathered round him a little band of believers in the gods of the olden time; a faithful few who still clung to the poetic traditions handed down from the sturdy generations who in their time had made Greece famous and Rome great.

These few friends—of whom Proclus was one, though for social reasons he kept much in the background—all wore the badge of green, and kept alive, by tongue and pen, the old religion in face of the overpowering wealth and influence of the Christian church. Even pretty Eutasia was made a proselyte, and that with little trouble.

So, knit together by the bonds of faith as well as love, their lives ran side by side like an idyll of Arcadia, and they gave no thought to the storm that was gathering round them and was so soon to break, wrecking their happiness, and parting their lives awhile.

At last, towards the end of the fourth year after his coming to Constantinople—the year of the great comet which, with long fiery tail sweeping to the north, had terrorised the superstitious for twenty days—Rhesus began to have forebodings, and to wish that he dare go back to his father's house in distant Sicily. But he dared not, so cold had been the only letter he had received since his leaving, and he saw that he must stay and face the danger. And the risk was not slight.

The power of the Emperor over public order was fast diminishing, robbery and violence ruled the night, and rioting was of daily occurrence, the weight of the taxes enforced by the unscrupulous minister, John of Cappadocia, bled the people to poverty, the fury of the rival factions revived and grew to madness, and outside the empire, Persia in the east and the Vandals in the west, menaced its existence.

And one night, as Rhesus and his friend were returning home—it was the festival of the Twelfth Night—they learnt that treachery and treason were afoot in high quarters, and that their own lives were in imminent peril.

CHAPTER IV.

Under the Convent Wall.

Seeking the shelter of the shadows on their homeward way, the two friends were passing under the shade of the buttressed wall of the Convent of St. Conan, when Proclus, who was leading, put out his hand to stop the other and whispered:

"Stay! There are figures lurking in the gloom over there."

Rhesus joined him, and saw distinctly three forms, one dressed as a priest, behind a mullioned buttress not a dozen paces off. These did not known they were seen, for the moonlight was at the back of the watchers, and shone dimly reflected from the polished marble of a house across the deserted street, upon them.

"Do you know any of them, Rhesus?" asked Proclus, in a low whisper of expectation.

"Pallas and Venus! that I do!" answered the other, in as low a tone, as they flattened themselves against the wall, and slowly, taking steps sideways, moved forward without noise.

"That I do! One I can tell by his height and build to be Hermiot, who owes me a grudge for the thrashing I gave him; and the face of the second is the face of none other than our friend Marcen. As to the other, the priest, I know him not. Those two together are enough to make one feel that mischief is afloat!"

"Do you not know the third?" asked Proclus.

"By my faith, no."

"'Tis strange, my doughty charioteer. I know him at once, despite his clumsily-worn mandyas and cowl. 'Tis Hypatius, nephew of Anastasius, who was emperor before Justin. He favours our faction, but will pander to either or both to gain influence to help him to the purple. Let us listen; we must hear this pretty plot."

"Stay! There are figures lurking in the gloom over there."

By this time they had gained the other side of the stonework behind which the three stood, and every word was distinctly audible. Keeping silent as the grave, each with hand on sword, they waited, listening.

"Are you sure that we are at last alone and unwatched, Marcen?" asked Hypatius. "Methought I heard footsteps near."

"A plague on your fancies!" returned Marcen. "I am risking more than either of you, and I am willing to take the risk of being overheard. Proceed."

"Yes, proceed," said Hermiot. "If we are to act at all we must act quickly, if your friends, Marcen, should discover your contemplated change of colour. What will you promise us, Hypatius, if we raise the city in revolt against the Emperor and his unpopular ministers, and make you Emperor in his place?"

"What have I said?" asked Hypatius. "If you can do this—and you are both powerful—I will promise you almost anything. One of you shall be my chief general, the other my chief minister, after we have dethroned this upstart Dacian and his circus wife, and these two obnoxious ministers. But can you do this, think you, and yet take no account of Belisarius in your plans?"

"That is the question," said Hermiot. "He is a man of infinite resources, of unaccountable loyalty, and one who cannot be bought. With the gold you speak of, I will wager to buy the city, even to Procopius, his secretary, but Belisarius I could not."

"Then we must silence him in the way I mentioned," said Marcen. "Then there will be no more fear."

"Yet it seems hard," mused Hermiot, with a soldier's instinct. "He is a brave and true man, and Byzantium will feel his loss when the Persians and Sythians come."

"You grow sentimental," sneered Hypatius. "However, that is no matter. He must be removed. If not, you will not gain the guerdon you have hinted at as the price of your assistance to my scheme. He must go."

"As you will, then," returned the other. "And now for the details, and the whereabouts of this vast treasure which was buried and which you alone have found."

"Will you swear to me, by the holiest vows of the Church, that you will keep the knowledge secret; that you will not pilfer the store prematurely?" asked Hypatius doubtingly. "It is a treasure of such vastness that it will make your mouths water at the sight of it, so I have taken care to have my armed spies on watch at the place from whence access is obtained to it. Yet why should I tell you at all? Is not the word of the nephew of Anastasius enough?"

"No more than ours is enough," replied Marcen coldly

He seized the unsuspecting man round the waist.

"If we help you at all, we must know that you can redeem your promise, if we take oaths on our part, you must let us see this gold with our own eyes. Say you not so, Hermiot?"

His companion assented, and in the brief silence that followed, Rhesus gripped his friend's hand tightly. Then the claimant to the throne went on:

"As you will. But first let me review the items of our plan so that we may understand each other fully; we may not have the chance to meet together without suspicion or hindrance before the day of the games. You, Marcen, will openly change your green badge for a blue one, and with the gold I shall give you, will buy over as many of your chief men as you can to the same change, hinting secretly that another Emperor may ere long be master of Eastern Rome. You, Hermiot, will sow the seeds of discontent amongst your party with the same means, working on the public dislike of the taxes, and in my name, when the day is near, you can promise anything. The fulfilment of such promises may be left to its own time. You will also have filled the palace with our paid revolutionaries, and put this foolish Belisarius out of the way—the waters of the Bosphorus run deep—by the ides of January, and if you are the men I take you for, the result is assured. I shall appear in the hippodrome with a band of armed followers, drag this Justinian from his seat, clothe myself in his purple, and trust to lavish gold and promises to catch the fancy of the crowd and of the hour. The greens will welcome the overthrow of one who favours their enemies, and the blues, knowing through you, Hermiot, that I favour them, will make no resistance. What the thunders of the hippodrome proclaim one day, the city will echo the next, and then, Nika! Wealth and wine and women for my friends; sword and noose and river for my foes!"

"And fame for me and for our armies!" said Hermiot with a soldier's enthusiasm.

"And power, and the fair one I desire!" said Marcen, "and the overthrow of that country youth, Rhesus, who thinks so much of himself and is so fond of airing his pagan notions. Neither he nor his keen-tongued friend will have time to sort themselves when once I get the reins of office in my hands. But this gold of yours, Hypatius—this gold on which success depends?"

"Is under your feet," said the rebel, "in the Hall of Waters."

The two plotters visibly started at that, and Proclus scarcely refrained from uttering a cry of surprise. Said the younger gladiator:

"It is in a safe place then, but a perilous one. Can you lead us to it now?"

"Assuredly, but one only at a time. You, Hermiot, must remain here to watch whilst I and Marcen go. The secret entrance to the flooded catacombs is not far from here. Then Marcen can watch whilst I take you. To be spied upon may mean death. Come, Marcen."

Rhesus would have started forward in pursuit then, but Proclus held him back.

"Wait," he whispered. "We must deal with Hermiot first."

As the pair of traitors disappeared round an angle in the frowning wall, Hermiot came out from the gloom and looked about him. Seeing that the road was clear, he retreated once more to the shadow and leant upon the buttress so near to the others that they could have touched him by reaching out their hands.

"Now—quick!" cried Proclus, "seize and bind the wretch before he can give the alarm! quick!"

And suiting the action to the word he sprang out, seized the unsuspecting man round the waist, and hurled him to the ground. Rhesus was ready with his green sash, which he wound tightly over the prisoner's mouth and eyes while Proclus held him; then they pinioned his arms behind his back, and raised him to his feet again, despite his struggles.

Having wound another fold of cloth from his own garments round his feet, they left Hermiot and drew off where they could speak freely.

"It seems to me," said Proclus, "that we have here an excellent chance of one of two things. We can either make an end of this prisoner of ours and meet the others boldly when they return, telling them we know all, and will join them in the plot on condition that Hypatius openly favours our faction and entrusts the secret of his treasure to us, or we can go to Belisarius and give him word of the scheme and then, when the plotters are taken, go over to the blue faction and reap the advantages of our loyalty. We can either have a new Emperor predisposed in our favour, or we can gain the goodwill of Justinian, or what is better, the approval of Theodora herself. Which say you, friend Rhesus?"

"I say," returned he hotly "that I will neither go back upon my friends nor lift a finger to help a weak-kneed, cunning, revengeful wretch like Hypatius upon the throne. I am no favourer of Justinian, as you know, but I prefer an open antagonist to a treacherous partizan."

"I am with you," answered Proclus, "but what shall we do? Would you see Belisarius assassinated—the only man in Constantinople, besides yourself, for whom I have any respect—for want of a word? And are you prepared to risk the loss of your Eutasia to this Marcen—for it was she whom he meant when he spoke of his reward—and perhaps the loss of your life as well? I have no mind, for all the tenets of the Stoics, to end my days just yet!"

"I think I see a way," replied Rhesus. "A better way than turning common murderers and slaying them all. You are about the same height and build as this fellow, and if you pulled the cloak a little closer round your face and exchanged your green sash for his blue one, I don't think the others would know you in this light. If they do not, you can take his place and find where this wealth is, and the rest will be easy. Belisarius can be warned secretly, and when we have removed the gold to a hiding-place of our own, we shall hold the destiny of the empire in our hands."

"You are growing as cunning as the most experienced court spy," said Proclus admiringly. "But what shall we do with Hermiot?"

"He does not know us; he can divulge nothing," said Rhesus. "We will leave him where he is. Do you take his place now and play your part well, and we shall call this adventure a lucky one. Hasten, I hear someone coming!"

He hurriedly slipped the blue sash from the prisoner, and Proclus wound it round him and took up Hermiot's position, whilst Rhesus shrank back into the shadow and crouched there over the captive, dagger in hand. The oncomers were only a party of drunken revellers reeling home—with more than one severely-garbed monk amongst them—and the two breathed more freely, yet scarcely were they lost to view than the two conspirators came in sight, and with due caution, rejoined Proclus. He played the part of Hermiot well, and presently Rhesus saw him depart with Hypatius, Marcen remaining behind.

The watcher kept absolutely still, though his limbs were cold with the cramped position, not daring to move now the moonlight was growing clearer, and he caught several words that Marcen muttered to himself.

"Jesu Christi! It is the ransom of a king! If it were all mine! And why not? only those three know of it—could get rid of them all on the day of the games—and then there would be pretty, wilful Eutasia for my own, if she has rejected me—the little witch! if she has preferred that callow youth Rhesus."

He relapsed into reverie, and all was still again.

After a spell of silence Marcen suddenly drew his body erect and took a step forward, muttering again. Letting his blade rest on his captive's cheek to keep before him the necessity of silence, Rhesus leant forward, straining his ears to listen, and what he heard altered all his plans at once.

"Why not now; why delay? There could be no safer way; none more certain—and then the gold will be mine—and Eustasia—and—who knows?—perchance the purple robe and the crown. It only needs the barring of a door."

And as Rhesus started forward, Marcen stole softly but swiftly out of the shadow into the light, and then into the shadow again round the angle of the wall where the others had disappeared, and for a moment there shone the gleam of a dagger in his hand.

Rhesus had no time for reflection, his friend was in the Hall of Waters, in the guise of Hermiot, with the pre-tender: and this traitor was going to bar their way out and leave them there to die.

Thinking no more of the real Hermiot, who lay quite still, he, too, ran lightly and quickly round the buttress and under the frowning masonry as close behind the dim figure of Marcen as he safely could, and presently was pursuing him through the gloom of a narrow avenue between two high walls. At the further end of this ghostly avenue he stopped and fumbled with his fingers upon a little postern door set deeply in an embrasure of rough stone. Rhesus was behind, and quite close to him, as the door sprang back and he stepped into the inky darkness beyond.

THE DOOR-KNOB.

WE came down from Circle City in December, because we were afraid of the climate.

We didn't care to face the keen winds that whistle about early in the year. Besides, we'd enough gold to last our time, if we were careful. Albert had his bag of nuggets packed with paper between them, and I had a trunk of them so heavy that I couldn't carry it. We drew our load on sledges.

It wasn't exactly safe to travel down from Circle City to the coast with your nuggets spread out like that, but Albert and I bundled the n up in rags as though they were cooking utensils and started out.

We were only going about fifteen miles together; on the other side of the plateau we were to separate and go our own ways.

I shall never forget how reluctantly we shook hands at the further end of the plateau; we were loth to part now that the minute had come for it. I remember we shook hands twice for the last time.

Scarcely had he gone fifty feet when I heard him shout:

"Remember, old boy, that you are to take the first right-hand path. Go along until you see a log-house up on the cliff, and then make a bee line for it. You're safe there."

Iceberg Inn was a resort well known to miners. It was kept by an old couple who tried their luck in the goldfields, but gave up to start the remunerative business of treating the miners well as they journeyed to and fro. As a half-way house Iceberg Inn was well known, and to its portals I was bound, for here could be found shelter and safety.

I could scarcely have gone the two miles when I was agreeably surprised to see the inn looming up on a cliff before me. It was a much shorter distance than Albert had given me to understand, but there it was with its rude front and its little windows nearly hidden behind the brushwood and trees that sheltered it from the north wind.

With a sigh of thankfulness I turned my sledge into the path that wound westward to the house, and began the work of pulling it steadily along the narrow way.

To my surprise, for Al had told me many tales of the hospitality of the inn, no one came out to welcome me; but I trudged on, thinking mine host of the inn must be asleep. As I drew nearer I was surprised to see all the shutters closed, and, although it was dark, not a light shone from any of the windows.

I stepped boldly up to the door and knocked.

No answer came, but from above there was a creaking sound of a shutter thrown open.

"Is this Iceberg Inn?" I called out.

For answer the voice at the window asked: "How many of you are there?"

"Only one man, but very tired and hungry. Come, hurry down and let me in."

There was a clattering sound, and in a minute the door was pulled cautiously open. Behind it stood an old man, and farther back crouched an old woman, a pistol in her hand.

"Don't shoot yet," I laughed, stepping into the room and hauling my hand sledge in after me, "because I've heard of you and I know enough to expect better treatment."

Still laughing I pulled off my coat and threw it on the floor, the old man meanwhile closing and carefully relocking the door.

"What do ye want?" he asked sourly.

"Want! Why I want to stay all night, the same as all the others have done, and perhaps a day or two longer."

The old couple looked at each other. "Suppose we let him," said the old woman, "but he'll have ter take things as he finds 'em."

That I had made a mistake in the place was now evident to me, but as the fire was warm within and the night bitter and cold without, I thought it best to stay. The house was safe enough—of that I had little doubt—and as for the feeble old couple, I had little to fear from them.

While I was engaged in my meditations and pulling off my heavy over-boots and wrappings, the old woman disappeared, leaving the old man to assist me.

"We can give ye supper and a bed; an' I don't suppose ye'll want any more than that," he said.

"Oh, no," I responded cheerfully, "and don't put yourself to any trouble. I'm used to roughing it."

At that moment the old woman reappeared and beckoned me into the kitchen. There upon the table, as though she had been expecting a guest, lay a plate, a dark-handled knife and fork and a cup.

"I see ye coming," said she, "an' I know'd ye was coming here, the same as all the others."

The expression "same as all the others" as she uttered it, grated upon me, though I could not tell why.

As I finished eating, I leant back in my chair and took out a small pocket mirror. Lifting it to my eyes, to take a survey of my face, I was surprised to see in its reflection the old couple bending over something in the front room; and turning the glass the better to see, I was astonished to find that it was my sledge. They were examining it. They had pulled off its coverings and were bending over the leather trunk, tapping it with anxious fingers and listening as they tapped.

"Ho, ho," I said to myself, pocketing the glass, "I shall have to watch this old couple, as well as guard against outsiders."

At the first sound they rose quickly, and the old man stepped to the door with a candle. "Suppose ye'll want to go to bed pretty early," he said; "wife an' I made the room ready for yer."

As he spoke he pointed up a dark, narrow, ladder-like staircase, which evidently led to my sleeping quarters up above.

"Thanks," said I, "I will turn in now; and, by the way," I added, as if it were an afterthought, "I will take my trunk up with me. I've got some things in it that I may want."

At this the old couple looked at each other.

"I'll unpack 'em fer yer," said the old dame quickly, "but I wouldn't take it up if I wuz you; the stairs is too narrow."

And too narrow they were. At first I tried to lift it on my shoulder. But I could not get though the low doorway, and finally giving it up, I rolled it end over end up the stairs, the old couple eyeing me evilly all the while.

"I am up safe," I called out, as, breathless, I arrived with it at the top of the stairs; "and as I see my room ahead of me, I will not trouble you any further to-night."

A minute later I was inside of the small square room, which occupied apparently the entire upper floor, and had bolted the door behind me.

The room, as I took a quick survey of it by the light of the open shutter, was a square one, devoid of furniture except a rude bedstead and one chair. There was no provision for washing in the morning, nor, that I could see, was there a lamp or candle.

I felt in my baggage for a candle, but the last piece was gone.

"I'll have to venture down," I said to myself, "for I don't propose to be without a light."

As I stepped to the narrow staircase, some instinct prompted me to go quietly. I crept down the stairs one by one until I stood on a level with the sitting-room.

There seated comfortably at a table in the middle of the floor were the old couple. A lamp was between them. As I paused to take a survey of them, I heard the old woman say:

"Did ye change the door-knob?"

"No; he got upstairs too quick for me."

A sound ma le the old woman turn round.

"What do ye want?" she snapped at me.

"Could you give me a light?" I said.

"Certainly," said she, springing to her feet; "an' I'll take it up fer ye."

She sprang up the staircase in front of me, showing remarkable agility for one so feeble; and by the time I had regained the top she was coming out of my room, while within flickered the light of a sputtering candle.

A few minutes later, with bolted door, I sat in my little quarters looking round. That there was a rough night before me I felt pretty certain; but how, and in what form, the trouble would come, I could only conjecture.

At this instant my eye chanced to fall upon the door-knob, and for a minute I sat and gazed at it in wonder. I could have sworn that it had moved. No, there it was, secure in its panel, with the bolt drawn below it.

I stepped over to inspect it. There was a whispering sound, and, bending my ear, I was positive it came from the next panel.

There was evidently a watch upon my movements.

I walked noisily to the table and blew out the candle. Then I crept back to the door, and silently turning the knob, I threw the door open, expecting to stand face to face with the old couple.

To my surprise a rush of air swept into the room, almost wresting the door-knob from my fingers. Cautiously peering out, I was horrified to see below me, not the winding staircase, but a steep cliff with an abyss below.

The whole thing was plain to me at once.

The house stood upon a bluff over the cliff, with the second story projecting slightly over the first. By opening this, the false door, I should walk out into space, and be dashed to pieces on the rocks three hundred feet below, leaving my trunk and bag of nuggets in the hands of the rascally old couple. A more fiendish scheme had never been devised even in this region of lawlessness.

But how had the door-knob been changed?

Undoubtedly during my absence downstairs, when the old woman had preceded me to my room. I felt softly along the wall. Yes, there was the hole out of which the old knob had been screwed. This hole then was in the real door—and behind it mine host and hostess were listening.

In an instant my mind was made up. I must pretend to fall.

Lifting my trunk to my shoulder I carried it softly to the false door, then fumbling at the knob, I opened it noisily, and in a minute my precious trunk went crashing to the rocks below. I counted, and it was nearly a minute before I heard it strike. Then it went bounding and bounding downward.

"Safer there than here," I thought.

Scarcely had I time to put my hand upon my pistol than I heard a prying in the wall, and in a second a hand came through and slid back the bolt. Then the door opened.

"He opened it sooner than we thought," cackled the old woman.

"Yes, his fine quarters didn't suit him. Wanted ter ask for something better, I expect."

He got no further, for with the butt of my pistol I felled him to the floor.

With a shriek the old woman bounded upon me, but I sprang past her and down the stairs, taking them at a jump.

At the door I fumbled a minute with the lock, and she was nearly upon me again, but I escaped into the night bareheaded and breathless, but without the stain of woman's blood upon my hands.

It was noon the next day before I overtook Al on the other side of the plateau, for I had to retrace my path of the night before; but worn and spent, I staggered into Camp Brill as he was leaving.

They act hastily Klondyke way, and by night, with teams and rifles, we were back for a raid upon the inn, only to find our old birds had flown. Whither, we knew not.

But we got the treasure all right, lowering each other by ropes to the rocks below until the nuggets by actual count were all found.

But it will be many a day before I forget that night on the cliff.

Reading His Character.

"WELL, I must say good night, I suppose, Susie?"

"Good night, Ned!" she said, promptly holding out her hand.

"Oh, I say!" shaking it forlornly, "aren't you going to tell me it isn't late, or something like that?"

Susie coolly walked towards the door, while she theorised aloud.

"What a lot of character there is in hands, even in the way they shake!"

"You may be sure of that! When they shake it's a pretty bad case of boo——!"

"Ned, please don't be vulgar! You know exactly what I mean. I have been studying hands lately, and——"

"Whose hands?"

"And I find they are very reliable guides to character. The way you shake hands shows you to be nervous, self-willed, irritable and obstinate."

"Great Scott! Susie, I am nothing of the sort!"

"Oh, there is no use denying it. When one has studied palmistry——"

"Palmistry! What nonsense! Why, Susie, you are too pretty to take up that fad."

"Pretty! What has that to do with it?"

"Everything. It is generally the homely and antiquated girls who study it."

"How absurd! Why not the pretty ones study the science?"

He, seeing a grand chance of prolonging his stay, sat down again, and said doggedly:

"Don't call it a science. What's the use of learning the stuff?"

"Why, wouldn't you like to know a good hand when you see it?"

"I do, and I can play it well. If you could teach me to know a good hand when I couldn't see it, the lesson would prove of value."

"It's no use talking to you, I see."

"Oh, yes, it is. Come, tell me all about the mysterious science. How do you go to work? Do you have to have a photograph of the hand?"

"Photograph? No. I study the hand itself. I hold it so that a good light——"

"You hold it, do you? Susie, read my hand, won't you, please?"

He opened that strong, white member, and placed it alluringly, palm upward, under the rays of the lamp.

"I hardly like to. You don't believe in it."

"A fine chance, then, for you to make a convert of me by reading my character correctly."

She sat down and took his hand. It trembled a little in her clasp, but she did not notice it because she was saying, smilingly:

"We have been friends so long that I think I must know your character pretty thoroughly already."

"This is the opportunity of your life, then, to find out a few things you didn't suspect?"

"Oh, Ned! Here's a terrible sign!"

"What's the matter?"

"Your palm is longer than your fingers."

"Doesn't hurt, I assure you."

"It does! It hurts dreadfully! It is a sign of brutality."

"Get a better light on it," he urged, edging up closer.

"But there is a slightly counteracting value in the largeness of the thumb, and in the unlined mount of Mars."

"You don't say so? What does all this show?"

"That you can keep command of yourself, even under great provocation."

"Well, that's true, at all events," he muttered between his teeth, and the strong hand trembled.

"Dear, dear, dear!"

"What is it now?"

"Obstinacy and bad temper."

"Where?"

"In the broad part of your thumb."

"Well, so long as I keep them there, no harm's done."

"Let me look at the quadrangle. Oh, good! It's nice, broad, smooth and well defined. That means loyalty, Ned; the noblest quality a man can have. I am so glad you have it!"

In her pretty earnestness she clasped his hand in both of hers and talked deliciously straight into his eyes.

Passionate words rushed to his lips, but before he had a chance to speak them she gave a little scream of dismay and turned the back of his hand to the light.

"Look at that!" she commanded. "Fickleness!"

"What shows it?"

"That," pointing with dainty horror to the few remaining hairs.

"Why, Susie, that doesn't mean anything at all. All men's hands are like that."

"It simply proves what I say. All men are fickle. I thought you might be an exception. But you are not."

"Go on," he said resignedly, turning his palm again to the light.

"Do you see that? That means conjugal misery, and lots of it, because it's a long, long line."

With interested pity she traced it with her soft forefinger, and the caressing touch sent an answering thrill from his toes to his hair roots.

"Do that again," he whispered, "that's perfectly delicious!"

"Delicious? A life of conjugal misery?"

"Deplorable. Perfectly deplorable. But do it again, to be sure you haven't made a mistake."

"No mistake; and if I read things twice I'll never be finished. Aunt Mary will be calling to me from over the banisters. Where was I? Oh, yes. Here's another long one—the line of the heart. That means jealousy of the most pronounced and unreasoning type."

"Look here, Susie, if there is a particle of good in my hand, I wish you would make a strong effort to find it."

"But that scream shows that you have found another unfavourable sign. What is it this time?"

"Do you see this bump? It's the mount of the moon. See the cross on it? That means—I hate to say it, Ned, but I must—it means that you are a l—that you tell lies, Ned!"

"I do not!"

"Oh you must! I believe now that it was you who sent those lovely flowers, though you swore not. Now didn't you?"

"Why—why——"

"And I firmly believe it was you gave all my poor people money, though when asked about it you said that you wouldn't give beggars a 'brass farthing'—those were your very words. I see by your face that I am right. Oh, it makes me miserable to find that you fib. Why did you?"

"Because you would think me generous and thank me for it, when I was giving simply for your sake, for your dear——"

"Turn your hand over. I haven't half finished. Let me look for generosity. Yes, here it is in the triangle; but it's too large and shows audacity. And you have an island on the line of Saturn."

"Have I? What a possession! The only real estate I own."

"Don't be silly. An island is a loop, like this," and she drew a warm little ellipse on his palm. That was too much to stand; his hand closed passionately over the sybil's.

"Oh, don't, Ned! You interrupt in the most interesting part——"

"This is going to be very interesting, too," he promised.

"For that island means a hopeless, untold passion."

"It may be hopeless, but it shall not be untold. You saw many things in my hands, Susie, but you seem to have missed the only thing worth seeing—love. Love for you, little girl! Did you see it?"

"N—no, Ned. Besides, palmistry isn't fortune telling, it's character reading."

"But the only character I have is built upon my love for you. There. I have you in my arms now. Don't try to get away, you cannot. Did you see in my hand, darling, that we love each other and are going to get married? Oh, please be kind when you answer."

"I—I saw something about conjugal misery, Ned," laughing and crying hysterically.

"But you saw loyalty, too. And that is true. As sure as there is a Heaven I will be loyal to you! I am poor, and have nothing to offer but that and love. Will you trust to them, little girl?"

"Y—y—yes."

It was the merest whisper, but it was enough, and wafted them both out upon a sea of rapturous silence.

Finally she drew herself away, and with the charming perversity of a woman, who always belies her mood by her action, suggestively jammed his hat upon his head.

"Yes, little girl, I'm going. And you have converted me, after all. I now believe in palmistry—there's a great deal in it."

HER MOTHER'S DRESS.

THE sunshine was streaming into the rectory windows, where Ida Lynn's geraniums drank in its brightness, and Lilian Grove, from the great house on the hill, could not but own to herself that "love in a cottage" could be very beautiful.

Miss Grove was a belle, a petted favourite in society, and the rector's daughter was only a blue-eyed, simple-hearted little lass of eighteen.

The rector's daughter sat at her desk nibbling her penholder. She looked up in a second, smiling and gracious.

"Always busy," said Miss Grove. "I don't understand how you manage it."

"Oh, Lilian! I am so glad to see you," cried Ida. "I was just contriving about the charities for the poor."

"The poor," repeated Lilian. "I am tired of hearing of the poor. It seems to me that they are always wanting something."

"A very natural state of things, as you would soon find out if you were poor yourself," laughed Ida. "Oh, Lily, if I were only as rich as you!"

"What would you do?" inquired the heiress, yawning.

"I would give all the poor people something to make their hearts glad on the church dedication day; but I have only five shillings left after the household expenses are paid," she added with a sigh.

"How much would it take?" asked Miss Grove.

Ida's eyes brightened in anticipation of coming largesse.

"Ten pounds would be more than enough," she answered.

"I know how you can get it," said Lilian, surveying a tiny rip in her lavender kid glove.

"How?"

"I will give you ten pounds for that old lilac and silver brocade dress that was your mother's. I have taken a fancy to it. I want to have it made up again to wear to Mrs. Hawke's party."

"My only silk dress—the dress that mamma wore on her wedding-day! Oh, Lilian!" she uttered rather incoherently. "And I was going to wear it myself!"

And in the same second she remembered that Henry Mount was to be at the Hawkes' party.

"Oh!" said Miss Grove, "I thought you were really anxious about these people. And as I fancied the dress——"

"Stop, please, a minute, and let me think," pleaded Ida.

Was this all the benefit she had gained from her Bible studies, her father's sermons, her daily prayers? The dress was not honestly worth that amount, but if it pleased Lilian, there was nothing unfair about selling it. The trouble was that she had no other dress fit for the party, and no money to buy one—and she could not spend any of the ten pounds on herself, when she had said she wanted the money for the poor. And it was her mother's.

"I—I did not reflect. Yes, Lilian, you may have the dress."

"I should like it," said Lilian Grove. "And you are so young and so deliciously blonde, dear, that white muslin would be the very thing for you to wear. Get some——"

"You forget, Lilian," said Ida, with a faint smile, "that there are six children of us, and a new dress is by no means the every-day affair in our household that you seem to imagine it. Shall I get the dress at once?"

* * * * *

"But I thought little Ida Lynn was to be here, Susy?"

Mr. Mount eyed the gay assemblage over the plump, white shoulders of his married sister, the hostess.

"I am sure I invited her," said Mrs. Hawke carelessly. "I cannot compel people to come."

"Did she know I was to be here?"

"Of course, I told her so myself."

"It's very strange," said Mount reflectively. "I'd no idea she would try to avoid me. Why," with a start and a stare, "that is the very lilac and silver brocade that used to be in the old chest at the rectory garret when we were children. I can swear to it!" as the glistening ball dress floated past him in the waltz; "and how the dickens has that Grove girl managed to get hold of it?"

"I can tell you," said Miss Price. "I know how it happened, Mr. Mount. She bought it of Ida Lynn for ten pounds, and Ida isn't here just because she hadn't anything to wear, poor thing!"

"But—I beg your pardon, Miss Price, but all this is so incomprehensible to me. What could Miss Lynn want with ten pounds?"

"Why, that's the very cream of the story," said Miss Price. "I do think, Mr. Mount, that if Heaven lets angels walk about this every-day world, Ida Lynn is one! She wanted a little money to give presents to the poor folks that nobody thinks of or remembers; she remembers everyone, bless her dear heart; and so she sold her mother's dress to Lilian Grove."

"Lilian Grove would buy the eyes out of your head if she chose to take a fancy to them, and never thinks you have any feelings that money can't salve; and—why, dear me—where has that fellow vanished to? That's modern manners, is it? Humph!"

The second quadrille had hardly commenced in the stately rooms of the Hawke mansion, and little Ida Lynn had hardly turned the third page of her book, when Harry, her young brother, bounced into the room.

"Cinderella!" he cried. "Cinderella! The fairy prince is coming!"

"What on earth do you mean, Harry?" said Ida, looking up in surprise. But before he could answer Mr. Henry Mount stood before her, in full evening dress.

"I'm tired of Hawke House, Ida," said he, "and you shall be my party to-night."

When the rector, bald, benevolent, and near-sighted, came stumbling out of his study at ten o'clock, he found Ida looking into the fire, with carmine cheeks and eyes like glistening stars.

"Papa," said she, "I am very happy! Mr. Mount has asked me to marry him—and he is coming to see you to-morrow."

The Professor's Joke.

"Well," began Harrowby, laying down his cigar and looking through the window at the rain that was falling in torrents, "did you ever know such weather? Did you ever see such a—such a—No, I won't say it!" And he picked up his cigar and threw himself into a chair.

"Isn't it raining?" asked Marsden, presumably for want of something to say.

"Of course it is," returned Welton savagely. "That's ancient history now, seeing that this is the fourth day we haven't been able to stir outside the door. Fine lot of sketches I shall get out of this trip!"

We four had been college chums. We had chosen different professions and had not seen much of one another since those days, but this year we had arranged to spend our holiday together as a treat. It was Marsden's idea, and we had succeeded in carrying out the arrangement. But we had scarcely got into our holiday quarters ere the rain began, and it didn't look like ceasing for a month.

Welton was an artist, Marsden a civil engineer and Harrowby a surgeon. All three had made a mark in their professions, but Harrowby was far ahead of us all, his studies in brain physiology and other kindred subjects having made quite a stir. I need not mention myself.

We were tired of card playing and various other methods of passing the time, so Marsden proposed story-telling, and set the example by relating how a bridge fell down just as he was about to test it—or after he had pronounced it quite safe, I forget which. It wasn't an exciting yarn. Then Welton told us how one of his pictures had been stolen—by some bad judge of art, I said. Then I told a very original incident about being nearly murdered and robbed in an inn on the Continent. But even that fell flat.

Then it was Harrowby's turn.

"I did have one exciting adventure in my early days," he remarked after a pause. "I have never mentioned it, because it makes me feel nervous even now. But I'll tell you about it as it's my turn."

He puffed away for about half a minute and then began.

"You know that I went to Leipsic to complete my studies under the great Sirdoff. I was provided with letters of introduction from some of the best men in London, and I did not lose any time in presenting myself to the great specialist. You can imagine that I was anxious to make the acquaintance of so celebrated a man.

"He was a man about seventy, white-haired, venerable, and with a look of gentle serenity on his face. He was quite benevolent in appearance; just the man you would trust at once and without hesitation."

"Died some few years ago, didn't he?" remarked Marsden, with his usual knowing shake of the head.

"He received me very kindly," continued Harrowby, paying no heed to the question. "I was soon at my ease and talking quite freely to him about my experiments. He seemed rather surprised at the extent of those experiments, and made many inquiries. I went back to my lodgings on very good terms with myself.

"For the next six months I worked steadily at my studies in brain physiology and other things, which you gentlemen don't know anything about, and, with the help of Professor Sirdoff, I made splendid progress.

"In my spare moments I continued my researches in connection with the medulla oblongata and its functions. That's the substance that connects the spinal cord with the brain. I had taken up that subject as a kind of hobby, but the more I went into it, the more convinced did I become that the current ideas were altogether erroneous. That was an irresistible inducement to go on.

"I did not mention this to Sirdoff, fearing that he might smile at my presumption. But one day, I was so preoccupied with a fresh experiment that I had half completed before visiting him, that he asked me whether anything was wrong. That led to my explaining what I had been doing.

"'No, Professor, there is nothing wrong,' I replied. 'but I was puzzling over an experiment. Some researches I have been making recently concerning the medulla oblongata, Professor,' I added in a sudden burst of confidence.

"He staggered as though struck, and I stepped forward to help him.

"'It is nothing,' he said, recovering himself quickly. 'It is a spasm. I suffer from my heart and sometimes swoon. But let me hear about your researches; have you done much?'

"I was quite grieved to think that he should suffer from an affection of the heart, and apparently a serious one, and was about to express my anxiety when he asked me—somewhat irritably I thought—to tell him about my investigations.

"I told him briefly what I had done. He seemed to take extraordinary interest in the work, and said that he must come to my rooms and see my laboratory—he might be able to help me.

"A few weeks passed away and my researches had become absorbing. I felt that I was on the verge of a great discovery. I suppose it was my demeanour that made Sirdoff ask me how I was getting on. We had spoken very little on the subject and he had not paid his promised visit.

"'I must come and see you,' he said, without waiting for my reply. 'Will this evening be convenient? Very well. I will be with you at seven o'clock.'

"I was delighted, and intended to make grand preparations; but in my feverish anxiety I quite forgot all about it.

"It was autumn. I had worked until about five o'clock, but had not achieved the result for which I hoped. I was sitting in a chair, running through the notes I had made, when suddenly a modification of one experiment flashed across my mind. I jumped up as though I had received an electric shock, and went to work again.

"I usually make notes of all that I do. I write them out roughly on separate slips as I go on, and when the experiment is finished I make a fair copy of the formulæ in a little note-book. At that time I was using two note-books, one for the medulla, another for general things. I mention this, as it is important.

"I set to work again, and this time I was successful! I drew a long breath and pinched myself to see if I were really awake. Yes, it was true, and I had made a wonderful discovery! I was trembling to such an extent that I could scarcely make my usual notes.

"At the moment I heard the clock strike seven, and before I had recovered from my surprise at the flight of time, there came a knock at the door of my laboratory.

"I opened it, and beheld Sirdoff. The servant had told him that I was at the top of the house, in my laboratory, and he had found his way to it by a sort of instinct.

"'You look excited, my friend,' he remarked. 'What is it?'

"I took him gently by the arm and led him in, picturing to myself the old man's pleasure at my discovery. I did not tell him at once; I thought I would let him look about the place first.

"I had turned my back for a few seconds for some purpose, when I was startled by a hoarse cry. I turned and saw the Professor trembling like a leaf, his face as white as death. He was holding a sheet of paper. I rushed to his side.

"'My heart,' he gasped. 'The pain was dreadful just then!'

"I forced him into a chair and poured out some brandy, which, by good luck, I had in the room. He seemed better, but he declared that he must go home. I stated my intention of accompanying him, but he declined in the most positive fashion.

"'I will go alone,' he said decisively. 'You stop here; I can let myself out. It is my wish; I prefer it so.'

"Of course, I could not insist. He went out, and I heard him descending the stairs. Then I heard the street door shut.

"On the floor at my feet I noticed the sheet on which I had made my rough notes. I picked it up and proceeded to make a copy in my book.

"I slept very badly that night, owing to one thing and another. My discovery and its results disturbed my rest, I awoke with a start three or four times, and at last, out of patience, I determined to get up. I slipped on a dressing gown and went to my laboratory.

"Judge of my amazement on seeing a streak of light from under the door! I had a distinct recollection of having turned out the gas. Had I been walking in my sleep just before this?

"I put my hand on the handle of the door; it would not give. Someone was there and had shot the catch.

"I was about to throw myself against the door when it was opened quickly. Something dashed against me, knocking me over, and I heard the sound of a person tumbling rather than walking downstairs.

"I picked myself up and rushed after the intruder; but the front door was slammed before I reached the end of one flight of stairs.

"All the inmates were aroused. We searched the place, but nothing was missing, not even in my laboratory. I was thankful that I had taken all my notes into my bedroom. But what in the name of goodness did a thief expect to find in my laboratory?

"Early next morning came a kindly note from my master. He was not well enough to lecture, but he would be greatly pleased to see me at his house that afternoon. And he hoped that I would bring the notes I had made concerning my researches.

"I decided to accept the invitation, for I was anxious about his health and I wanted to tell him of my great discovery.

"I passed the morning in confirming the accuracy of my conclusions and found all was well. I was so excited that I ate scarcely any lunch, and I was half way on my journey to Professor Sirdoff's home before I discovered that I had actually forgotten the all-important note-book. I ran back, snatched it up from my experimenting table, placed it in my breast pocket for safety, and hurried off again.

"Sirdoff received me warmly. He looked pale and worn, but he said he was almost himself again. We were very soon talking about my researches, of course.

"'I have some news to tell you, Professor,' I said, hardly able to contain myself. 'I have discovered the true functions of the——'

"Crash! The glass which he was raising to his lips fell from his hand.

"I rang the bell for the servant, at his request. As I turned, I faced a mirror, and in that glass I saw the reflection of a face convulsed with malignant hatred. It was a sight such as I hope never to see again!

"I turned hurriedly, but the Professor was smiling blandly and benevolently. I began to think that my study had affected my brain.

"'Let us go and smoke a cigar in my laboratory while the servant is removing the evidence of my clumsiness,' he said. 'Then you can tell me all about your wonderful discovery. For you know,' he added, 'so many have investigated that very point without result that it is just a little difficult to believe that you —so young—should have scored such a remarkable success.'

"I smiled in my pride as we descended a flight of stairs to the basement. The laboratory was in reality a cellar, which had been fitted up by Sirdoff for its present use. Everything was of the latest and most approved form; there were electric batteries of all sizes, instruments of——

"Never mind about the fitting," said Marsden. "Get on with the story."

"'You have brought your notes, I suppose?' inquired Sirdoff as we reached the door.

"'Yes, Professor,' I replied. 'You will find that the discovery is quite genuine when you read them.'

"We stepped inside, and I was surprised to notice that Sirdoff locked the door and put the key into his pocket. He showed me several of his treasures, and then, clapping me cordially on the shoulder, said:

"'Now, my dear boy, you shall sit upon this operating table and I will sit on this chair in front of you. You shall tell me what you have done. Up you go, that's it! Quite at home, as you say in your country, eh? Ha! ha! You look funny sitting up there!'

"I laughed too; but it seemed to me that there was something strained and unnatural about the Professor's laugh. I dismissed the idea; I put it down to fancy, and began to feel that I really had overworked myself and that my brain would suffer if I did not rest.

"'Let me see your note-book,' said Sirdoff.

"I handed it to him without a word. Hardly had I done so than I felt a shock and knew that a strong electric current was passing through me. All my strength was gone; I tried to struggle and cry out, but in vain.

"'Ha, ha, ha!' laughed the Professor as he threw the running noose of a cord round me and pinioned me. He had my arms and legs tied with surprising rapidity.

"I stared at him. What did it mean? Now I knew that my brain had not played me a trick; his face bore the same malignant expression that I had seen in the mirror.

"'Now, my young friend, you are aware that by pressing this knob I can send you into the next world—you are aware of that, eh? Well, that is what I am going to do with you! But first let me tell you why.'

"He switched off the current, and settled back in his chair.

"'You can listen more comfortably now,' he continued, with an evil smile. 'It's useless to shout; nobody will hear you. You baby-faced idiot! You English fool! Shall chance put into your hands the secret that I—I, Sirdoff!—have spent my life trying to discover? No! You shall never have the credit of that discovery! Can you guess who it was whom you surprised in your laboratory? Ha, ha! I wouldn't let you accompany me to the door! I shut the street door, but I was inside, and I stopped in the house till you were all in bed. You foiled me, and I arranged this little plan for getting possession of your notes.'

"He stopped for breath. What a demoniacal expression there was on his face. I could not help a slight shiver at the thought of the fate awaiting me. He saw the movement.

"'It is a pity that I have to kill you, but it cannot be helped,' he said. 'Had I obtained possession of your notes last night, your life would not have been sacrificed. I should have published the discovery as my own; had you claimed it, nobody would have believed you! Well, good-bye, my friend, I am about to press the knob.'

"I saw the movement of his hand and shut my eyes. It was all over with me.

"But something impelled him to open the note-book and look at what I had written before he completed his fiendish work. That saved my life. He read the notes eagerly at first; then he turned over the leaves and read here and there at random. Finally he put the book down, stood up and paced about the room.

"'You have discovered nothing!' he exclaimed in a tone of deep disappointment. 'Nothing! Your mind is wandering!'

"What did it all mean? I could not understand it; I was too bewildered. He cut the cord, and I jumped off the table, free once more.

"'You stood the test very well, my dear young friend,' he said with a smile. 'You must excuse an old man's joke. Ha, ha! Only a joke! Ha, ha!'

"I forced a laugh and said that I quite forgave him. I wanted to conciliate him till I could get away. As we went upstairs, I found out what had happened to the book. In my hurry, I had snatched up the wrong one.

"A few days later, I published my discovery. And on the day after its appearance, the newspapers announced that Professor Sirdoff had committed suicide."

A MODERN CINDERELLA.

"MADAME, would you mind if I accompanied François to his mother's home?"

"No; I am perfectly willing, but be back by eleven o'clock."

"Madame may be assured of that; we shall be here long before eleven. Pierre is downstairs, and if madame should need anything——"

"All right; you may go, Mariette, and remember eleven o'clock."

The Countess of Laispare had left her château in the neighbourhood of Compeigne, and, leaving all her servants with the exception of her maid, whom she took with her to Trouville, intended to stay a few weeks in Paris—long enough to see all that was new and interesting—and amuse herself with whatever offered in the way of novelty.

Mariette, her maid, was delighted with the idea of the short sojourn in Paris, for she could see her fiancé, a brother of the janitor of the apartment in which they were stopping.

The Countess of Laispare, a pretty widow, was a trifle fatigued by a day spent in going from tailor to dressmaker, from dressmaker to milliner; she was stretched comfortably in a reclining chair, and her whole attention, after her maid's departure, was centred in the book she was reading.

The book was intensely interesting and she read on until midnight without noticing how quickly time was passing. The sound of the clock striking twelve aroused her.

"Is it possible? I had no idea it was so late. And where is Mariette?"

Sure that her maid had not yet returned, she passed out on the little balcony from her drawing room and began looking vainly for the figures of Mariette and François.

After a short time, as they did not appear, she began to feel anxious and a little irritated. In her impatience she struck her foot repeatedly against the iron railing of the balcony. And at this moment the heel of her slipper caught in the ironwork, the slipper was pulled from her foot, and, falling, just escaped the face of a late pedestrian who stood star-gazing beneath the balcony.

He uttered a startled exclamation and, stooping in amazement, he picked up the object, looked at it, turned it over, then carrying it to the street lamp examined it carefully.

His surprised look gave way to one of amused pleasure. In fact, the slipper completely eclipsed the legendary one of Cinderella. It was small enough for the foot of a child and made of black satin, embroidered with gold. The passer, feeling like a prince in the story, knew at once that the wearer of the slipper had a pretty foot and that the next thing to do was to find her.

"Well," he said to himself, "let's begin. This slipper didn't fall on my head from the sky; it came evidently from that lighted window. I thought I saw a figure there a moment ago. Well, then, here goes."

Concealed in the corner of the balcony, the Countess had watched the pantomime, feeling all the time a strong desire to laugh. The man, in approaching the light, had given her a chance to observe him minutely.

He appeared young and good-looking; in dress and bearing he was all that could be desired. The young Countess thought he had a very distinguished appearance, and so she felt not at all alarmed when he approached the door of the building and rang the bell.

As no one responded the first time, a second followed it, and then a third, prolonged, energetic and loud, which met with no greater success than the first two.

"He will awaken everyone in the house except that sleepy-headed concierge. What shall I do? I don't see anything but to go and open it myself."

And, accepting her part boldly, the Countess descended the stairs, blaming Mariette severely for having put her in such a position. Opening the door a crack, she said:

"A thousand apologies, monsieur, and please give it to me quickly."

But such haste was entirely contrary to the plans of M. de la Brière, the man who held the slipper.

"In truth, madame, I regret exceedingly not being able to grant your request, but the object which I have just found, is, I think, rather precious, and you will understand that I feel a certain responsibility. If the slipper is yours, it will, of course, fit you. Will you allow me to assure myself by the formality of trying it on?"

"Your conscience, monsieur, has a very keen edge, but as you are not satisfied in seeing me standing here on one foot, I suppose I must submit to the proof you ask for."

She seated herself in one of the large antique chairs in the hall, and, putting out her little foot, watched him as he gravely fitted the slipper upon it.

The instant it was on, the foot was withdrawn, and disappeared beneath her skirt, while Réné de la Brière arose, somewhat disconcerted.

The Countess of Laispare, standing on both feet this time, made him the most gracious and at the same time the most ironical of bows, and, opening the door wide, motioned the young man out with a gesture in which grace did not hide authority.

But at the moment when, decidedly chagrined and confused, Réné was about to obey the command, a loud report was heard a little distance from them.

The Countess, forgetting that it was the eve of July 14th, a day which all Paris celebrates with every kind of demonstration, thought only of the pistol shot and robbers.

Remembering that she was alone, she grew frightened and wished to keep with her the stranger whom she had already impressively dismissed.

Réné understood the situation in an instant, and, having quickly made up his mind as to the part he would play in the little drama, bowed profusely, and made as if to depart.

"Monsieur, did you not hear it?"

"Certainly, madame; it was a pistol shot."

"Then, there are thieves in the neighbourhood?"

"It is very probable, and now that I think of it, I remember observing a little while ago, a villainous-looking fellow prowling about."

"I heard no cry—"

"Perhaps the shot missed."

"Are you not running a risk by going out now?"

"No doubt, madame. But I do not see what else I can do. You have shown me clearly that my presence here is inopportune, and I do not wish to intrude."

"Really, monsieur, I am anxious on your account, and, to be frank, on my own also. My maid has not yet returned, and if I were not afraid of troubling you I would ask you to wait until she comes in."

Réné blessed his lucky stars and replied respectfully: "I am happy to do you so small a service."

The hall was lighted brightly, and they seated themselves in the big chairs. There was a moment's awkward pause, and then M. de la Brière mentioned his name and the Countess followed his example, which put them at their ease.

A literary man of great talent and merited reputation, a thorough man of the world, Réné was able to judge Countess Laispare at her true value, and the esteem he felt for her character as he knew it must be, was added to the profound admiration her beauty awakened in him. Graceful and pretty, she combined perfect regularity of feature with a mobility of expression, and in her clear eyes the depth of her nature revealed itself.

Learning that she was a widow, Réné ventured to ask her if, young and pretty as she was, she had never thought of marrying again. She responded with sudden sadness that her marriage had not made her happy; that her husband had not treated her with great kindness. Her illusions had been so utterly destroyed that she felt certain the only chance of happiness lay in keeping her liberty, full and entire.

Réné, under the spell of sudden enthusiasm, began to plead with ardour in a cause which he almost felt to be his own.

He tried to convince her how unjust she was in thus condemning beforehand any true love which might be offered to her, because her first choice had fallen upon a man incapable of appreciating his happiness and proving himself worthy of it.

He grew eloquent, animated, persuasive, and ended his pleading, so full of warmth, by saying:

"There exists an old Persian legend which places him who finds a woman's slipper for ever under the influence of its owner. I ask nothing better than to be allowed to fulfil the prophetic legend and remain all my life in the spell of the dainty slipper I found to-night."

And did the Countess allow herself to be convinced? Love and confidence work miracles. It is certain that when Mariette returned she was not scolded and her excuses were accepted in full. And later it was rumoured that the château near Compeigne had obtained a master.

THE FIRST NUMBER OF A NEW VOLUME.

CONTAINS.

6 Splendid Stories by MAX PEMBERTON, CUTCLIFFE HYNE, GEORGE GRIFFITH, ROGER POCOCK, FRED M. WHITE, and WILLIAM BEATTY;

11 Interesting Articles; And Over

160 Exquisite Illustrations.

NOW ON SALE.

FEATURES THAT WILL FASCINATE YOU:

THE CHARMING PICTURE ON THE FRONT COVER.

PICTURES AND THEIR PAINTERS. (Illustrated.) This is a miniature art gallery of the most beautiful pictures that have ever been painted, with interesting anecdotes about the artists, and their many odd little methods of work.

A STUDY OF SPLASHES. No. 1.—Liquid Falling into Liquid. By A. M. WORTHINGTON, F.R.S. (Illustrated with Photographs.) Mr. A. M. Worthington, Fellow of the Royal Society, has put at the disposal of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE a series of photographs of most absorbing interest, and wonderful beauty, showing exactly what happens when a drop of liquid falls into another liquid. Enormous craters, pillars of liquid, and fountains of spray, are formed, and these beautiful effects have been photographed by Mr. Worthington with a most ingenious apparatus which enabled him to give an exposure of only three-millionths of a second.

SIGNORS OF THE NIGHT. No. 1.—The Risen Dead. (Illustrated by G. Grenville Manton.) By MAX PEMBERTON. This is the first of a series of stories of Venice, in which the adventures of a certain notable Friar, the Soldier Monk, and the mysterious workings of the Venetian police, commonly called "Signors of the Night," are recounted in the charmingly picturesque and strikingly dramatic style for which Mr. Max Pemberton is so well known.

A BREATH FROM THE VELDT. (Illustrated by J. G. Millais, F.Z.S.) By HERBERT C. FYFE. An account of the strange experiences of Mr. J. G. Millais, F.Z.S., in the South African veldt, and his studies of animal life in that wild, unexplored tract of country. This interesting article is accompanied by a series of marvellous drawings by Mr. Millais, illustrating the curious habits and the extraordinary attitudes sometimes assumed by the many varieties of animals inhabiting the veldt.

THE STORY OF THE UMBRELLA. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By CHARLES RAY. In this article you will find a host of interesting facts about the umbrella, and many illustrations of the remarkable uses to which it is put in certain countries.

A TROOPER IN LOVE. (Illustrated by V. Delong.) By ROGER POCOCK. This is a very amusing Canadian love story.

MULTIPLICATION MADE EASY. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By H. VANE STOW, F.S.S., and H. T. EMERY. In this article there is explained, by means of some excellent photographs, an ingenious and entirely novel method of multiplication. So simple is it, that the product of two large numbers, such as 19 and 17, can be easily found by the most hopeless duffer at arithmetic, and the wonder is that this system of multiplication has never been thought of before.

THE LAST OF THE BORGIAS. No. 1.—The Scrip of Death. (Illustrated by D. Murray Smith.) By FRED M. WHITE. This is the first of a series of poison stories. The interest in this remarkable series will be chiefly centred in the experiments of one Victor Colonna, Professor of Science, who has acquired a mysterious knowledge of the lost arts of poisoning.

SNAKE-CHARMING. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By MARK LANE. Here are reproduced some extraordinary photographs of venomous snakes, curled peacefully round the neck, arms and legs of the most noted snake-charmer in the world, and even fondled by his little daughter. Such power over a snake would never have been thought possible were it not that the actual photographs, specially taken for this article, are reproduced.

AT THE SIGN OF THE "GOLDEN STAR." (Illustrated by E. F. Sherie.) By GEORGE GRIFFITH. This is an ingenious story of the illicit diamond traffic in South Africa, by Mr. George Griffith, whose stories of the I.D.B., which recently appeared in PEARSON'S MAGAZINE, were so deservedly popular.

NATURE'S PRACTICAL JOKES. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By R. BERTRAM. This feature embraces a marvellous collection of photographs of Nature's eccentricities, potatoes in human form, carrots like animals, natural wooden flowers, and many other strange and weird natural phenomena.

WOMEN WARRIORS. (Illustrated by H. Piffard.) By MARCUS TINDAL. Here you will find recorded the daring deeds of some of the bravest women of history, women who have courageously followed their husbands into the battle-field, and others who have clothed themselves in men's attire, and fought for their country with honour and bravery.

THE FINGER OF GOD. (Illustrated by J. A. Symington.) By WILLIAM BEATTY. This story is full of dramatic interest to the very last paragraph.

THE LAY FIGURE. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By AUSTIN FRYERS. This article, describing the many uses to which lay figures are put, by artists and others, is illustrated with the most amusing photographs of these human models taken in all sorts of grotesque attitudes.

A MAD GENIUS. (Illustrated with Photographs.) By ANNESLEY KENEALY. Confined in an asylum on the outskirts of London is one of the cleverest workmen who has ever lived. By special permission, our representative has been allowed to interview him and photograph some of his most wonderful mechanical triumphs. The interview and illustrations reproduced in this issue of the MAGAZINE together form a feature of extraordinary interest.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN KETTLE. No. XIII.—In Quarantine. (Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.) By CUTCLIFFE HYNE. In this powerful story is narrated one of Captain Kettle's most characteristic adventures. No one should miss this, the first of a new series of stories of the plucky little Captain, who is certainly the most popular character, in fiction at the present moment.

LIFE'S LITTLE WORRIES. (Illustrated by Henry Mayer.) By W. L. ALDEN. Shoes, cyclometers and toys are amongst the worries of life which Mr. Alden so lightly and so deftly criticises in his most amusing causerie.

Ronald Beeton's Experience.

"I saw your wife this afternoon, Beeton—what a very pretty little creature she is—with Frank Audley."

"With Frank Audley?" echoed Beeton.

"And, look you," added his companion, in a lower tone of voice, "if that beautiful young girl were my wife, I shouldn't care about her going out so much with Frank Audley, though he is a second cousin. You know he's a reckless, devil-may-care sort of fellow, and people are beginning to talk."

"Are they?" Beeton's brow had grown black, and he bit his lip to keep back some strong, stormy emotion.

"You'll not be offended at my speaking so plainly, will you, Beeton? People will gossip, you know."

"Oh, no—I'm very much obliged to you for mentioning the matter. I'll take care they shall not gossip on the subject any longer."

His wife was sitting in her exquisitely appointed little drawing-room, turning the leaves of some new music, and humming the airs softly to herself in such a deliciously modulated voice that the very canaries in the window put their tiny golden heads on one side to listen.

She was a slender, delicately framed girl, with violet-grey eyes, and brown hair with auburn gleams dancing through its abundant folds; and as she sat there on a low velvet ottoman, in a dress of white muslin, with crimson roses in her bosom, she looked not unlike the fair creation of an artist's pencil.

"Ronald!" she exclaimed, glancing brightly up as her husband came into the room. "Surely you are home from the office earlier than usual to-night?"

"Earlier than you expected to see me, I suppose," he said, in strange, stifled accents, and then paused suddenly to pick something up from the carpet. "Whose glove is this?"

"Glove!" repeated Dora, leaning forward to take it from his hand. "Oh, it is Mr. Audley's! I suppose he has dropped it by mistake."

Beeton's cheek flushed purple; he set his teeth closely together. All the stormy impulses of his jealous, passionate nature seemed warring together in his breast.

"He has then honoured my poor house by his presence this afternoon," he said mockingly.

Dora looked up with wondering eyes.

"He came home from the matinée with me, about half an hour ago. See—here is some of that enchanting opera music he has just sent me."

Beeton snatched the scattered sheets from his wife's lap, tore them passionately into a score of pieces, and throwing them on the carpet, ground them under his heel.

"Ronald!" exclaimed Dora, shrinking back, while her face blanched with a nameless foreboding.

"That is the way I shall serve your very particular friend, Mr. Audley, the next time he shows his dastardly face within my door," hissed Beeton. "Beware, madam! This sort of thing has gone on quite long enough! I am not quite blind and deaf, although you seem to fancy I am!

"Now look here," he added, grasping her slender wrist until the bracelet cut into the flesh, "I may as well warn you first as last, that this unprincipled coquetry must come to an end!"

"Coquetry!" repeated Dora, with cheeks aflame, and eyes flashing with resentful sparkles. "Mr. Beeton, how dare you use that word to me—to your wife?"

He broke into such a torrent of angry invective and fierce vituperation that she shrank away like a hunted fawn, scarce believing that the man before her could be the husband whose love she had so blindly trusted.

"Ronald! spare me! Don't, for mercy's sake, speak to me so!"

He flung her hand away with a quick, passionate movement, and, hurling one last bitter sentence from his lips, strode from the room.

A moment afterwards she heard the hall door bang furiously.

The clock in some far-off church spire was striking eleven when Ronald Beeton slowly ascended the softly carpeted flight of stairs that led up to his drawing-room, and opened the door.

"I'm afraid I was too hard on Dora to-day," he thought. "I wish I hadn't said quite so much. The fact is, I've got such a wretched temper that it leads me into all sorts of scrapes. I must try to curb it a little more. Poor little dove—how frightened she was!"

As the door swung open, nothing but a dark, empty void struck his eye. All was shrouded in gloom, save one spot athwart the wall, where a faint glimmer of reflected light from the gas-lamp in the street below seemed to tremble through the surrounding obscurity.

"Dora! Dorie! Where are you?"

There was no reply.

"Pooh!" he ejaculated, trying to laugh off the chill feeling of apprehension which seemed to paralyze his nerves, "of course she's gone up to her own room to have a cry—that's what women always do when anything goes wrong."

And he sprang up the second flight, two steps at a time.

"Hallo!" he muttered, "this is strange—no lights here!"

He struck a match, and the next instant a brilliant stream of gas-light illumined the room.

But it was silent and empty. One of the drawers was left half open, with various articles of feminine apparel scattered about as if someone had searched through the drawers in blind haste.

Mr. Beeton jerked the bell-rope, his brain full of vague, undefined dread. Dora's maid answered the summons from an adjoining room—a sleepy damsel with her hair already twisted in curl-papers.

"Where is your mistress, Jennings?"

"Gone, sir. Didn't you know it?"

"Gone where?"

"I don't know, sir. I thought p'raps you'd sent for her, sir."

"When did she go?"

"Well, sir, 'twasn't long after you'd gone out this evening. I was going upstairs to get the laces and fine handkechers to do up, when I met her coming downstairs with her hat and things on. Her face was as white as a sheet, and she r n past me like a spirit! I dec'are, sir," went on the voluble Jennings. "It gave me such a turn I haven't got over it yet. I went to the parlour window, and saw her get into a carriage that was waitin' there, and then it drove away, and—Dear me, sir, are you ill?"

For Ronald Beeton had staggered back against the wall, pale as death, with a cold dew breaking out upon his lips.

"Did she leave no note—no message?"

"No, sir, I looked through the whole room. Do let me get you a glass of wine, sir."

Mr. Beeton shook his head, and motioned the girl to leave him; it seemed an imperative necessity that he should be alone to grapple with this terrible adversity that had come so suddenly upon him.

Gone!—fled away from him—the fair, gentle thing who had so leant on his love, and confided in his watchful care! Driven away by the storm of his ungoverned passion! It seemed too dreadful, too incredible to believe.

While he sat there, incapable as yet of forming any definite plan of action, a tap sounded softly at his door.

"I hope you'll excuse me, sir," said Jennings. "I told him you were engaged most particular, but he would come up."

"It's only I, Beeton," said Bewlay. "I'm in a desperate hurry to see Audley, and he isn't at his rooms, nor anywhere to be found, in fact. I thought perhaps he might be here this evening."

"I don't know," said Beeton, looking up with haggard face and bloodshot eyes. "I can't tell—I haven't seen him."

His head fell again upon his hands as the door closed behind Bewlay—his great grief seemed to close once more about him, weighing him, as it were, to the very ground.

Suddenly he sprang to his feet with a cry of passionate despair trembling on his lips:

"Audley gone! Dora gone! By all the furies, they have gone together!"

He was in the street, the cool night wind blowing the hair away from his heated brow, before the fancy had shaped itself into words—in the streets, blindly darting towards the Mansions where Frank Audley resided, heedless of everything.

"Mr. Audley—is he in?" he gasped of the hall-porter.

"Mr. Audley, sir. No, sir."

"Where is he? Quick! tell me!"

The man recoiled from Beeton's iron grasp upon his arm, beginning to fear that his interlocutor was not altogether sane.

"I don't know, sir; he didn't leave word."

Beeton leant against one of the walls and wiped the clammy perspiration from his forehead.

"Do you know where he has gone?"

"No, sir."

An agonised groan broke from Beeton's white lips as he turned away. No trace, no tidings of them.

Thus passed over his stricken head the first bitter night of loneliness and tribulation.

As he went slowly down the street the next morning, revolving in his mind the best method of instituting inquiries and obtaining some clue of the missing couple, he stumbled against someone coming in the opposite direction.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he said mechanically, and then as he looked up:

"Frank Audley!" broke from his lips.

"Why, you couldn't be more astonished to see me if I were risen from the dead!" laughed Audley, with the most perfect self-possession.

"My wife—Dora!" gasped Beeton.

"What's the matter? Is she ill?"

"No—that is—where is she?"

"I could not say, really," returned Audley, shrugging his shoulders. "I have not seen her since I escorted her home from the opera matinée, yesterday afternoon."

Beeton stared with a bewildered face at his companion.

"Tell me, where were you last night?"

"Last night? let me see. I dined with Lincoln, and we kept it up until after midnight. Then I went peaceably home to my rooms, and slept the sleep of the righteous!"

"Audley," said Beeton, in hurried, broken accents, "I have wronged you—I am sorry for it."

"Have you?" returned Audley good-humouredly. "I wasn't aware of it, but you have my pardon, all the same."

He was apparently about to question Beeton still further, but the latter gentleman had turned back, and was hurrying in an opposite direction once more.

"Poor fellow," soliloquized Frank. "I hope he isn't cracked; but it looks uncomfortably like it!"

Meanwhile Beeton was striding homeward, relieved, yet wretched still.

"She is as innocent as the daylight," he muttered. "I might have known that—my little girlish Dora—my soft-eyed bird! Yet all this makes my own folly plainer! I have lost her, and it has been through my own mad passion!"

He went up to the desolate room where Dora's soft voice had made music so short a time ago, for he would fain have a moment or so of uninterrupted solitude to consider what steps it were best to decide upon next.

The morning sun was streaming on the odd patterns of the Persian carpet—the birds were singing shrilly in the windows, and a slight, delicate figure was standing in the middle of the room untying her bonnet-strings.

"Dora!"

"Did you think you had lost me, Ronald?" she said, smiling. "But it was very thoughtless of me to leave no word or note for you, dearest."

"My darling! my recovered treasure!" he stammered, holding her close to his heart, as if he feared that even then she would vanish into thin air. "You have forgiven my cruel words? You will forget their bitter sting?"

"I knew you could never have meant them, Ronald," she said fondly. "Then you were really frightened about your little runaway?"

"I cannot tell you how much the mere idea of losing you terrified me, darling," he said fervently. "But how did it happen? where have you been—why——"

One question at a time, sir," said Dora, laughingly holding up her finger to stem the torrent of inquiries. "I have had a fright, too, although not quite so baseless as yours."

"A fright, Dora?"

"Hush, sir, and let me tell my own story. You had hardly left the house last night when a telegram arrived, containing the briefly worded message that my mother was dying. I looked at my watch. It wanted just fifteen minutes from the starting time of the express train. I stopped a cab that was passing empty down the street, threw a few necessaries into my travelling bag, and just succeeded in catching the train."

"Well?"

"When I reached home I discovered that my mother had only been suffering from a sudden fit—that she was already nearly recovered, and you can easily imagine what a relief it was. So of course I took the earliest morning train back, and here I am."

She put up her pretty mouth to kiss him, as she spoke, with a childlike caress.

"And I fancied that my brutal words had driven you from me for ever!"

"You forget that I am your wife," she said with gentle dignity.

"My wife, whom I have at last learnt to prize as she deserves," he whispered tenderly.

"I shall never scold you again! Frank Audley may come here as often as he likes now."

"And you will promise to have no more spasms of jealousy?"

"I will promise never, never to doubt you again! The last twenty-four hours have taught me a lesson that I shall not soon forget!" ARTHUR VIVIAN.

FINDINGS ARE KEEPINGS.

TALKING of finding photographs, did you fellows ever hear about Kitson's romance? It happened in our freshman year.

I went over to his rooms that first evening after he was settled, and found him sitting in his big armchair before the fire. He jumped up quickly when I came in, and laid something slyly on the mantelpiece. It looked like a photograph, and I began to chaff him about being home-sick so soon, and asked if he were looking at mother's picture.

He flushed up quickly, and said it was nothing to be ashamed of if it had been his mother's picture, but that as it happened it was no such thing. Then he changed the subject and asked how I liked the room.

He was especially proud of his desk, which he had bought of the man who had occupied the rooms last.

"Thorne gave me the key himself, with his blessing, to-day," he said, "and when I asked if 'findings were keepings' he laughed and said I was welcome to whatever I found in the old ark, for he was pretty sure there was nothing in it."

"But you did find something after all?" I asked quickly, for though he is a good lawyer now, he never could keep a secret in those days.

"Oh, well, not much," he said carelessly; but I saw him glance toward the mantelpiece. I guessed in a minute what it was, and before he could stop me I sprang for the photograph at which he had been looking when I entered.

He jumped up angrily. "Give me that photograph!"

"Oh, ho! So it's a girl, is it? And a mighty pretty one, too. And her name is on the back—Rose Thorne."

Kitson had the picture by this time, and after putting it away in the desk turned upon me indignantly, and I dodged a Greek lexicon and cleared out.

It was one evening in early summer when one of the fellows—Goodrich—came running into my room out of breath with laughing, and threw himself into my chair.

"Oh, it's a rich joke about Kitson," he gasped at last; "it's the photograph he always carries about with him—'Rose Thorne'—oh, dear!" And he exploded again. "That picture—it's Thorne's own photo, taken last year in the theatricals. Here's a duplicate of it. I found it in Les'er's room to-day."

And he pulled out of his pocket another likeness of the fair Rose Thorne

Digitized by Google

The joke was too good to keep. The idea of dignified old Kitson being in love with another fellow—a shaven and bewigged "Rose" blossoming on the Thorne tree!

"And he carried that thing in his waistcoat pocket next his heart!" roared Goodrich.

Then we concocted a fine scheme and waited for a chance to carry it out. At last the opportunity came.

We arranged one night for our meeting, and all the boys promised to be there. Well, that evening Harry was in his best mood. He had just finished his last examination and was feeling in good spirits at his prospects. He did the honours in grand style, and showed no signs of caring for any girl, let alone the photograph whose original he had never seen.

The boys began the game before long. Goodrich was the one to start it.

"I say, fellows," he called across the room, "don't you remember little Thorne? Yes, you do, at Adams' spread a year ago—little Rose in the red dress."

"Oh, yes," said another fellow, with a grin; "you mean the girl who took too much champagne——"

"And couldn't walk to the carriage," chimed in Eddy with his hoarse laugh. "I remember that, fellows; I carried her."

"She was more than a handful for Thorne, that little sister of his," said another.

And so they went on with their jokes about "Rosie," as they called her, each growing more personal in his hits, which were received with roars of laughter and assenting grins of delight.

Kitson was all the time sitting glum and quiet by the window, with his head bent in his hands, pulling fiercely at his pipe without a word.

Then Goodrich said suddenly:

"I say, fellows, how many of you have her picture? She only gives 'em to the ones she loves best. I got mine the night I took her to Marlow's for a little dinner after the theatre. How's that, Kitson? Is that the way you got yours?"

Harry jumped up quickly and stood facing Goodrich defiantly, with his eyes flashing.

"Oh, you've got it there, we know," went on Goodrich, tapping his breast pocket. "I've seen it; isn't it like this?"

And he pulled the duplicate out of his own pocket triumphantly.

But Goodrich overdid the thing—he always did. He was a coarse brute. He made some other remarks which were quite unnecessary for the purposes of our joke, and which we were all of us ashamed to hear, and then he stepped forward as if to grab the photograph out of Harry's pocket.

But Kitson was thoroughly waked up now. With a gesture he flung away his pipe and then, planting his big fist squarely between Goodrich's eyes, sent him tumbling back with a crash against the door.

"It's a lie; it's all a—lie," he said steadily and in a low tone. "She is Jack Thorne's sister, and I know she is a fine girl. I'm not ashamed to wear her photograph, but I won't take it out for you fellows to see. If any of the rest of you dare to say that Goodrich spoke the truth, let him step out and say it, and then I'll knock him down."

Just then there was a knock on the door, and in walked Mr. White, the proctor. He stood holding the door-knob in one hand and looking first at the crowd of us, then straight at Harry, who was still standing with his fists clenched, glaring down at Goodrich on the floor.

Of course, he wanted an explanation, and Kitson told him that Goodrich had insulted a lady, and showed the photograph. Mr. White looked at it; and then ordered Goodrich to go out and told Harry he did quite right. And not one of us tried to explain the joke, so we cut rather a poor figure.

Then turning to Harry again, he said pleasantly, as if nothing had happened:

"Mr. Kitson, there are a lady and gentleman waiting outside who would like to look at this room, if you are prepared to receive visitors now."

We all stood mute and awkward while the proctor, after receiving a puzzled, but gracious assent from Harry, turned and spoke to someone outside the door.

"Mr. Kitson," he said, re-entering, followed by the two strangers. "I think you have met Mr. Thorne before. He wished his sister to see his old college room. It is the first time she has ever been to the college. I assure you, Miss Thorne, it is not usually so noisy here. The boys were having a little fro ic to-night."

One by one we slunk silently out of the room, fixing our dazed eyes to the last upon the feminine counterpart of the unlucky photograph—a sweeter, far lovelier version of the handsome brother, by whose side she stood chatting graciously with Harry and looking coldly at us from under half-disdainful eyelids.

We all wondered, and wonder still, how much of that row she ever heard.

She had been studying abroad for the last three years, and now that she was home she wanted to see his old room, and had stumbled upon our joke.

No, it didn't get about the college. I don't know whether Harry himself ever quite understood it. You see, we naturally did not care to have it noised about much, for even Goodrich agreed that the joke wasn't exactly on Kitson.

Oh, yes, her name really was Rose. Thorne had written it on the photo because its resemblance to her was so perfect.

What's that? Of course he did. Harry always got whatever he tried for, in college and out! M. King.

FARO says:—"I am sorry 'The Empress of the Earth' is finished. Are you going to let us have another war story soon? I hope so. Why not republish 'The Final War?' Many of us who read Short Stories did not read it in Pearson's Weekly."————I don't know, Faro, really, I don't know. To be candid I thought of letting war stories have a rest; then I get your letter and others of a similar kind. Suppose you and my other readers decide for me. Will you all send in a post-card saying whether you want a war story or not, and how many of you want "The Final War."

F. V. W.—Statistics prove that the most common cause of fires is the throwing down of lighted matches and other lights. The upsetting of lamps comes next. There are more fires in London during December than any other month.

I. N.—Justices of the Peace are appointed by the Lord Chancellor on the recommendation of the lord lieutenant of the county.

LOBSTER wants to know what it is that makes a negro's skin black?———The existence of a carbon pigment underlying the epidermis of the skin.

J. writes: "I am surprised to read that flints for guns are still made in this country. Do you know where they are produced?"————Gun flints are produced in the Lingheath Mines in Suffolk, and the output last year was 1,820,000. These flints are chiefly for guns intended for African and other savages, who, having been accustomed to flint locks for a long time, do not take kindly to more improved weapons. There are four sizes of flints now in use, and they are known as the musket, the carbine, the horse, and the single.

HAWK.—The entire coast line of the globe is about 136,000 miles.

D. S.—The electric light was invented in 1846, but it was not thought much of or made much use of before the year 1876.

C. P. H. asks: "Are the pigeons which frequent the various public buildings in London private property?"———Strictly speaking they belong to no one, although custom has enabled the officials attached to public buildings to lay claim to those birds which roost on their premises. It is believed that they were originally "strays" from private owners.

M. M. D.—A man's full mental power is not attained until the age of twenty-five. As a rule, the development of talent is most marked between the ages of thirty and forty-five.

A. P. T.—Moscow seems to hold the record for the largest hospital. It has one with accommodation for 7,000 persons and employs 900 nurses.

U. K. writes: "Is it really a fact that the late King of Spain is still unburied?"————Quite true. His body lies covered with a winding sheet on a marble slab in a vault of the Escurial. This is in accordance with a custom, dating from the year 700, for the body of a dead King to remain unburied until the death of his successor, when he is placed with great pomp beside the remains of his predecessors in the chapel of the Escurial.

BEN.—There are 169 Scotch mountains which have the prefix "Ben."

COAL.—The Home Office Return for last year will show you how we are using up our coal supply in the United Kingdom. 202,119,196 tons was the respectable quantity mined in 1897, which was an increase of 7,000,000 tons on the output for 1896.

R. M. writes to point out that man is the only animal that has a real nose or chin.————This is quite true, when you come to think about it. For horses have faces that are all noses, swine have snouts, elephants trunks, birds have beaks, lions have vast smelling organs, but none of them can be separated from their faces and called a nose. This fact is even more true of the chin, for it is particularly human.

CONSUL.—In the early days of Rome ladies wore such heavy ear-rings that they sometimes tore the lobes. Injuries to the ear were so numerous, that many doctors occupied themselves almost entirely with the healing of such injuries. The old idea that the wearing of ear-rings improves the sight, is nearly dead.

UNCLE.—The term "uncle," as applied to a pawnbroker, is a pun on the Latin word uncus, a hook. Pawnbrokers formerly employed a hook to lift the pawned articles, and the phrase was originally "Gone to the uncus." In the seventeenth century a usurer was called "my uncle" in the Walloon provinces, because, of his near connection with spendthrifts, which in Latin are nepotes, nephews.

M. R. A.—No, the Queen has never made use of the Royal Barges. They are in the care of Mr. Messenger of Teddington in his capacity of Queen's Bargemaster. These vessels are divided longitudinally by a gangway, the oarsmen sitting two on a seat on either side, as in the ancient Greek and Roman galleys.

HAIR.—A single dark-brown female hair will bear a weight of four ounces; a blonde hair will break under a strain of two and a half ounces.

G. T.—The cost of the celebrated Palace at Versailles is not known. It is said that Louis XIV. threw into the fire all the documents relating to the cost, so that the people should not hear of the vast sums he had spent on it.

VIOLET—The chrysantheum is the national flower of Japan. Once a year, when the chrysanthemum is in full flower, royalty gives a fête in its honour, invitations being only extended to those of high rank.

M. T.—Pembroke was a county palatine but was deprived of the title in 1535.

Q. R.—What are commonly called cats' whiskers are in reality feelers, which enable the animal in its wild state to find, or rather feel, its way through woods and forests in its nocturnal expeditions in search of prey. It is quite wrong to suppose they have anything to do with the sense of smell; they bear no relation whatever to the nasal organ.

B. B. B.—Photographs were first taken in England in 1802.

All Men and Women who have to be exposed to the bleak uncertainty of our trying climate should fortify themselves before they face their daily toil with Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, and they can then brave cold in winter and heat in summer with equanimity. The writer speaks from personal experience and from observation of beneficial effects on others. Tea opens the pores and temporarily excites, coffee stimulates the action of the heart, while Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa gives strength, stamina, and builds up and strengthens the lung tissues. It is indeed a wonderful food beverage. Nothing has ever been discovered that can approach it in giving lightness of heart, joy of life, fleetness of foot, and that general feeling of comfort which only comes from a full capacity to enjoy every pleasure — moral, intellectual and physical.

SHORT STORIES

TALES OF LOVE WIT PATHOS HUMOUR STRATEGY ETC.

No. 497.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending July 9th, 1898.

Edited by Clifton Playfair

A SCARE-CROW ROMANCE.

Leslie Forrest went to bed a peaceful citizen and awoke a rebellious farmer. At first he knew nothing at all of the germ of war that slumbered under the ample folds of his yellow pyjamas. He lay in his bed reflecting, a letter in his hand, and his knees up-heaving the coverlet.

"Your Uncle James is dead and you are the heir to the Black Oaks farm," was all he had read of the letter. Visions of meadow and stream; of hillside cool beneath majestic trees; the grey of a lichen-covered wall, overgrown with brambles; the spacious house, outstretching arms of hospitality; and the curving path that skirted the ancient well on its way to the veteran gate, that never shut, came o'er his mind from long ago.

This mood was merely reminiscent, however, and not at all to be construed as a consent to become the owner of a farm.

"On the whole," he ruminated, scratching the top of his head, "the place is worth having, if only for a home—a sort of retreat; and then, if ever I should get married, well, let's see what the rest of it says."

He resumed his letter: "heir to the Black Oaks farm, including the Hilltop addition and a legacy of £5,000, providing you marry Abigail Matilda Smithers, a distant family connection. In the event of your refusal to wed the said lady, you to inherit the Black Oaks and she to have the Hilltop addition and legacy."

"Now, bother Abigail Smithereens!" ejaculated Forrest, bounding out of bed and sweeping away the coverlet, blankets and sheets. "It's perfectly idiotic. It's the kind of stuff and nonsense you read about. No, you don't, Uncle Jeems. She can have the Hilltop addition, and now, why on earth did he give her the whole of the cash? Five thou—I think I'd like—but, no, not with Abigail—no, Abby, go thy Smithers' ways, in peace and curl papers."

He danced the prelude of a marvellous serpentine gyration and sat down on the edge of the bed to think the matter over again. The rebellion was started and working well.

"Heigho," he mused, as with hands on his knees he looked with winkless eyes at the common design on the carpet. "It's just the luck—it always goes about that way; and just as a fellow is actually taking an interest in the loveliest girl in the universe, and begins to think he would like to settle down."

Here he grew as sentimental and retrospective as is possible to any man in pyjamas.

"Wasn't she charming!" he exclaimed in delight. "Such dear brown eyes! Such hair—it looked like—what?—like raven-coloured skeins of silk. Such colour, spirit and genius of expressing herself! And yet a touch of sadness, too. I wonder why she wouldn't dance—she said she liked it; well, perhaps we made better progress at getting acquainted as it was."

He was silent a moment.

"Miss Rockland—rather fine—I wonder what her first name is? And I don't know where she lives or anything about her—that's the trouble with a formal introduction at a seaside ball."

Slowly dressing himself in conventional attire, and fluctuating between rhapsodies on his unknown queen, and railing at Abigail, Forrest went off to his breakfast at last.

"I'll look the place over for a couple of weeks, and then I am going to hunt Miss Rockland up, or squander my youth and fortune in the effort," said he.

Three big crows were stalking about and cawing in a field that belonged to the Hilltop addition one morning, as Forrest came out of his farmhouse. He saw them out of the corners of his eyes, in the same way that he saw the woman who walked about the place from time to time. That Abigail would come to fetch him away, or that he might inadvertently wander down through the meadows into her possessions and there be trapped and wed in spite of himself, was a constant fear with Forrest.

Abigail, he reflected, looked aggressive, progressive, and acquisitive. She walked about her acres on the opposite hill with a certain surefootedness that was very suggestive, he thought.

On her head she wore a bonnet that looked like a piece of blue stove-pipe, and hid her face as if it were deep in a tunnel and peering forth. This and the calico dress, secured at the waist loosely, were exactly the "earmarks" of an Abigail, the young man said.

As he glanced at the crows this particular morning, he saw her come and frighten them away. They alighted in his field of oats.

"Tut, tut, Abby," he exclaimed, "I hanker not for crow!"

When she turned away, he went to the hill and shied a stone at the birds.

They settled again on the Hilltop property, whence, in half-an-hour, Abigail "shooed" them again to the field of her neighbour.

"Confound her impudence!" said Forrest. "I don't care now if she does see me, I am going right down to scare her saucy black scoundrels."

She was standing in her field with a very determined air.

"No, I don't care if she does see me," he repeated.

But perhaps he did; at least in that particular garb, for he donned a ragged coat, and a crumpled hat before he proceeded along the hill.

"Perhaps she won't be so anxious to get me if she thinks I'm a yokel," he mused.

But why should the spirit of Forrest be proud? The woman across the way was so very far from wanting to get him as to even avoid her own fields if she thought he was walking about in his. She trembled daily lest he come to her door or cross the meadows to pour a five-thousand-pound tale of love and adoration into her startled ears.

She had long before concluded, with every indication of logic, that she hated this person, suggested as he was in the will of her ancient distant relation, Uncle Jim, as a suitable future husband. And now to add further insult to the injury caused by his presence on the opposite farm, he drove his wretched crows into every field she had. This particular morning found her red, angry and determined; hence her obstinate stand against the birds.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, ho, my Abby," chuckled Forrest, "you undertake to make a scare-crow of yourself, I see. Well, my doting Smithereens, I should very much enjoy removing my hat in acknowledgement of your eminent fitness—only I fear you'd think me proposing. But if you can be a scare-woman, I can be a scare-man, which same kindly remember."

He planted himself on the slope and the crows went off in dismay.

Thus stood the two, distantly glaring at each other, and telephoning messages of hatred along the filmy lines of web that spiders had stretched between.

"This will never do," mused Forrest. "I'll fetch a proxy; that'll make her wild."

Forthwith he proceeded to build a regulation scare-crow of masculine mien, that flapped its sleeves in the wind in a vacuous ecstasy.

Was Abigail disconcerted? No, not she. She caused to be erected a female scare-crow on the hill that was hers, with a bonnet on its head and a string about its slender unbending waist. It, too, waved its armless sleeves.

Now was a strange duet enacted, that was wrought by the breeze that wafted over the meadows and about the hills. Toying with the scare-crows from behind, the wind would lift the sleeves, first of the scare-woman, next of the man, and extend them towards each other, on the hills, in a shocking and palpable invitation to "come." If the breeze were strong it would lean the scare-man forward and nod his head in gallantry, and then go round and bend the woman sweetly and move her bonnet most coquettishly.

To say that the owners of the figures were indignant would be utterly inadequate; they were perfectly mad about it. They were also ashamed to pull the wooing figures down, for that would be, indeed, a confession that the spooning antics had been noticed.

At the end of the week the wind had loosened the joints of the scare-crows to such an extent that their frantic efforts to embrace across the intervening space were nearly equalled by their shameless bowing and scraping from morning till night.

Abigail meditated flight; Forrest thought of suicide and of slipping across in the night to inflict personal violence on the scare-woman with an axe.

"As soon as the hay is in," he muttered, "I'll get away from this and go to look for Miss Rockland."

Early one morning, while the various preliminaries of a thunderstorm were being completed, young Boreas, the blustering brother of Zephyr, came tearing along as a whirlwind that scudded hither and thither and up the hills and down. When he had gone, the landscape was utterly innocent of scare people, hats, bonnets and all.

Forrest was late upon the scene.

"Thank goodness," he said aloud, "the storm has pulled her scarecrow out by the roots." Then he added, as he took in the lay of the country: "Hallo! the confounded wind has levelled that Beau Brummel of mine."

He walked to the place where the Beau had flourished, and found a hole in the ground, wherein the leg of the scare-man once had been. From this a mark, as of something dragged across the dampened soil, indicated that the man of rags rested below in the hollow.

Down went Forrest. Coming at last to a little clearing, he leapt the brook—to find himself face to face with Abigail, who likewise sought her departed "crow."

"What! you!—Miss Rockland!" he cried.

"What! you! Mr. Leslie!" said she.

They stood a moment dumfounded.

"My name is Leslie Forrest," then said he, his face aglow with pleasant emotions.

"Oh! and mine is Abigail Matilda Rockland Smithers—but I—I sometimes leave out part of it," she said; and a merry twinkle began in her eyes and went all over her witching countenance.

Glancing towards the brook, in embarrassment perhaps, the two young people suddenly discovered the scare-man and the scare-woman, standing against the trees, an armless sleeve of the Beau flabbily wrapped about the lady's waist and her bonnet drooping coyly.

On the cards was written, "Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Forrest and Mr. and Mrs. Scare-crow, at home, Black Oaks, September 10th, 1897."

JENNY'S EXPERIMENT.

"I SHALL get along with him, I'm sure," said Jenny Read.

"Nobody could get along with him!" chorused the three other Misses Read.

Uncle Grant was the personage of whom they spoke—a crabbed, ill-tempered, little old man—who lived in a superb old country house in Derbyshire.

He had money to leave, but his nieces and nephews secretly believed that it would be much easier to go to Klondyke or West Australia and dig out fortunes, nugget by nugget, than to stay at home and earn them by making themselves acceptable to an old gentleman who had as many angles as a rose diamond, and as many prickly spikes (of temper) as a porcupine.

Lucy Read had tried it first. She was a soft-voiced, slender girl, with a head which reminded one of a drooping lily.

"No one can help loving Lucy," said Mrs. Read as she kissed her daughter good-bye.

But in three weeks Lucy came back half frightened out of her wits.

"He scolds so dreadfully," she said. "And he looked at me as the wolf must have looked at Little Red Riding Hood. Oh, mamma, I couldn't stay there, not if I were to be made richer than the Queen herself!"

Madge went next; but although a fine, tall girl, with a spirit of her own, she was cowed by Uncle Grant's savage eyes in less than a week.

"I'd sooner sweep a crossing for a living," said she, "than be uncle's heiress."

And so she came home without loss of time.

Amy, in no wise abashed by the successive failures of her sisters, was the third one to try the Grange and its possibilities. But she also succumbed before the terrible scourge of Uncle Grant's tongue.

"It's scold, scold, scold, from morning till night!" said Amy, as in a fortnight's time she tearfully related her experience to her parents.

"Oh, you don't know—nobody can know—what a dreadful man uncle is!"

"Oh, bother the old scamp!" said Mr. Read, who was of a free and easy nature, and thought his girls a great deal too sweet and nice to be snarled at by any rich old miser.

"Let him alone. My daughters needn't go begging for any man's money."

But here Jenny, the youngest, tallest and prettiest of the four girls, spoke up:

"I'll go!" said she.

"You don't know what you are undertaking," said Lucy, with a shudder.

"He'd wear out a stone," said Madge.

"He's a ghoul!" shuddered Amy.

"I shall get along with him, I am sure," said Jenny brightly.

And she packed up her little trunk and went to the Grange.

It was sunset when she walked up the flight of steps that led to the house.

Uncle Grant was standing at the top.

"So you are Jenny?" said he, surveying her with little twinkling eyes like glass beads.

"Yes, I am Jenny," said the bright-cheeked girl, giving him a kiss.

"You're late," said Uncle Grant.

"I am late," said Jenny. "I thought the wretched train never would have got here."

"It's a dreadfully warm day," growled Uncle Grant.

"I'm almost roasted," sighed Jenny.

"The whole summer has been intolerably warm," said the old gentleman.

"We might as well be in the tropics, and be done with it," retorted Jenny, flinging off her hat and fanning herself vehemently.

Uncle Grant gave her the keys that night, just as he had three times before given them to her three sisters.

"I shall expect you to take charge of the whole establishment," said he. "The servants are miserable——"

"No more than one might expect," interrupted Jenny, with a deprecatory motion of the hand. "Servants are no good at all now-a-days."

"Nothing ever does!" said Jenny.

Uncle Grant eyed her furtively.

This was quite different from the determined cheerfulness and systematic good spirits of her sisters.

At breakfast next morning Uncle Grant began to scold as usual.

"Fish again!" said he. "This makes four mornings this week we've had fish."

"I detest fish!" said Jenny, pushing away her plate with a grimace.

"And the rolls heavy again!" growled Uncle Grant, breaking one open.

"Please give me the plate, uncle," said Jenny as she rang the table bell sharply.

Mrs. Betts, the cook, a stout, good-humoured woman, made her appearance.

"Mrs. Betts," said Miss Read, "be so good as to throw these rolls out of the window."

The cook stared.

"Do you hear what I tell you?" said Miss Read with emphasis.

And Mrs. Betts flung the rolls out among the rose-bushes, where they were speedily devoured by Cato, the Newfoundland dog, and Rob and Roy, the two poodles.

"But what am I to eat for breakfast?" bewailed Uncle Grant.

"Biscuits, of course," said Jenny. "Anything is better than imperilling one's digestion with such stuff as this! And, Mrs. Betts, if you send up any more fish for the next month you may consider yourself discharged, do you hear?"

"But, my dear, I am rather fond of fish," put in the old gentleman.

"One can't eat fish the whole time," said Jenny imperiously. "Here, Mrs. Betts, this coffee isn't fit to drink! And the toast is burnt! And you must have put the cooking butter on the table by mistake! Let these errors be rectified at once."

Mrs. Betts retired with an ominous rustle on her stiffly starched apron.

"My dear," said Uncle Grant apprehensively, "Mrs. Betts is a very old servant, and——"

"I don't care if she is the age of Methuselah," said Jenny, "nobody can be expected to put up with such wretched cooking as this!"

"I really think she is not so bad, if—"

"Oh, pray don't apologise for her, uncle!" said Jenny. "They are all shiftless, lazy creatures, who must be discharged promptly if they don't do their duties."

Uncle Grant began to look frightened. He had kept Mrs. Betts, Annie and old John for ten years. Was it possible that he had scolded at them for ten years, only to have his niece outscold him now?

"I wouldn't be too hasty with them, my dear, if I were you," he remonstrated.

"Then let them do their duty," said Jenny, with the air of an empress.

"We are all mortal," pleaded Uncle Grant.

He ate the rest of his breakfast with but little appetite.

Annie, the housemaid, was finishing dusting his library when he entered it.

"Not done yet!" growled Uncle Grant, the fretwork of wrinkles once more coming into his brow.

"Annie," said Miss Read severely, "if this happens again I shall dispense with your services! Look at that clock! Is this the time of day to be dawdling about the rooms with a broom and duster? Remember, Mr. Grant does not pay you exorbitant wages to lie in bed until midday!"

"My dear," said Uncle Grant, "Annie is generally a very good girl, if——"

"Dear uncle," interrupted Jenny, "pray permit me to be the judge of these matters. You have ruled your household with a slack and indulgent hand altogether too long. I shall now institute a reform."

Annie had never moved about so briskly as she did that day.

Old John, the gardener, was not exempt from his share of the general turmoil. Miss Read chanced to hear her uncle reproaching the old man for some fancied neglect in the flower beds, whose diamonds, ovals, and crescents of brilliant colours were the pride of his horticultural heart, and she promptly came to his aid.

"Gardening, indeed! Do you call this gardening?" she said. "Uncle Grant, I'm astonished that you keep such a man as that about the place!"

And the torrent of reproaches which she showered upon the luckless head of poor old John was enough, as that individual observed, "to make one's flesh creep."

"My niece is a young lady of spirit and energy," apologised Mr. Grant, when at last Jenny had gone back to the house.

"Verra like you, sir, verra like you," said old John, scratching his head.

"Like me," said Mr. Grant slowly.

He stood full five minutes, quite speechless and motionless, staring at the mossy rim of an ancient sun-dial half sunk in the velvet grass. And at the end of five minutes he uttered the words again, slowly:

"Like—me!"

"There's no knowin' the master, he's that changed," said Mrs. Betts in the kitchen, a week or two later. "He's as mild as a lamb and as peaceful as a kitten."

"Isn't that what the young lady told us," said Annie, "when she came down into the kitchen that first morning after the fire was lighted, and told us she was going to try an experiment, we wasn't to mind a word she said, 'cause it was all by contraries? 'He doesn't know what his temper has got to be,' said she, 'and I am going to show him.' And, bless her sweet heart, her plan has worked like a charm."

It had, in good truth. Uncle Grant was a changed man.

And Jenny had relapsed into the original sunshine of her temper—and all the domestic wheels of the Grange seemed to revolve on velvet.

But Uncle Grant took all the credit to himself. He never knew that Jenny had taught him a lesson.

"We can get along very nicely," said he, "now that my niece has subdued those little tempers of hers."

And Jenny was his heiress and darling after all—for he will always believe that it was he "who formed her character."

THE MAGIC THREAD.

In the venerable hamlet of Kurungabad, on the lovely banks of the Jumna, lived a wealthy Brahmin named Benee See.

Three fine old banyan trees stood in front of his dwelling, screening it from the too persistent attentions of the sun, and affording a lodgment to a family of holy crows, which the good man fed daily with his own hand; and, what is even more singular, at the expense of his own pocket. He was a man of very strict habits, punctual and regular in his devotions; never scamping a single ablution, never omitting to perform a single ceremony mentioned in the Shastras, or neglecting to pronounce a single Om whenever that sacred syllable occurred in the service.

If you think this behaviour extraordinary in a man of wealth and station, I must tell you that Benee was past his meridian, which may account for a good deal.

To be sure, Benee had been rather a wild goat in his youth, so that he had a tolerably heavy lot of arrears behind him; and, alas! for this old-time "gay-and-festive," this now penitent son of twenty generations of Brahmins, there were only a few years left, out of what at the beginning had looked an interminable series, in which he could hope to "fetch up."

So Benee See, who had lived too free, was now become a devotee.

As a young "exquisite" he had preferred the pleasant service of Krishna to the gruesome slavery of Kali; and in the enjoyment of every sweet morsel he could lay hands on, had scorned to count the slow passing of the seasons, which nevertheless come and go as appointed, without caring much whether the children of this world use them to profit or employ them in vanity; and each had left the trace of its finger upon the handsome forehead of Benee See.

As a man of a certain age, Benee grudged the passing of every day, numbering even the smallest fragments of the hurrying hours, acting, indeed, on the well-known principle of "milking the bull when the cow's dry."

He, who had never troubled himself about times and seasons and rites and ritual, now never forgot, though it might be 10 p.m.—a most unseemly hour by the way for the serious minded—when he spread his mat upon the terrace, to repeat the night prayer, before stretching out his limbs to sleep.

Being long past his prime, Benee See was now in a fair way of becoming a holy man.

One day when Benee had gone into the jungle to pay his devotions at an ancient shrine in a banyan grove—a secret altar, erected by the dwarfs in honour of the forest deity—he was surprised to see, sitting under the shade of a peepul tree, a maiden of a beauty surpassing everything in the shape of female loveliness with which his youthful eyes had made him acquainted.

Why, oh! why had this adventure not come to him in the springtide of his years?

He was sensible of a strangely delicious thrill which made his head reel and his limbs tremble. Was the damsel of this world, or a visitor from another?

Never, thought he, had he beheld a form so alluring, features of such heavenly mould, lips red as a pomegranate bud, eyes dark as a moonless night, but brighter than the stars in Orion, teeth like a double row of opals, hands and feet whose shape and delicacy were proof beyond doubting that the lady was "good stock," and her caste the highest and purest in the land.

Coming unexpectedly into the presence of so much sweetness and beauty, Benee felt abashed, overcome, lifted up, and cast down. For a space he stood like one spell-bound. Why was loveliness so enchanting wasting itself among the groves and alleys of the jungle?

He felt a pain at the heart. The blood rushed through his veins like the nullahs of the Jumna in flood-time. The vows he had registered, the resolutions not to do "this," and not to do "that"—the list, he remembered, included a resolve not to talk to pretty girls by the well side—upon finding that, "this and that" had become more plague than pleasure to him, were swept away now like twigs by the current.

When he took up the part of devotee, Benee had convinced himself that it was the only rôle in the great drama that was left for him to play. Now, in the conflict of his emotions, forgetting that since they had lost flavour for him he had abjured the "pomps and vanities," he wished himself twenty years younger. Here was an adventure which promised to enlarge his experience, to lead to new and surprising developments; but, alas! his time was past.

Opportunity, thought he, mostly had the awkward habit of coming too soon or arriving too late.

He had regretfully determined that he would probably be better occupied at the temple of the Blue God than at the shrine of Kama—the lovely boy with the sugar-cane bow—when the lady, without the least speck of shyness—tired, perhaps, of so much staring without any talking—addressed him thus:

"I am the daughter of a king whose city lies on the other side of the jungle towards the west. I was betrothed to a prince of the Royal House of Meru; a man of handsome mien and noble presence. When the emperor who came from the North, having heard of the mine of glittering gems and the treasure in the mountains of Meru, spread himself over all that country, my father and the Prince, my betrothed, went out against him. But it was written that they should not return; and, alas! my eyes beheld them no more. They died, but their bodies were carried straight to Heaven by the Celestial messengers. On the spot where they fell, nothing was found but a heap of rose leaves.

"When the conqueror came to the city, I fled to the jungle. Azee, the King of the Dwarfs, found me, and here I have lived, protected by his people, ever since."

Benee, who had scarcely dared to breathe whilst the silvery notes tripped lightly off the lady's tongue, now ventured to ask if Her Highness had any commands for her servant.

From under her long dark lashes the Princess sent forth a whole sheaf of arrows before replying, every one of which left a flaming wound in Benee See's poor fluttering heart—the organ whose supersensitiveness had been both bliss and bane.

A dizziness came over him. He leant against a tamala tree for support. He heard the voice of the Princess murmuring soft syllables in his ear, but his head was humming like a bramra bee. What was it she was saying? His head was going round like a spinning-top. Not a word of her pretty speech could he distinguish, but her accents were sweet and low. The next moment he felt himself slipping to the ground, then he lost consciousness, and the world was a blank.

When he came to himself, which he did very quickly, Benee See was alone; but the flutter of a female garment, the peepul tree under which she had sat, and a sandal which she had left behind her in her hasty flight, were convincing proof that the scene he had passed through was no vision of the brain, but a very real and actual experience. After depriving him of his faculties by the magnetism of her glance, she had fled from his grey beard and uncurled moustachios.

He looked at the sandal mournfully, sighed, stuck it in his bosom, rubbed his forehead, and got up.

"Love," said he, "Love, mysterious, maddening joy! I never thought to know thy pangs again. But then," he added, "I never expected to meet this charming Princess; and, alas! also the infirmities of——" he sighed more deeply than ever. "Ah, me!" he went on, "that at fifty-five I should still be the slave of Kama. Love, thou art indeed a drunkard's cup—delicious, delirious, delusive. Yet now, if it were possible that I could marry that lovely Princess, and live again for just one circuit of the seasons as in the happy, happy days of youth, I could be content after that to beg my way to Benares on foot, and die a mendicant in the holy city."

"Take this thread," he said.

Whilst he had been speaking he had been walking in the direction in which he had seen the flutter of the silken scarf. He had a vague hope that he might see the Princess again. He had quite forgotten the Blue Shrine in the banyan grove. After walking for an hour he came to a road by the side of which sat a yellow fakeer, begging.

Now, Benee had never seen a yellow fakeer. The *gurus, he knew, believed there was but one; and that he was only seen by those to whom he was sent. Benee wondered if he had anything to do with the charming Princess. He approached, and threw a coin on the dirty rag which was stretched at the feet of the yellow man.

"My blessing be upon thee, my son," said the fakeer; and drawing a short length of scarlet thread from a wallet that lay by his side, "take this thread," he said, "and before thou liest down upon thy carpet to-night, bind it round thy arm between the shoulder and the elbow. It is Junwa†—the sacred syllables Bhuh and Svar have been pronounced over it. It has the power of Maghrabi magic in the third degree. Wear it constantly, and no evil can harm thee. Wish, and it shall give thee thy heart's desire."

When he had gone a little distance Benee See looked back, but the yellow fakeer had disappeared; there was nothing on the road but a thin cloud of dust.

The Magic Thread, the yellow fakeer, and the beautiful Princess, filled Benee's thoughts so completely when he spread his mat upon the roof that the night prayer was quite forgotten. But the scarlet thread was wound about his arm—it was barely long enough, he had observed, as he fastened it carefully, to go round once. "However," he reflected, "there it is. It will not be necessary to remove it, so there it can stay." Then he lay down and fell asleep, wishing himself again a young man of five-and-twenty, and also that he might soon have another chance of meeting the amiable Princess. On awaking in the morning Benee was quickly sensible that a delightful change had passed over him. He had gone back thirty years. His youth was renewed, his vigour restored, his spirits had recovered elasticity. He dressed himself with care, annointed his person with attars and spices, curled his moustachios, put the lady's sandal into his bosom, and went off to the jungle.

Before doing so, however, he took care to rescind all the resolutions he had made on becoming a devotee, circumstances having now rendered them unnecessary. They could be renewed, if required, at a later opportunity. At twenty-five a man may surely be pardoned for declining to be bound by the vows of fifty.

Benee had not gone very far in the direction of the peepul tree before he caught sight of the Princess, who was sitting beneath it.

"Ah!" thought he, "she expects me evidently. But it's not I who'll be surprised this time, my Princess," and, twirling his moustachios fiercely, he marched up to the tree. Then, seeing that she did not start, shiver, or scream, but only drew her veil coquettishly across the lower half of her face, while the lightning of her eyes threatened to reduce him to speechlessness, if the spell were not broken, he addressed her.

"Great Princess," he began; but finding a difficulty in proceeding with those twin orbs scintillating in front of him, he drew from its hiding place the lady's sandal, and inquired artlessly if she recognised it.

"Indeed, I do," she said, smiling. "I lost it yesterday in the jungle, and have come out to-day to look for it. Where, pray, did you find it?"

Then Benee See, taking firm hold of opportunity, declared himself:

"I am he, Princess, who yesterday was smitten to the ground by the fire of thine eyes," telling how the fire had consumed his heart and done serious damage to his head; how he would rather live with her for one year than without her for a thousand, since beauty so bewitching must surely transcend even that of the Heavenly dancers. How he had seen the yellow fakeer, who had given him the Magic Thread, and how, having by virtue of its mystic power obtained a renewal of his youth, he had risen early in the morning and returned to the jungle, determined there to stay till he had found her, if he had to seek as long as it would take to travel from Patal-puri to Parigat.*

"The power of holy men," said the Princess, and in Benee's eager ears her voice sounded ravishing as the voices of the minstrels in the Halls of Dazzling Light, "is not to be questioned by the sinful sons of earth; but devotion so uncommon is a rarity in a mortal. And you really are the good man who passed here yesterday on his way to the Blue Shrine in the banyan grove? Excuse me," she said, looking at him provokingly, "I shouldn't have thought it."

"Let the sandal, oh, Princess, which I delivered to thee, make answer for me!" replied the unabashed Benee See.

"It is well," said the Princess, smiling upon him graciously, "yet nothing is so good but it might be better. A sandal? Well, fifty people may find a sandal, but only one man wears the Magic Thread. Show it me now, then shall I be convinced that thou art the man."

So Benee showed the arm on which was wound the Magic Thread.

"Dear! dear!" said the Princess, looking much concerned. "It's cutting the flesh. It's tied a great deal too tight. Surely you must find it very inconvenient to have the muscles confined in this fashion? Let me loosen it—just a bit."

"Take care!" said Benee, "take care!" for the Princess's fingers were busy with the Thread. "There's just enough to go round, but not a hair's-breadth over. I'd rather put up with the inconvenience and insure the advantage than——"

But the Princess had succeeded—the Thread was off, and Benee breathlessly watching her attempts to refasten it.

She tried here, and tried there, but try where she would she couldn't make the two ends meet. Benee, conscious that a change had already begun to come over him—his blood was running slower, his pulse falling lower—begged her to give him the Thread, or to tie it where it had been tied before. But she refused, saying that she could manage it very well if he wouldn't be so impatient. And all the time Benee was rapidly gaining in years and losing in spirits.

At last, when Benee found himself again a greybeard of five-and-fifty, it came to an open quarrel.

"I've seen many a better stick in the jungle," cried the Princess; and, calling him a "miserable double-dealing old deceiver," she threw down the Thread and walked off. But before Benee could possess himself of the magic filament, a crow flew out of a neighbouring tree, pounced on the prize, and bore it away.

Benee See was never seen again at his home on the lovely banks of the Jumna; but at the Blue Shrine in the banyan grove there has been a resident Jogi† ever since.

SAVED BY A RING.

"I HAVE heard you say that the West Coast of Africa used to be a rough spot, Captain, when you commanded a brig trading with that part of the world. Now, you can surely tell us a thrilling story!"

That was touching the Captain in a weak spot. He was just a trifle vain, and his vanity was tickled by being called upon to amuse the company with some story in which he had figured prominently. He made a pretence of modest hesitation; then "went ahead" abruptly, without any preliminaries.

"Sailing in those parts had been dangerous, but the piratical craft had been scared away by the British war vessels, and I felt pretty safe.

"I left port with a hold well stored with valuable merchandise and quite a respectable sum of money.

"In the forward saloon or second cabin were nine Spaniards returning to their own country. They had been employed out there and had had enough of it. They were swarthy-looking fellows, with scowling figure-heads, and glittering black eyes reflecting cruelty in every glance and expression.

"I never did like a Spaniard, never having experienced the fine boasted courtesy coupled with the high chivalry of the hidalgos of Castile.

"In the after cabin, for one passenger I had a fine-looking young fellow, a midshipman attached to a British vessel looking after slavers and the like, who had been down with fever. He was going home in order to fully recover his health.

"I had one other passenger, a Spanish maiden about twenty years old, who occupied the best state-room in the after cabin, and I must confess that her beautiful hair, black and luxuriant eyes, expressive and soft as a gazelle's, complexion like a peach, coquettish airs, and a form that rivalled a full clipper in rounded, swelling lines and, and——"

"Never mind, Captain, about the young lady. You have said enough, and we can imagine the balance of the loveliness."

"Hum—exactly! Well, to heave ahead. I rather pitied that young lady, for she could not speak a word of English, had nothing to say to the tawny-skinned fellows in the second cabin, while the midshipman could not make use of a single Spanish phrase, and I knew nothing of her lingo.

"But that part of it did not appear to affect the efforts of the young officer to make himself agreeable. He proceeded deliberately to make love to the señorita, every opportunity that offered, talking away as fast as his tongue would permit, with his hand on his heart and face flushed by the earnestness of his efforts. While she, laughing and jabbering in the soft musical tones of her language, would sing and coo, her voice ringing through the cabin with a rare cadence, when the handsome, careless dog was idling by her side.

"She was evidently possessed of wealth; at least I judged so from the fact of her having such a profusion of diamonds, which she displayed with childish pride; her costumes being revelations of lace, richness and harmony of colour, even if bordering a trifle on the fanciful in detail and conception. What she had been doing in those parts I did not know

"The middy had my best wishes for capturing the prize. He was a good fellow and jolly comrade. But what puzzled me was how they got on so well, when neither could understand the other; but love, it is said, has a language of its own.

"We were making slow progress, and waiting for a breeze, when one of the crew at work on the fore topsail yard reported a sail in sight broad off the beam. Now, a sail in those days in that vicinity required caution in approaching, for there was no knowing what moment a piratical craft might heave in sight, with chances in favour of all hands 'walking the plank.'

"I jumped into the fore-rigging to have a better look at the sail through my glass. It was not much larger than a gull's wing.

"The wind was light and variable, the sun dazzled my eyes and a slight swell rather interfered with my investigation, which tended to keep me aloft much longer than I had intended. I finally returned to the deck, satisfied that we had nothing to fear from the strange craft.

"Descending the after-companionway, I entered the cabin with the intention of taking a short siesta in my state-room while waiting for a breeze to spring up, but had hardly composed matters to my satisfaction, when a light, quick footstep crossed the cabin, and the middy entered my room without knocking, somewhat to my surprise and displeasure as well.

"I was on the point of reading the free-and-easy gentleman a lesson in etiquette, when I chanced to catch his eye, and I saw at once that something unusual had occurred.

"His voice dropped to a whisper as he gained the side of my berth, and an electric shock seemed to run through my heart as he laid his white hand impressively on my shoulder.

"'Captain,' he whispered, 'our lives are in jeopardy. There are pirates on board.'

"'Pirates!' I exclaimed, hastily swinging my legs over the berth. 'Where are they?' and I was conscious that my face was blanched as we gazed into each other's eyes.

"'The Spaniards in the forward cabin, and their active ally, the señorita—the brains and leader of the gang.'

"I looked at the officer in astonishment, thinking for a moment that he had taken a glass of grog or so too much; but the steady gaze of his clear, grey eyes refuted at once the suspicion, forcing upon me the conviction that serious business confronted both him and me.

"'How did you discover all this, and how long have you been in possession of the facts?'

"'Oh, I've had my eyes and ears open since I first came on board, and have never neglected an opportunity to listen to any stray word that might fall from any of them.'

"'Why, look here, confound it! What do you mean? Did you not tell me yourself that you could not speak a word of Spanish, and have I not heard you using the most absurd broken English when talking nonsense to the señorita, as if that would help matters between you?'

"'I admit all as you state it, but had an object in view when denying knowledge of the Spanish language. I pleaded ignorance of Spanish because the day I came on board this vessel, I assisted that pretty-faced demon over the gangway, and noticed on her hand a gem that glittered and sparkled like the eye of a cobra. The mounting was so peculiar and odd that it could not fail to attract my attention, and you must have been attracted by it.'

"I nodded.

"'Well, sir, that ring was once the property of my uncle. He started two years ago from that very port to visit his relations in London, but has never been heard of since.

"My suspicions were aroused at once, coupled with the decidedly cut-throat, hang-dog expression of your Spanish passengers.

"'While I have been flirting with the señorita and she pretending to listen coyly to the unintelligible nonsense poured into those pink ears of hers—she knows English, though!—she was coolly plotting, at various times, with some members of the gang, who generally were not far off, suggesting how to slit my throat without creating an alarm.

"'They have full knowledge of the amount of treasure on board, which, together with the vessel, they purpose gaining possession of, then seek some haunt known to them. I have no doubt they murdered my uncle and will murder us, unless we manage to circumvent their plans.'

"'How have they arranged to carry out their murderous scheme?'

"'While you were aloft, looking after that strange sail, they had the opportunity they wished for, for a last grand confab. They are to rise to-night, and imagine the vessel will fall an easy prey to their superior numbers. The capture would have been made shortly after leaving port but for the advice of the señorita. She was apprehensive of the erratic movements of a British ship just now in the vicinity, and desired to gain a good offing with a clear run for their rendezvous. Now listen carefully to their plan of operations.

"'They will all sleep on deck to-night with the plea that it is too hot and stifling below deck. Two of them will be stationed aft to attend to the mate and man at the wheel, the officer off watch will be knifed by another scoundrel, who will then join his comrades forward in murdering the crew—the signal for the attack being three raps on forward cabin companion way.'

"'And who is to look after our interests? You and I?'

"'Oh, I omitted that! The pretty Spanish damsel has guaranteed to carve our windpipes in the most approved manner. Her stiletto has been sharpened to an edge and point fine as a needle. There, sir, you have it all from their standpoint, and I must say they have worked it out very well, in every manner but one.'

"'And that?'

"'Is the successful carrying out of their game. Life is sweet to me, Captain, and I presume it is to you. I have no desire to lose the number of my mess. I'll fight, depend upon that, and as captain of your own ship, I simply ask for my station and part of the work you desire me to attend to, with a full knowledge of your general plan of operations.'

"For the next half hour I can assure you I did some pretty hard thinking, for it was a matter of life and death, with but little time to devise means of defence or escape.

"To begin with, there were no arms on board the vessel, while the Spaniards were undoubtedly armed to the teeth. The midshipman had a pair of pistols and his light dress sword, the only weapons that could be counted upon for the defence.

"I relied upon our strong hope and the possibility that would count largely in our favour—the overweening confidence of the pirates, with their well laid plans and the apparent helplessness of the victims within their grasp.

"The men were quietly communicated with, the midshipman was made thoroughly acquainted with my plans, the officers were posted, while the steward easily carried the details to the men in the forecastle.

"The Spaniards only counted on having one watch on deck, but as it was necessary to have all hands, I resorted to a little stratagem. Quietly removing a portion of the quicksilver from its receptacle on the barometer, I summoned the mates in great excitement taking care to show the Spanish scoundrels that the mercury had dropped to an alarming point, fortune aiding me by a dense bank of black and threatening clouds hanging on the horizon. Sail was shortened, hatches battened down, extra lashings put on everything movable about decks; and I noted with one eye of satisfaction that a thick cloud of smoke was pouring from the galley smoke-pipe, while the men walked the deck with belaying pins close at hand, but carefully suppressing all appearances of excitement.

"The mate walked the top of the house with a hatchet stowed in the bosom of his voluminous shirt. The midshipman lounged on one side of the quarter deck with his pistol ready: while I stood by the main liferail, apparently intent upon studying the aspect and possibilities of the weather, my right hand clutching the butt of the officer's spare pistol, and an eye fixed upon all moving objects.

"Gradually the men dropped into the shadows forward, apparently dozing, the positions of the Spaniards being easily detected by the small glowing light that emanated from their cigarettes.

"This disposition of the crew and officers of the vessel had somewhat disconcerted and upset the plans of the plotters; but they were by no means thwarted in the task they had undertaken.

"The Spaniards merely sent another man or two aft to cope with the middy and myself, and not a suspicion of discovery or defeat evidently had entered into their calculations.

"With the tap of the bell announcing ten o'clock, three distinct raps echoed through the ship, and in an instant the whole scene changed as if by magic. Pandemonium appeared to have broken loose in that little space, so calm and peaceful only a moment before.

"I had no time or opportunity to attend to anything for an instant but my own personal safety, for one of the Spaniards leapt upon me with the ferocity of a panther, the blade of his two-edged dagger glittering wickedly in the dim starlight; but, with a cool, steady aim, I covered the villain's breast, and he fell without a groan, shot through the heart.

"Seizing an iron belaying pin from the rail, I dealt the fellow who was hacking at the mate, a stunning blow, and then had an opportunity to look about me, as the mate rolled the body of his late antagonist overboard.

"The middy had not used his pistol, but, depending upon his sword, was on the point of giving the coup de grâce to a burly ruffian who had attacked him.

"Forward, the battle was raging fiercely, the loud yells of the combatants ringing out in terrible discords, varied occasionally by frenzied shrieks of agony, as Sam, the athletic black cook, dealt out his stock of boiling hot water, of which he had been instructed to have an unlimited supply.

"The Spaniards were capering about like so many dancing masters, having little or no opportunity to use firearms, not anticipating the slightest resistance, and depending upon their knives for the deadly work in hand.

"The seamen presented a bold front, while the cook kept up an increasing stream of scalding water, compelling the survivors to seek safety in flight as they were charged by the men flushed with victory.

"Amid the tramp and the turmoil, the cabin door flew open, and the woman appeared with a pistol in each hand, her eyes blazing like two coals of fire. She uttered a passionate cry as she realised that her scheme had failed, failed at every point, while the sailors drove a number of the pirates overboard.

"But one of the gang remained on the deck of the brig in possession of a weapon. He was the youngest and best looking of the party.

"He had his cape wrapped round his left arm, his dagger ready for instant action, as he crept round and round the middy, who, with sword carefully poised, watched every movement of his lithe foe.

"We were all more or less worked up and excited over the combat, and, having full faith and confidence in the naval officer's ability to defend himself, all crowded round to witness the duel à la mort. As a matter of precaution the woman had been disarmed, and was compelled to watch the phases of the closing scene in the tragedy.

"The pirate had retreated before an impetuous assault of the officer, when, tripping over a ring bolt, he was thrown off his guard for a brief interval of time, sufficient, however, to seal his fate, the bright blade of the middy passing through his body. He fell without a gasp.

"Wild and unearthly the señorita's voice rang out in fierce denunciation; then, wresting herself free, she picked up a dagger that had fallen on deck and plunged it into her bosom, sinking by the inanimate body while her life blood mingled with his.

"It was the last crowning act of death and violence in that struggle for life, and as I gazed about the deck it had the appearance of a slaughter pen.

"No, I have never been in any similar position since, and have no desire for further adventures of that kind."

THE PRESS IN PRAISE OF M.A.P.,

The New Penny Society Paper, Edited by Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR.

The "Daily Chronicle" says:

It has the all-important quality of interestingness in a promising degree. Its paragraphs are fresh and striking; its tone is easy without being offensive; it suits the man or woman tired with serious affairs. The paper is brimful of gossip about all classes and divisions of society.

The "Daily Telegraph" says:

One of the most entertaining features of the opening number is the chapter of autobiographical detail, contributed by Sir Edward Clarke, under the title, "In the Days of My Youth."

The "St. James's Gazette" says:

Every page of "M. A. P." is packed with attractive chit-chat and personal, but not offensive, gossip. Mr. O'Connor may be treading upon rather thin ice in this new venture of his; but his aim, he says, is to avoid the "indefensible, scandalous, and abominable," and, if he does that, we see no reason why "M. A. P." should not be a distinct success.

The "Freeman's Journal" says:

The first number of "M. A. P.," Mr. T. P. O'Connor's new weekly penny paper, promises exceedingly well. It is bright, chatty, entertaining, full of interesting information about well-known people, contains more than one good story, and is altogether a most acceptable addition to the weekly press. "M. A. P." has only to maintain the standard set in its opening number to become one of the most successful publications of its kind.

The "Dundee Advertiser" says:

It is extremely well got up, and full of interesting and readable matter. As its name implies, it deals mainly with persons, and it aims, in fact, at being a cheap, but high-class Society journal. "M. A. P." will be a formidable rival to the high-priced Society papers.

The "Western Mercury" says:

What promises to be a very attractive feature of Mr. T. P. O'Connor's new journal, "M. A. P." is the weekly "Chapter of Autobiography." Sir Edward Clarke writes the first chapter, and a very bright and interesting story it is.

The "Bradford Observer" says:

It is extremely well got up, and full of interesting and readable matter.

PART THE FIRST.

"The Ambitions of Youth."

SUMMARY.

The opposing factions in the public games of ancient Constantinople were known as the "Blues and Greens." The Emperor and Empress favoured the Blues, and consequently the enmity that existed between the two factions was so strong that they could not meet in the streets without coming to blows.

Rhesus, a country youth from Sicily, lands at Constantinople with his friend, Proclus, and with a fixed determination to become famous as a gladiator. He adopts the cause of the Greens, and the first contest in which he takes part is a chariot race, which he would have won had it not been for the foul play of Hermiot, his opponent of the Blues.

A few years pass and Eutasia is affianced to Rhesus.

One night Proclus and Rhesus chance to overhear a plot between Hypatius, a claimant to the throne, Marcen, a gladiator of the green faction, and Hermiot of the Blues, to raise the city in revolt, remove Justinian from the throne, and make Hypatius emperor in his place.

Hypatius proceeds to take them singly down to the flooded catacombs under the ground upon which they are standing, where he has vast treasures stored with which he purposes to buy the sympathies of the people. Marcen goes with him first, leaving Hermiot on the watch. Rhesus and Proclus spring out upon Hermiot, bind and gag him. Upon the return of Hypatius and Marcen, Proclus assumes the blue sash of Hermiot, personates Hermiot under the cover of the darkness, and goes down into the catacombs with Hypatius in order to discover the whereabouts of the treasure.

CHAPTER V.

The Hall of Waters.

When Proclus and Hypatius had passed the door in the wall, and it had swung silently to behind them, the nephew of Anatasius bade his companion follow him closely, and went with confidence along a black, evil-smelling passage that sloped steeply downwards, emerging at last into a lofty chamber, lighted by a straggling moonbeam that crept through a slit in the stony roof. By the dim glow, torches were seen piled in a corner, and one of these Hypatius lit, and bound a dozen more in his belt, signing to Proclus to do likewise. He then went on his knees, and inserted his dagger point in one of the interstices of the rough flags, prized one up a little, and getting his hand underneath, raised it easily to a vertical position. The flickering glare of his torch showed the top of a flight of stairs, dark and damp with slime and green moss.

"You first," he whispered; "I follow."

Proclus, though carefully and rather afraid, went down as desired, and Hypatius, following, let down the stone behind him into its resting place.

Saving for the fitful yellow gleam of the torches, the two men were in absolute darkness, and in complete silence.

Between the damp walls, down that slippery stair, which to Proclus seemed interminable, in the gloom and the stillness, they went without speaking, until their footsteps echoed curiously hollow, and a strange clamminess was in the air; and at last the light from their torches fell on the level surface of still black water, and on the rounded shafts of several grey stone columns uprising from it, and losing themselves in the roof of murky shadow.

The stairs ended abruptly above the water, between two pillars, but a boat lay moored on that strange sea at the foot, and from the right hand pillar a thick chain, red and white with rust and slime, went out into the vagueness beyond.

Proclus, divining what was required of him, and not wishing to speak too much, stepped into the boat without a word, and drew out a pair of short sculls, which slipped between rowlocks of graven bronze. The boat had evidently seen better service than its present duty, he thought, noting this, and the elegance of her shape and lines. Then Hypatius placed torches in sockets in the boat-side, and steering close by the rotting chain, bade Proclus pull on without fear.

The great columns of smooth stone—the handiwork of artists whom the caprice of Constantine the Great had employed—loomed up out of the darkness they advanced into like grey ghosts of the under-world sailing slowly by. The unsteady light of the flaring torches cast long, waving shadows and bright, white gleams in alternation across the inky waters of that rippleless flood; and in the appalling silence the very sound of the oars dipping and rising seemed muffled and far away.

At length Hypatius spoke, his words sounding hollow and strange, and a faint refrain thereof went whispering weirdly down the shadowy colonnades that stretched through the slimy sea.

"It is a strange place, is it not, gladiator?" he asked. "A secure hiding-place for secret wealth; a fitting place wherein to bury the bodies of our foes? Methinks Belisarius, once here, would cause us no more apprehension."

"Indeed no," answered Proclus; "nor the Emperor himself."

A sardonic smile wreathed the face of Hypatius; a smile that well suited the gloomy place and the unnatural paleness of his features amid the encompassing grey and black shadows.

"A consummation devoutly to be wished, yet not easy of accomplishment," said he. "However, our other method has yet to fail. But have a care with the oars now, and slacken speed. We have passed the eleventh pillar, and the chain ends here. A little further on we should see the light of my brother's torch. He came in with us, and we left him with the treasure until our return. He is a worthy fellow, is Pompey, and did I not aspire to the throne myself. I would help him thereon. Ah! there is the gleam of his light."

Proclus half turned on the thwart and saw a dim glow ahead, just above the water; a yellow haze, at first diffused, but taking shape and definite outline as they neared. When the boat drew alongside it, he saw that the light proceeded from a torch held in the hand of an anxious-looking man attired in the garb of a monk, and that this man stood on a broad stone under a low arch that spanned a black looming passage in the wall. He noticed that the top of this passage sloped down sharply, and when, having secured the craft, they all went in, he found that it led, with sundry twists and turns, to a roomy cavern, whose sides and tops were thick with beads of moisture and clumps of moss.

And there, in the swaying light of Pompey's torch, lay massive ingots of gold, gleaming in dull, yellow pyramids built criss-cross fashion; earthern jars filled to the brim with costly jewels, both uncut and unpolished; a fabulous quantity of gold and silver pieces piled promiscuously against the farther wall; and drinking vessels and ornaments and arms of every shape and size, but all of priceless worth—the whole the ransom of many kings.

Avarice shone in the eyes of the three men as they looked on that huge hoard of wealth, and Proclus voiced the thoughts of his companions as well as his own when he said—disguising his voice:

"It is the legacy of a Crœsus! It is enough to buy the city twice over, and hurl a dozen emperors from their thrones."

"Then you are satisfied, Hermiot?" asked Hypatius, preparing to return.

"I am satisfied, and more," answered the cynic. "The crown is yours already. Let us get to work without delay. With a handful of those jewels and gold pieces the servants of the blue faction at the hippodrome are the servants of the Emperor Hypatius to-morrow."

"Take some then," said the claimant, visibly flattered with his supposed friend's enthusiasm. "Marcen has already taken a foretaste with him. And now we will go back."

"It is quite time," said Pompey, dashing his torch against the rock, and sending glowing sparks hissing to the damp floor.

"Yet one question," said Proclus. "How many know of this, saving myself and my friend Marcen? Too many tongues are dangerous."

"Saving yourself and your friend Marcen, none know the secret besides us two," Pompey replied, his brother assenting.

"Lead on then!" cried Proclus. "I am with you heart and soul, by the Holy Cross!"

Silently the three men went up the passage, and pulled back to the end of the chain, not finding it without difficulty and some anxious moments, and then rowed with a will to the foot of the green-covered steps, the torches casting huge and spectral shadows down the long dark avenues of the columns, and the swish of the sculls and the drip of the spray echoing faintly from the dim recesses, where the shades of eternal night brood over the sullen flood.

Half-way up the mossy steps the tramp of feet broke the dead silence, and as they hurried forward, the muffled thud of a heavy stone falling awoke their worst fears.

With blanched faces they dashed on. The flag was as they left it, and there was no sign of human presence, but when Pompey essayed to raise that bar to their egress, he found it immovable. Hypatius, white with fear, helped him, and Proclus joined, but though their muscles cracked with the effort, the stone remained firm.

The two traitors gazed at each other with wide-open eyes that said more than their lips dared utter, and despite the damp chill of the thick air, beads of perspiration broke out upon their foreheads, and their hands grew hot.

They were discovered, trapped; someone had found the secret of the passage, and barred the way, and made them prisoners in the Hall of Waters; and as one of the torches flared up suddenly and then spluttered out, the horror of their fate overcame them.

They leapt up at the impassive stone, beating it fiercely with their clenched hands; they called aloud like men possessed; they reviled and upbraided each other, and Proclus—who stood, not heeding them, with the one remaining light—and then sat down on the steps in helpless despair.

Proclus took two torches from his belt, and, lighting them with his, gave them into their hands in silence. The gruesome stillness remained unbroken, and the faint hopes of the three men died out slowly as the time passed and the torches steadily burnt down.

CHAPTER VI.

The Pursuit.

Rhesus was light of foot and very agile, so Marcen did not perceive his presence. The door swung back, and he went on down the dark passage hurriedly, but in silence. As silently as his ghost Rhesus followed. In the open space where the torches were piled, and a dim light shone through the slit in the roof, Marcen eagerly raised the stone flag, and bending down, listened at the top of the narrow stair. Rhesus remained in the dense shade of the passage, watching, and presently saw him rise hastily, let down the flag, drag another and a heavier stone from a corner, and poise it on one edge over the secret door. A slight, muffled sound seemed to come from underneath—Hypatius and his friend returning, thought Rhesus—and hearing it, the traitor let fall the slab upon their only way of escape.

Proclus stepped into the boat.

The thunderous crash of its fall rang dismally in the gloomy place, like a knell of doom, and from under it came a low babel of voices and a stifled cry. Blows were struck desperately on the under side of the flag, it shook with their violence, but it rose not, and soon all was still. Then the traitor, thinking his first task well accomplished, laughed softly to himself, and turned towards the place where Rhesus stood. Not wishing to cross swords with such a skilful fencer—at least until he had set his friend free—the latter stepped back quietly towards the door, intending to regain the outer air before he was seen, and then return to undo the foul work.

But half-way up the passage his foot unluckily slipped upon a smooth stone, and when he recovered his balance, Marcen was almost upon him. Scarcely thinking what he was doing, he ran on swiftly, casting caution to the winds, and Marcen, fearing treachery equal to his own, in close pursuit. He reached and passed the pivoted door, but even as it closed after him, it swung out again, and Marcen sprang through the gap and came tearing after the other, mad with rage. A dagger flew past Rhesus' head as he gained the open street, missing him only by a finger's breadth, and looking over his shoulder as he dashed into a narrow alley that led to the lowest and most intricate parts of the city, he saw that his foe was only a dozen paces behind.

Rhesus held on, threading the mazy streets of that vile quarter with a wonderful dexterity, and as he ran began to think more clearly. It was not in his nature to turn his back on a solitary foe like this, but once having started he had given up all advantage; and if he would save his friend Proclus from a fearful fate, he saw that he must not put his life in undue peril. He saw clearly now that he had made a great mistake in not attacking Marcen unawares in the dark tunnel, where he could easily have overpowered him; but now the opportunity was lost he must go on.

He rounded corners, dashed through little passages, under black arches, and doubled often upon his track, yet he could not shake Marcen off, and at last, growing tired of the ignominious chase, turned at bay in a wider street and drew his sword.

Marcen came on furiously, his own blade drawn, desperate indeed, but ere their weapons could cross, a car rattled past going towards the hippodrome. The driver wore a green badge, and striking up his foe's sword with a sweeping slash of his own, Rhesus sprang into the chariot, shouted to the man to lay on the thong, and as they whirled away, cast back a mocking laugh at his enemy.

But Rhesus laughed prematurely. Marcen was not shaken off so soon. Life and untold wealth were at stake, and he had many friends, and an unrivalled knowledge of the gay city.

He ran on a little way, then disappeared into a small inn, and presently, from a street at right angles to the one he had left, another chariot came rolling in pursuit. Two men stood in the car, urging on the fresh steeds with thong and voice, and one of the two was Marcen—his green sash changed for a band of blue.

The dawn was already breaking glorious from the portals of the golden east, and as the two chariots tore on, the streets and houses lost their shades and shadows, taking shape and brightness from the sun, and the people began to stir about the city.

Rhesus and the other belaboured their horses unmercifully, shouted, swore, and entreated them by turns; yet though steam rose from them and the white froth flecked their mouths, the traitor gained steadily.

Half-way from the circus the road made a great bend, at the farther end of which were stables for horses of the green faction. Could they reach that and change steeds before Marcen came up, they would escape. Leaving a smoking trail of dust on the dry street, they sped madly round the curve, Pelak, the driver, bracing himself in readiness to pull the animals to their haunches.

Rhesus glanced back. The pursuers were thundering after them like the sirocco, Marcen standing erect with bow taut and arrow drawn ready to his ear. The dwellings lay back in dim gardens there, and as the first car approached the stables, the horses made a good target for the marksman across them. Rhesus saw the driver slacken speed a moment, saw the shaft released, and heard the shaft rustle past him, and in an instant one of his steeds was down, struggling and kicking, and the other atop. The car lurched over, hurling Pelak to the ground, and by the time Rhesus had extricated himself from the tangle of horse-hoofs and traces, and dragged him out of harm's way, Marcen had dashed past on the other side, stopped and turned again, and with sword drawn, was advancing upon them. Leaving Pelak to recover from his faint just within the wicket of a great garden, Rhesus drew his blade and stood on the defensive.

A crowd was gathering now. The ever-ready rioters and assassins of both factions were flocking to the scene like vultures to a field of carnage, and someone raised the rallying cry of "Nika!" The arrogant wearers of blue clustered behind Marcen, hailing him as a new recruit, and Rhesus was not without backers who urged him to punish the renegade.

Yet now the two stood face to face, each felt disinclined to act. Marcen, naturally, had the least reluctance, but preferred to leave Rhesus until he had discovered whether he alone knew of the plot or had accomplices. For the other part, Rhesus was so concerned about his friend left in the Hall of Waters that he was loth to risk his life or his liberty in a street brawl. And the wolves of prey who were facing each other with deadly intent on their grim faces, were the lowest kind of villains that even Constantinople could boast. A stone flung at Rhesus—happily missing him—broke the spell of hesitation, and the two factions were at each other's throats.

As though moved by a common impulse, both Marcen and Rhesus slunk back as the others met, and losing sight of his foe for a moment, the latter entered the garden where he had left Pelak. The driver was recovered now, though his head had received an ugly blow, and said they had better be going to the hippodrome on foot by some quieter way, if thither his friend was aiming, "or, if not," he added, "we can help cut up this blue rabble."

He was a tall, bony fellow, wiry as an Italian, with a pair of fine black eyes, and Rhesus remembered, now that he came to look at his face more closely, that he was one of the charioteers who had raced for the green the first day he had trotted the steeds round the red sand of the arena. He was kind-hearted and true to the party, and a sudden resolve took hold of Rhesus.

"I care for neither of these things, friend," he said; "but if you care to help me in another desperate venture, which may mean death or a fortune to me and a goodly guerdon to yourself in any case, I shall be glad of your company."

The lanky giant seized the other's arm, and said:

"I am with you, Rhesus, in whatever wild work you have afoot. By all the vows of the Church which you believe not in, I am your man. Is it agreed?"

"Yes," said Rhesus, and straightway told him as much as he thought needful for him to comprehend that a great treasure, known only to a few, was hidden in the Hall of Waters, and that Marcen had played them false. He listened eagerly and asked for more.

"Tell me," he said, "whose treasure it is, and who is imprisoned there? I am asking a great deal, I know, but you can trust me."

Rhesus looked at him again, and felt that he could; he told all he knew; and they prepared to make their way back to the convent. At all costs Proclus must be saved.

While they had been consulting, the fight had raged furiously, new-comers had joined in it, and several were slain, but as Rhesus and the other stepped through the wicket the noise ceased suddenly, and a troop of soldiers came riding along, followed by a gorgeous chariot in which no less a personage than the Empress sat. Some of the rioters dispersed at sight of the soldiers, and the others followed when Theodora, mounting the seat of her car, railed at them for disloyal subjects in her most cutting style. Two of the assassins, both of the green faction, were executed on the spot by her command.

She was no longer a comedian; she had become an imperial tigress, a cunning stateswoman, a worthy counterbalance to her husband's failings. Her crown and white robe, enfolded by the cloak of purple, became her handsome form and features well, and as, after making some fruitless inquiries, she passed on, Rhesus followed her with eyes of admiration—which admiration turned to wonder when he saw the car stop a moment as Marcen mounted beside her, and then roll on again, bearing the two away in eager converse.

Rhesus dragged him out of harm's way.

"I like not our friend's familiarity at all," said Pelak dubiously. "Our Empress is no ordinary woman, and has the threads of a dozen conspiracies in her hands at once, 'tis said. What if she and Marcen be in league over this treasure? It behoves us to hasten, Rhesus, if we would rescue the cynic; and it also behoves us to be cautious, for many doubtless know of the first chamber under the monastery, in which so many plots have been hatched."

They said no more, but quickened their steps, and going very carefully, knowing the lay of the streets well, at last came round the angle of the convent wall to the place where Hermiot had been left bound. He was not there, but scratched in the dust at the foot of the buttress was Rhesus' name. Obliterating the tell-tale writing with a sweep of his foot, Rhesus turned down the narrow way, and with Pelak behind, passed into the chamber underground.

It was tolerably light now, and Rhesus saw in a glance that the barrier stone had been removed and placed against the wall. With the help of Pelak he raised the lower slab feverishly. There was no one on the dark, slimy stairway; no sign of anyone. Rhesus went down a little way and shouted into the blackness with all the strength of his lungs. There came no response.—(To be continued.)

DEAR C.—Meet me at the "Cyclist's Rest" at 5.45 to-morrow. We can talk the matter over on our bikes.

Very affectionately.

ELSA.

Charles Tracey sat on an office stool and turned this little note in his fingers at the same time that he turned its import over in his mind. The junior clerk who sat near him could not resist an inquisitive impulse to look at Mr. Tracey's face, and he saw that Mr. Tracey was smiling satisfaction at himself; also, he saw that the little piece of paper was a feminine note, and he drew conclusions.

Tracey took another dive into the four lines of very modern feminine handwriting to refresh his memory as to the wording, and then he meditated again. It was, no doubt, an original way of answering his rather old-fashioned proposal, but her originality was always one of Elsa's great charms to this devoted lover. The idea of meeting a girl at a club house on purpose to discuss a proposal of marriage with her while taking a spin!

And then there was something so sensible in the phrase "talk the matter over." Elsa really was a very sensible girl—so sensible as to be all the more piquant for this quite extraordinary good sense of hers.

So Tracey smiled as he sat at his desk. Then he looked at his watch and resolved to go and have lunch. He put the watch into his waistcoat pocket, folded the little note, and looked for the envelope, from which he had somewhat precipitately torn it when Elsa's brother had put it into his hand a quarter of an hour before. There it was, a pink little envelope.

The clerk next to Mr. Tracey at this point indulged his curiosity once more. He saw Mr. Tracey look with a tender smile at the envelope; then he saw the smile fade, and observed that Mr. Tracey had turned pale.

Then Tracey took up the envelope and the note and reached for his straw hat. He walked out of the bank gazing at the address on the envelope, which was: "Miss Clara Henderson."

This inference was plain. That young brother of Elsa's—young Harry—had had two notes to deliver. He was, in his own conceit, a born messenger, and it delighted him to ride his cycle all over the city, leaving notes and messages. If there had been no note for Tracey the boy would not have stopped at the bank at all.

The wretched urchin had no doubt whirled into the Henderson home, as he had whirled into the bank, dashed down his (Tracey's) fate-fraught letter with a curt "Letter for Miss Clara. No answer," and then sped away to chalk up his last record in letter-carrying.

He ate no lunch worth mentioning, but sat and felt cold chills running about all over him. He knew Clara Henderson so well. If it had been anyone else but that feather-brained——

That afternoon a ring at the door bell of the Davis residence was soon followed by a sound as if half a hurricane had suddenly been let into the front hall. The rushing was mingled with laughter.

"Oh, I must see Miss Elsa. Tell her I'm coming up to her room."

In less than one minute Clara was at her friend's door, standing behind the servant who was supposed to be delivering her message.

"Elsa! Won't you let me in? I'm in a tremendous hurry, dear——"

"I'm so glad to see you, Clara. Couldn't you go to-morrow?"

"Go? Go where? Ha, ha! Ha, ha, ha! Elsa, don't be very angry. It wasn't my fault. I'm awfully sorry. Young Harry brought this for me, and it was meant for—for Mr. Tracey. Ha, ha, ha!"

"Clara! Did you open it?"

For answer, Clara held out a bulky packet, the flap of the envelope torn.

"I give you my word of honour, Elsa, I only read as far as, 'man can confer on a woman.' Then I nearly had a fit."

Elsa's face was a bright scarlet, but she retained her self-command. Clara saw that she was much upset, however.

"Don't you think you'd better put the letter in a fresh envelope and send it to him?" Clara asked, becoming very serious.

"My dear Clara," said Elsa, "I shall never speak to him again."

"Oh, don't say that, Elsa! Why won't you?"

"I shall never have a chance. I know that man too well. And you, of all people."

"Why me, of all people?"

"He's positively afraid of you. He thinks you the most formidable tease on earth, and he can't stand teasing."

"Then what do you think he'll do?"

"My own private belief," said Elsa, speaking very deliberately, "is that he will pack up and go to South Africa without saying a word to anybody."

The catch in her friend's voice as she spoke these last words brought a most unusually serious look to Clara Henderson's habitually joyous face.

"Elsa," she said, "give me that letter."

"What are you going to do with it? No, I can't, Clara. It will look like running after the man."

"Well, then, I'm off."

"What are you going to do?"

"I want my letter."

"Your letter?"

"Yes. You must have sent me some letter, or young Harry wouldn't have brought me Mr. Tracey's."

"But it doesn't matter. I can tell you now you're here. It was to meet me, about that picnic, you know."

"Never mind," said Clara. "I'm going to have my letter."

And she whirled away.

"Mr. Tracey," said the junior clerk, who was becoming really uneasy by this time, "a lady wishes to see you."

"Tell the lady I'm very busy."

The young clerk stared at what seemed to him the obvious untruth of the allegation, but nevertheless he took the message.

"Mr. Tracey, the lady says she has some very important business to settle with you, and will you please speak to her for two minutes."

"Who is the lady?"

"I know her face, but she didn't give me her name. She wears a brown velveteen dress."

"Fair hair done up in a coil?"

The young clerk nodded.

"Mr. Edwards," said Tracey, "I don't think I'm very well to-day."

"I noticed that you weren't looking well before you went to lunch."

"Mr. Edwards, I think I'll go home for to-day. My cycle is in the back corridor, I think. Please tell Mr. Glinn I'll be all right to-morrow."

He was speeding away on his machine a second later. He had been riding about ten minutes, and fancied that he was safe, when he heard a voice behind him that made him start.

"You must be very busy to-day, Mr. Tracey," a clear voice called aloud, "and very ill. Do you always ride like this when you are very busy—and ill?"

Physically, Tracey kept his balance, only turning to raise his hat; morally, he collapsed.

"Oh, Miss Henderson," he said, "how do you do? No, I'm not feeling very well to-day."

"Still, you're not ill enough to be in bed, are you? I should like to speak to you, if you don't mind, just for a minute. You have a letter of mine, I believe."

All this conversation was going on as they cycled side by side in a suburban thoroughfare.

"I? Oh, yes. I beg your pardon. I didn't mean to read it."

"That's of no consequence," said Clara. "But please give it to me. I want to see what Elsa says——"

"Hi! Hi!" came from behind the two. "I say! Can't you go when you are full on, Mr. Tracey!"

It was young Harry.

"Sister says I gave you the wrong letter, so I brought you this when I had done oiling up my machine."

Young Harry held out a letter to Tracey.

All three with one accord dismounted by the roadside.

"Please give me my letter," said Clara.

And Tracey, with smiles and nervous apologies, produced Elsa's little note from an inside pocket.

"Will you allow me?" he asked, as he took his own letter from Harry.

Clara nodded and turned her attention to her own little note. Harry stood wide-eyed while these two read.

"Sister changed her mind after you went, Miss Clara," he said.

It took Tracey a long time to even glance through his three sheets of upright caligraphy. Clara displayed the patience and self-restraint of a waiting angel.

At last she said. "Now it wasn't so very dreadful, after all, was it, Mr. Tracey?"

"Oh, no," said he. "Not at all. Harry, please tell your sister for me that I'll be round this evening."

"No," said Clara. "You hurry on home and tell your sister that I've caught Mr. Tracey and I'm going to bring him with me now." Then as Harry flew down a side street by way of making a short cut, she turned to Tracey and asked: "How do you feel now? Better?"

"Thanks," said Tracey. "I feel decidedly better now."

AN INVOLUNTARY ACCOMPLICE.

We were a party of Government surveyors of the British provinces now known as the Dominion of Canada, then under the governorship of Sir John Harvey.

Halifax had been our starting point, my brother, Captain Perry, being the leader of the surveying party which was to be the avant-coureur of the first railroad in the province of Nova Scotia. We were to startle the wild fowl in their greenwood, and do away with the usefulness of the stage coach for ever.

I had inflicted my presence on the party with a very scant show of welcome, even my favourite brother declaring that a woman would be dreadfully in the way. But I promised to take no luggage, to stop for an indefinite time whenever it pleased them to drop me by the way, and to ride rough shod with the rest of the party.

There were two others smuggled in who had no right to be there. One was an old army friend of Richard's, a subaltern from the Eighteenth Regiment of West India Hussars, and the other a college youth who was in bad health and wanted exercise.

We had been out a couple of weeks, when one night we rode into a camp of Indians and learnt that we were about eighteen or twenty miles from the nearest tavern, which was on the road to the next town, a pretty place named Truro.

We set off, but it was nearly eleven o'clock when we reached the little wooden inn called "The Queen's Arms." It was all lighted up, and we found there were two reasons for this. One was that the landlord was ill, and the other was the entertainment of a party of hunters, one of whom was Frank Harvey, Sir John's wild son.

We hastened to pay our respects to him and his party as they were just leaving. They had killed a fine bear the night before, on the very road over which we had just passed, and had dined off fresh bear steak.

They rode away and we entered the inn and ordered supper, which was served after some waiting.

As soon as we had finished, the men followed Richard to the bar-room, there to smoke their pipes and drink a modicum of spirits, and I went upstairs to the room allotted to me. I was quite ready to retire, being conscious of a pleasurable sense of fatigue. But before I could reach my room the most inexplicable circumstance of my life happened.

There was a dim lamp burning on a table in the passage, evidently left there to light my way upstairs, and on the upper landing the light shone from an open door, which was possibly intended for the same purpose.

As I passed, the most piercing groans, cries, and blasphemous execrations issued from this room. What impelled me to stop, and finally to enter and offer the sick man, for it was he, my assistance, I can never know. Enough that I did so, and never ceased to regret it.

"Marie! Marie!" he was calling fiercely between oaths and cries; "Oh, Heaven, I die! I die! and nobody will help me! Oh, Marie! Maledictions on her!"

"Can I help you? Shall I call some one?" I asked, stepping just inside the door where the sick man could see me. "Are you in great pain?"

He looked at me with such a wolfish glare that I retreated a step towards the door.

Then he said fiercely:

"I know you not, but give me quick the bottle—no, no, that one on the shelf. Ah, mees, thanks—you are good!"

For I had hurriedly crossed the room, seized the bottle which he pointed out and handed it to him.

He was certainly a pitiable object. His head was wrapped in white linen bandages, and this, added to his ghastly pallor, made him look as if already dead. He was emaciated, and the lower part of his face was covered with a stubby growth of beard. As I gave him the bottle he said woefully:

"They let me here lie and nobody come! Oh, I so sell! An' they glad me die—she, the wretch—Marie."

I got out of the room as quickly as possible. The fact was that I knew nothing at all of sickness and had been brought up with habits of prompt obedience. Had he commanded me to find Marie for him I should have gone at once. I concluded that she was his wife, but I had seen no other woman than the slattern who set the table. Not knowing what whim he might take next, I hurried abruptly away and locked myself in my own room.

The room was filled with sunlight when I was awakened by my brother's knock.

"Hurry your dressing," he called in a low voice; "we must ride to Truro for breakfast."

"I will be ready," I returned, wondering why we were not to breakfast where we had supped.

When I came down ready for the saddle, I noticed that the door of the sick room was closed. I saw men talking in groups and everybody looked serious.

"What has happened, Richard?" I asked.

"The landlord is dead."

I was not surprised. He had looked very bad, but I felt a shudder at the thought that I had seen him, and that the great mystery had come so near me while I slept.

I did not tell my brother of the service I had rendered the sick man. I do not know why, for it was on the tip of my tongue. It might have been that I had a vague idea that he would not have approved of it. But as soon as we were off I asked if the man had died suddenly.

"He killed himself," was the answer.

"What! Impossible! How could a man so ill as he was manage to kill himself?" I asked, astonished.

"It seems that he was left alone," said the subaltern; "his wife was at the bar—a pretty wench, on my soul. There was a fellow hulking round that was sweet on her, and the sick man, who hadn't set his foot on the floor for six weeks, got up and took a bottle of laudanum off a shelf in the room and drank it every drop."

My brother must have seen my lips whitening, for he said sternly:

"There! No hysterics. We've had enough of the fellow. Let's talk of more cheerful subjects."

And he touched his own horse and mine with the whip, and we went off at a hard gallop and further talk was impossible.

Oh, the misery that I suffered in silence and alone, for I could not tell Richard of that fatal visit, that it was I who put the weapon of death into the man's nerveless hand, that in my blind stupidity I had not looked at the bottle, or even stopped to give the sick man the medicine, as a child might have done. Oh, the anguish that my ignorance cost me then, and long after, until I was satisfied in my own mind that the poor wretch had only anticipated death by a few hours.

It will be supposed that this was the end of the affair, but the most tragic part was yet to come.

My brother made a trip into a depth of woods by a circuitous route, and on this occasion I waited for him at a farm-house a day and night. At the close of the second day—it was the third one following the event I have just related—he joined me and we rode down the hills, intending to take the main road and return to Truro.

It was a dark, moonless night. I was in depressed spirits, and as the rest of the party talked and laughed or sang songs, I became more and more gloomy, thinking of the strange share I had taken in that man's death, which seemed as real to me as if I had voluntarily poisoned him.

We were descending a long hill, and as we neared the bottom we saw lights gleaming and heard voices. Then we saw a company of men carrying something between them. As they monopolised the road, my brother called a halt, and we waited to see who or what they were. Then we saw that they were carrying a rude coffin and that some of them were digging a grave.

"It must be a murder," said the subaltern, in a whisper, that no word might attract their attention.

It was certainly a weird performance, and I became so interested that I forgot to be frightened. The lights moving about looked fantastic; the dark figures of the men, outlined distinct and clear against the dark forest; that long, fearful box on the greensward—all looked like the moving spectacle of a dream.

It was soon over, and I expected that the men would go. But no. A sapling that grew near was cut down and the men began to shape one end of it.

"They intend to mark the spot, I declare," said the subaltern.

"Be quiet," said Richard, lifting a warning finger as our men pressed impatiently forward. Those men must have known that we were there, for several times our horses had neighed impatiently, but they took no notice of us, and there was something in that unusual and lawless proceeding that few would care to intrude upon.

Suddenly Richard said aloud: "I understand it all now."

"What is it? Who are they burying?" I asked.

"Wait," said my brother; "they will soon be gone, then I will tell you."

One man now took the sapling, which was shaped into a stake with one sharp end, and held it in what seemed to be the centre of that spot of new-made earth. Now the other one gave it a great blow. This he followed up by a second and a third. Then a fearful sound of rending wood was heard.

"Begorra, they've driven it straight through the body!" said the subaltern in a horror-stricken voice.

"It's an old custom; I've seen it before this," spoke up one of the men. "Did ye naught hear tell, captain, of buryin' a man that kills himself at the cross roads at the dark of the moon and drivin' of a stake through his heart?"

"I know!" exclaimed the subaltern suddenly; "it's that fellow of the 'Queen's Arms.' I never suspected it till now."

"Yes," said Richard. "I guessed as much. But I thought that barbarous practice had died out. Who knows that the poor wretch intended to kill himself? He may have only tried to ease his pain."

I clung to the warm neck of my horse and held myself together with a desperate clutch. The scene would have been frightful under any circumstances, but at that hour, and to me with my horrible secret, it was a ghastly picture. To add to its grotesque horror I heard the man who had explained the custom singing some horrible verses in an undertone to the college lad, every line of which burnt into my memory.

As this dismal ceremony ended, Richard spoke to me.

"I remember hearing of this old custom," he said, "but never expected to see it. Are you shivering? It is a rough spectacle, isn't it? I expect, little woman, you wish you had stayed at home."

Ah, did I not wish it? But assuming a bravado I did not feel, I assured him that I was all right, and began to prepare myself for another ordeal, that of passing the new-made grave which lay directly in our route.

The men were gone now, and their lantern lights were grown pale in the shadows as they hurried away from their dismal work. When they were gone we started up our horses, which were restless and impatient to be off. I braced myself for a final effort. I must pass that accursed spot.

We galloped down the rest of the hill, and at the foot, Kitty, my sure-footed, dauntless mare, was seized with a fit of trembling, and stopped so suddenly she nearly threw me over her head. I kept my seat with difficulty, and as no one had noticed me they went on without me, and I was left alone by the side, the very edge of that awful spot.

My heart seemed to melt within me.

"Grâce à Dieu!" I called out in the extremity of terror.

A provincial malediction turned to a blessing on my lips. The mare ceased to tremble, and gathering her limbs she made one mighty leap that carried me into the midst of the party, which had not missed me.

It all happened many years ago, and until now I have kept my own counsel, and I leave it to intelligent readers to judge if I was not an innocent and unconcious accessory to a crime.

A Little Heroine.

It was sunset in Santa Rosalia. The rainy season was on in Cuba, and low, rumbling thunder had been heard all the afternoon. That is, the people who lived in the little cluster of palm-thatched houses called Santa Rosalia thought it was thunder. And so it was—the distant roar of Spanish artillery that came up from the south.

One little cottage stood by the road-side, some distance apart from the others. It was the home of the Lazcanos.

The father, José, was dead. He had fallen a victim to the last, the "Ten Years'" War. Three sons were left to carry on the fight, and they were then with Brigadier Lopez Recio.

Only the mother and Maria, the sister, a little girl of twelve years, were left at home to watch and pray to God to aid the Cubans in their struggle for liberty.

Suddenly the noise of clattering hoofs came from the south-west. The still night air bore the unmistakable sound with distinctness. In an instant every head was at the open door.

Nearer and nearer came the galloping rider. He was alone. His horse was covered with foam, and panting like a tired hound. Up to the little gate of the Lazcano cottage he staggered, and then his rider reeled and almost fell into the arms of his mother.

"Merciful Heaven! Enrique, you are wounded, my boy——"

"It is no matter; I can still ride. The battle of Saratoga is raging. I am on my way to Colonel Pena. He does not know of it. We need him and his cavalry. Help me to a fresh horse and I'll catch Pena at Santa Lucia to-night. I must—"

The poor fellow never finished the sentence. He had fainted. The arms of tender women bore him into the house.

Poor little Maria followed, the tears streaming from her eyes. She watched them draw off the riding boots filled with her brother's blood. She brought water to moisten his parched lips. She saw the ugly wound in his hip and murmured through her gritting teeth:

"Bad Spaniards! Bad Spaniards! They will kill us all yet!"

And then her brother's eyes opened. The cold water had revived him. He tried to move, but only groaned in agony. Once more he strove to rise.

"Mother, some one, help me to my feet. I must go on—I must go on. I have ridden many miles since morning. There are only ten more to Santa Lucia and to Pena. We must have him."

And with a mighty effort he rose to his feet. Then he wavered, tears of helplessness came into his eyes, and he sank back on the bed with a sob of anguish.

"To think that I should go so near to the end of my journey and then fail!"

"How were you wounded, my boy?"

"'Twas near El Desmayo—late this afternoon. I had changed horses at La Vinda an hour before. Suddenly I ran into a body of Spanish guerrillas from San Miguel. I could not fight them, there were too many, so I took up a ravine towards Isidro. They fired five volleys after me and gave chase. They knew I was on an important mission.

"My horse was fleet and strong and I got away, but carried with me one of their rifle balls. I tore off parts of my sleeve and roughly bound up the wound, but it still bled. I'm better now; I'm rested! I'll go on."

And again he tried to get on his feet.

"Enrique, my boy, it is impossible, you are weak. You cannot ride; the motion of the horse will cause you to bleed to death. Guido must go. Maria, tell him to saddle a fresh horse and get ready to ride to Santa Lucia."

Maria started towards the door, but her brother raised his hand in protest.

"Guido is only half-witted. He might start for Santa Lucia, but he would never find his way in the dark. Even if he reached the place he would forget whom he wanted to see."

"But there is no other in Rosalia," pleaded the mother.

"True! Therefore, I must go, wound or no wound. Maria, tell Guido to saddle a horse and bring it to the gate quickly. We are losing time."

"Brother, we can't let you go. I'll never see you again," and the poor child buried her head on her brother's neck. Then, suddenly rising, she exclaimed:

"Oh, why was I not a man? Cuba so needs men! Yes, I'll tell him to get the horse ready at once. Colonel Pena must go to help Gomez."

Turning, she kissed her brother's forehead and hurried out to the stables. Soon the quick gallop of a horse was heard approaching the house. But it did not stop at the gate. On it sped in the direction of Santa Lucia.

A moment later Guido, the half-witted black boy, wandered aimlessly into the room.

"Where is the horse, where is Maria?" inquired her brother.

"Gone!" replied the boy.

"Gone! Where?" exclaimed everyone in the room.

"I don't know. She said something about Santa Lucia, jumped on the horse's back, and it seems to me she's gone."

And so she was; the brave little girl, although not a soldier of Cuba, had taken her brother's place. She had gone to Pena, to tell him that the fight between Gomez and the Spanish general Castellens was raging at Saratoga, and that every Cuban in Camaguey was needed.

On the little heroine rode, in the darkness of the night. She had been born and brought up in the country, and she knew the way to Santa Lucia, although she had never before travelled in the dark. But she was riding to save Cuba. Darkness, danger, nothing daunted her. Bareheaded and alone, she urged her horse over the road at a pace which would have made most girls tremble with fear.

Not even when the tropical storm broke in all its fury about her did she hesitate. Lightning striking the tall "palma reals" made the horse shy many times and almost bolt along the road, but the brave little rider held on and never loosened rein until in sight of Pena's camp-fires.

"Who goes there?" suddenly called out the picket.

"Cuba!" answered the brave little patriot. She reined up her panting steed.

"Advance!" ordered the guard, and Maria, pale wet and dripping, rode forward.

"Caramba! It is a child. Who are you? What do you want?"

"I am Maria Lazcano. I want to tell Colonel Pena that there is a battle at Saratoga. General Gomez has only 530 men against over 2,000 Spaniards, and he needs help."

A few minutes later, almost fainting with fatigue and nervous strain, she was borne to the presence of Pena.

"Dios mio!" he exclaimed, as he listened to her story, and then gave the signal for his command to mount.

"You poor little thing, you should be in bed and asleep."

Wrapping his coat round her little, trembling, wet form, he sprang into his saddle and had an officer pass the child up to him. The order was given to march, and in his arms the fighting colonel of Camaguey carried the little heroine back to her home in Rosalia.

"Take her," he said, as he handed her over to her half-crazed mother. "She brought us the news. I'll speak of her to General Gomez. She deserves the rank of a major-general. She has saved her brother's life, and her brave deed may win the day at Saratoga."

BETWEEN TWO STOOLS.

"This," said Mrs. Brierly, "this is the last time, Martha Wilkin, the very last time. I've spent enough upon you since your mother died, and I took charge of you, to marry six girls who had their senses about them. I've dressed you and I've let you go into company, and here you are, four-and-twenty, and not so much as engaged.

"It's perfectly annoying, and what I have to say is, if you don't settle your affairs this summer I'll give you no more chances. I expect to die in the workhouse as it is. Why, I was married at seventeen and your mother at eighteen! What's the use of advantages—and you have looks, Martha—if you don't make use of them?"

"I'm sure I don't know what you expect me to do. I can't very well propose to anyone," said poor Martha, ready to cry. "I do everything I can, and they make love to me, and they say all sorts of things. If they don't pop the question, how can I make them? There now, I suppose you waited until Uncle Brierly asked you to have him before you said you would?"

"Your uncle would have committed suicide if I had refused him," said Mrs. Brierly. "You may not believe it now, but I was a beauty in my youth. As for what you can do, you ought to know; but what I say is this: Come home engaged or I stop all this useless extravagance!"

With which speech she inflicted on her niece's cheek a lukewarm kiss, and bade her good-bye.

Aunt Brierly was a good business woman, and would not be likely to spend any more money on an unsaleable article, and Martha shivered at the prospect before her, if this summer's campaign should prove a failure.

On the whole she looked so ill when she arrived at Blackpool that her mirror told her that her best plan would be to retire early and take as much beauty sleep as possible, in view of any eligible gentlemen who might put in an appearance next day.

Fresh as a rose and dressed in her most becoming morning dress, Martha took her seat at the breakfast table next morning, and nestled close to Mrs. Newman, her relative and chaperon, in the most bewitching manner.

That lady, an ample matron with a loud voice, greeted her affectionately, and at once introduced her to two gentlemen who were her neighbours.

"Mr. Holt, Miss Wilkin; Miss Wilkin, Mr. Downhill. All old friends of mine. Charmed to make you acquainted with each other," and then devoted herself to breakfast, and left those who preferred it to waste time on conversation.

And so Miss Wilkin, having the field to herself, made eyes at both her new acquaintances, and shrewdly noted, amid her infantile gigglings, that both were smitten.

They were of the age, or rather of the ages, at which the heart is most susceptible to Cupid's arrows. Edmund Holt was a youth of twenty, and James Downhill was at least sixty-five.

Never before had young Mr. Holt had such bewitching attention offered him. And as for old Mr. Downhill, his memory brought back some dove-like glances, such as those Miss Wilkin showered upon him, from the long-vanished years of his youth.

To cut a long story short, Miss Wilkin, having discovered that Mr. Holt was very rich and an orphan, and that Mr. Downhill was a very wealthy bachelor, at once set her cap for both gentlemen, resolving to accept the one who proposed first. She loved neither.

A girl of her views, who had made a rush into the matrimonial market with but one stipulation—that the man she married should have money—was scarcely likely to have a heart. A husband meant to her easy circumstances, freedom from her Aunt Brierly's incessant "nagging," liberty to flirt as much as she chose with ineligibles, who were often very interesting, and freedom from the dread of being an old maid.

Mrs. Newman, who was, on the whole, a good-natured woman, willing to see her friends well settled, furthered the little affair to the best of her ability. There were walks, rides, drives, chatting in cosy corners, and at last a proposal.

It came from Mr. Holt. Youth is hasty. Age is slow. Mr. Downhill was just making up his mind to do it, when Mr. Holt did it. And Miss Wilkin said "yes," and would have fallen into his arms but that they were in full sight of an old lady who had just directed her opera glass full at them from a window.

"Yes," Martha had answered, and young Holt blushed rosy red.

And afterwards, when they had had dinner, Martha locked herself in her room and wrote to her Aunt Brierly. Her letter ended thus:

"So you see I'm engaged, and you can't tease me any longer. I don't suppose poor Holt will ever set the river on fire, but he's a good-natured fellow, and I can twist him round my finger."

Mrs. Brierly signified her approval by return of post and Martha's mind was at rest. It did not trouble her much that in less than a week a telegram summoned Holt to town. She could use the fast-fading days of freedom better without an engaged lover at her side, and she certainly made the most of them.

She plunged into flirtation in a way that frightened even Mrs. Newman, and was happier than she had ever been since her search for a husband commenced. As for poor Mr. Downhill, she quite snubbed him, now that she had no views concerning him.

Meanwhile the absent Holt wrote love letters, and she answered them.

Poor Martha! Life is certainly full of ups and downs.

One morning Mrs. Newman opened a London paper and, having glanced down the column of marriages and deaths, gave a faint shriek and looked at Martha in a terrified way. The latter snatched the paper and saw this:

"Suddenly, on the 9th, Edmund Holt."

Edmund Holt—there was no doubt of it. Mrs. Newman looked at Martha expecting to see her faint. To her surprise, the young lady, though very serious, was quite calm.

"Poor fellow," she said; "I'm very sorry. Do be quiet, dear Mrs. Newman! Don't let's have a scene. No one knows we were engaged, and you need not tell them. I don't want my season spoilt."

Then she rose and went to her room, cried a little, bathed her face, and went downstairs to charm Mr. Downhill by beaming upon him and asking him how he could be so dreadful and neglect her so.

His memory brought back some dove-like glances such as those Miss Wilkin showered upon him.

In a word, now that the old love was gone, she "took up with the new," and in a week Mr. Downhill had proposed and was accepted.

And the estimable Mrs. Brierly received an account of the situation which greatly surprised her.

Old Mr. Downhill was rather more obstinate than ever Mr. Holt had been. He asserted his rights, and insisted upon the open wearing of the engagement ring.

There was no more flirtation for Miss Wilkin, and everyone knew what had occurred. She wore a valuable diamond ring on her finger, and was guarded by her old beau from morning until night. He even wrote her several notes between their parting at night and meeting at nine in the morning, and in one of them he referred to her flirtation with young Holt.

Miss Wilkin was one of those unlucky victims to love of letter writing who can never resist putting things down in black and white. She wrote this sentence in her reply:

"You naughty, naughty goose! How could I care for a stripling like that? Poor fellow! he was very nice; but only a boy, you know."

And when she had written it she thought how much jollier it was to run about with him than to sit in a corner with old Mr. Downhill, who was always afraid of catching cold, and who would not let her dance because he could not. Still he was rich, and she was engaged at last.

One evening she strolled down the parade with her betrothed, leaning on his arm in the most confiding manner. The evening train was in, and people were waiting for the newcomers.

As the vehicles rattled past someone was seen waving a white handkerchief. A young man with very red cheeks—and then someone called out:

"Why it's Holt, alive and well!"

As the fly pulled up and he sprang out of the vehicle, they rushed toward him to shake hands and tell him that he had been supposed dead.

"Death in the paper, you know, old fellah," said one exquisite. "Weally vewy cuyous how death could be in the papaw when you weren't dead, you know."

"It was poor grandfather. I was named after him, you know. I never thought what people would think. I——"

Then he turned pale, fearing that the awful news had killed his poor Martha.

Miss Wilkin had seen him and had dragged Downhill away; she was really quite faint.

Downhill hurried her back to the house, not quite knowing what was wrong, for he had not noticed Holt. At her own request he left her alone in the drawing-room; she knew what must come.

A few minutes later Holt rushed in.

"My darling!" he exclaimed. "Did you think I was dead?"

"Yes—I—did!" gasped Martha.

He bent over her and caught her hands and pressed them to his lips.

"Oh, I couldn't die and leave you," he said. "I——"

But here a hand came down upon his shoulder and a thin voice breathed in his ear:

"Young man, I am very glad to see you restored, as it were, from the grave, but I can't allow such liberties with the lady who is going to marry me."

Mr. Downhill had returned unexpectedly.

Martha, not knowing what to do, took refuge in tears and silence. The gentlemen grew furious, and finally walked away with each other, with "pistols for two and coffee for four" in their faces.

But this was eighteen hundred and ninety-seven, and much is thought of documentary evidence. In a retired spot, where they could not be overheard, the hapless Martha's letters were produced. Poor little Holt read with the bitter agony of youth the woman's denial of her love for and engagement with him, written a week after his supposed death, and old Downhill gave a groan over another buried hope, as he read some lines written to Holt, in which he was set down as a superannuated creature only taken notice of out of pity.

After this the two gentlemen shook hands. They had no quarrel with each other, now. Neither of them wanted to marry Martha Wilkin. She received two little notes that evening telling her so.

That was last summer. This year Martha is not going away for a holiday.

Mrs. Brierly having dismissed her housemaid, for reasons that were clearly her own, it is a matter of wonder to the neighbours who the person who now cleans the windows can be.

It is barely possible that this is Martha. Mrs. Brierly is a woman of her word, and she considers her niece's chance of matrimony quite over.

HIS OWN STORY.

"HALLO, Marsden! I declare I didn't see you!"

Vickery had stumbled upon an elderly man seated in an arm-chair at the farthest window of the club room, which he had thought was empty.

"Who is it?" asked Marsden lazily. "Oh, how do, Vick? Where've you fallen from? Come, sit down and have some of this. It's innocent—claret and vichy. I say, isn't it hot!"

"As it happens," said Vickery, dropping into the seat on the other side of the small table, "you're the very man I wanted to see. I want to ask your help on behalf of a young fellow who——"

"Ah!"

The elderly man put down the glass that had been at his lips; and the interruption seemed a little peevish. With singular inappositeness he went on in a drawling voice:

"I was just thinking when you came up, Vick. Something I don't often do this sort of weather. I've been watching two beggars—one blind, the other lame. They've picked up some money from charitable people, but I believe they are frauds."

Vickery bridled a trifle.

"You misunderstand me," he said, "if you think I am asking you for pecuniary assistance. Nothing of the kind."

The elderly man smiled, and Vickery continued: "I've a reason for asking your assistance—your influence. Would you—er—is it too hot for you to listen to a little story? I'm going round presently to see this young man, and——"

"You want candour, Vick? Of course. Well, to be absolutely truthful, stories, and especially little ones, send me to sleep. You won't mind? Yes, I'd like to hear it."

Vickery looked annoyed as he leant back.

"Oh, it doesn't amount to anything," he said carelessly. "It wouldn't interest you."

Marsden leant forward; and there was light enough to show that his face had grown suddenly sober.

"Vickery," he said, "you misunderstand me. There's nobody in the world more serious than I am at all times. If it's beneath the surface, I'm only glad that I hide it so well. I'm not a very old man, Vickery; to be explicit, I'm fifty-seven; but I've had—oh—troubles that make me feel seventy. Some time, if you care to hear, I'll tell you my story—though Heaven knows it's one I've no reason for wishing to tell. No, my friend, you don't know me—nobody does; and if I'm commonly jovial and careless, it's because I hate to be otherwise, and have a terror of being a wet blanket." Brightening all at once, he added: "Come, the story."

Vickery lighted his cigar procrastinatingly.

"If you really care to hear it," he began slowly, "I'll make it short. I'm much interested in the young man, and I knew you could do so much if you would.

"This young fellow is ill and poor, and out of work, and that sort of thing; and that's the reason I'm down here. Miller his name is—or, rather, that's what he call's himself; there's reason for believing it assumed, as you'll see presently. Anyhow, he's the son of a rich father, a college man, and has been well brought up.

"Well, while he was at college, he was taken with typhoid and brought home. For several weeks he lay next door to death, then, at the crisis, took a sudden turn for the better and got well. So far so good.

"During his illness a trained nurse had been engaged for him. He believes that her extraordinary care pulled him through. What he believes is, of course, only of moment in the light of subsequent events. The upshot of it was that no sooner did he get out of bed than he married her—secretly. You've heard of that sort of thing before, eh?

"Well, of course it's quite in order to put more than half the blame—if blame there is—on the woman. It's quite possible to bring in her undue influence, her insinuation into his affections, and so on. I believe it's generally done, but in this particular case I happen to know it was otherwise.

"That part of it is immaterial, however; the point is, they got married. And when the family heard of it there was a pretty state of affairs. No sensible man would blame them for feeling cut up about it, when he was an only son and there were daughters; but young

Miller—he was barely twenty, I believe—young Miller, boyishly, did not take kindly to the things that were said, and he and his father quarrelled. If I conjecture rightly, the old man ordered him out of the house. At any rate, there was a bother.

"The young woman he married, mind you, was about as well born and well educated as his own sisters; I can venture that because I know her. She was very young, too, but she was sensible. When she realised what the marriage had cost him, she was also self-sacrificing enough to want him to leave her and return to his family.

"And that's one thing I like about the boy. I'm not sure the words were used, of course, but I can very well imagine him to have said: 'I live or die with my wife.' H'm—on second thought, he wouldn't have been so theatrical, but in any case that's what he meant.

"Well, the young pair, with perhaps money enough in hand to keep them a month, got a little furnished room in some out-of-the-way region of the East-end and began housekeeping. The wife could have earned pretty fair wages, probably, and the young man little or nothing. One was practical, the other had a rudimentary education in the classics, which was for the moment a burden to him. But of course he could not let his wife work. The consequence was that in a very short time they were nearly starving.

"You see, so far, everything was going on quite like a book. Starvation came nearer. What with low diet, or no diet, and fruitless wandering about the streets in search of employment, young Miller was soon in bed again. Affairs were now at a grand crisis. Here was a sick husband in the house, no money, no friends, nothing. What was to be done?

"If it were still going on like the book there would have been a providential visitation of the family, eager for reconciliation, a few tears and other properties, and the curtain would have fallen happily. Or, perhaps, the girl wife would have gone to the obdurate parents—obdurate's the word, isn't it?—on her knees, and accomplished a like result by the force of her beauty. But nothing of the kind happened.

"What was to be done? Well, sir, that girl knew. She had to nurse her husband, you see, and she had to make some money. The doing of one or the other would have been nothing to her, but she had to do both. Without hesitating a moment she had her husband taken to a private hospital, where she was known, and obtained a nurse's place in the same establishment, her services being accepted as payment for her husband's maintenance.

"It was for several weeks. Then, as soon as he was able to be out again, young Miller began to fret about his wife's working—she had retained her place, you understand. But what else was there to do? The girl was sensible, of course, and the boy was sensible, too, only it cut him deep to let things go on that way. And at last he got a place. Yes, as a messenger and porter! But the pay was dreadful!

"But I managed to get him a situation with a friend of mine, where he earned thirty-five shillings a week, and he insisted that his wife should give up her work. But she said she wouldn't; they could begin to put something by in the bank, she said. And for six months or so she didn't give up. Then she had to."

Vickery paused to strike a match to re-light his cigar. By the flickering blaze he saw that his friend lay back in his chair, with closed eyes. He asked contritely:

"Do I bore you, Marsden?"

"Not at all, Vick. Quite—ah—quite interested."

"Well, as I was saying—the baby. That, of course, settled the question. The girl had to give up her place. They had saved a little money, and everything was going along smoothly. They were happy and contented.

"But one day little Mrs. Miller—pretty little thing, too! blue eyes, yellow hair, peachy cheeks—well, little Mrs. Miller came in to see me. She knew I'd done something for her husband. I can remember her visit just as if it were yesterday. Her big blue eyes wore a wondering look, and her face was whiter than your handkerchief.

"'Pardon me,' said the little woman, 'but I was just passing by, and I thought I'd call to see if you could tell me where I can find my husband—at—at this time of day.' (She stammered like that.) 'I know so little about the city,' she said. Do you see, she was 'just passing by'—eh?

"I looked at her a moment, surprised, I dare say, and asked if he wasn't at the place where he worked. She looked past me, and said she'd just been there, and he wasn't in.

"'Sit down a minute, Mrs. Miller,' I said; 'I want to talk to you.' I began to suspect something wrong, you see. She sat down, and looked at me steadily with those big eyes.

"'Mrs. Miller,' I said—I felt there was no use beating about the bush—'you haven't seen your husband this morning?'

"She merely looked frightened, and gave a little gasp.

"'He didn't come home last night?' I went on probing as gently as I could.

"Without answering directly, she cried: 'Oh, do you think anything could have happened to him?'

"The whole thing was clear as daylight. I knew in one instant exactly what had happened: young Miller had fought it out as long as he could, had been approached by his relatives, and had deserted his wife.

"The conclusion wasn't logic, however, but impulse; he was a young fellow of strong enough character, but I was aware, from what they had both let drop, that he had been an affectionate son and brother, and I threw into the balance the many influences which might naturally be counted as being brought to work upon him.

"As I say, that conclusion struck me instantly. And the heart-rending part of it was this: the little deserted wife divined exactly what was passing through my head.

"'Oh, not that!' she cried. 'You are mistaken!' Then, abashed and conscience-stricken at having bared her mind, she corrected herself, 'I mean something must have happened to my husband—some accident——'

"It was painful, sir, to see that little woman beating about for a plausible excuse. I saw I'd hurt her feelings, and tried to make it better by saying: 'I sincerely hope nothing has happened to your husband, Mrs. Miller. Upon the whole I think it's very unlikely—that is, anything serious. Have you made inquiries of the authorities?—but wait,' I interrupted myself when I saw her lips begin to quiver—'of course, it's too soon to think of that; he's doubtless merely been delayed somewhere.'

"And then I went on to give her what comfort I could, which was, of course, none at all.

"I went myself, just as soon as she was gone, to police headquarters, and had word sent to the hospitals and to the station-houses; but at none of them had he been heard of.

"In a day or two I put advertisements in the papers, calling upon him by his initials, and also left his description with detectives; the result was the same.

"I congratulated myself lugubriously on my intuition; he had certainly been bribed to go home. With even as little as I then knew of him, I had been trying to persuade myself that the going was merely the opening wedge of a general reconciliation; but that seemed now a false hope.

"As I have said, I doubt whether Miller is his right name. Had I known it, it would have been easy, or at least easier, to trace him. His wife knew, of course, because they were married in his right name, and merely assumed the other to avoid any pursuit by his family; but I believe she'd have stood the rack sooner than appeal to him, or to his people, deserted as she was.

"Well, at the end of a week, Mrs. Miller came in again. I had seen her at intervals since her husband's disappearance, and always she had appeared hopeful, even confident. I say appeared; what she really thought, of course, I don't know, but I honestly believe she never for an instant doubted him. I believe that truly, incomprehensible as it may seem in the light of the probabilities of the case.

"Well, Mrs. Miller came in, her face all rosy and the big blue eyes brilliant.

"'My husband!' she panted, before I could get out a word.

"'Yes, Mrs. Miller,' I said.

"'He is safe!'

"'I am very glad to hear it!' I said heartily. 'Where——'

"'I thought I'd come and tell you,' she interrupted, blushing and diffident; 'you've been so kind.'

"It seems that he had been attacked by some ruffians, who may have thought that he had some of the firm's money on him. He was found unconscious, and taken to a hospital, where he remained for a week before he really recovered full consciousness. In his semi-lucid intervals, they had not been able to get anything out of him.

"How was it that my inquiries led to nothing? Goodness knows! That is one of those things which cannot be explained.

"That was nearly three months ago. He lost his situation and they are nearly starving, for he has only picked up odd jobs.

"On Monday I had a letter from him. He is after a place with a good salary in the office of an engineering company. I am sure he could fill the post well, but he has no influence, and you know how those things go.

"And that's what I came for—to see if I couldn't help him. Marsden, I believe you're a director of that very company. I want the use of your name." Vickery pulled out his watch, and added: "It's getting late. I'm going round to see them, and haven't time to talk now. But to-morrow, if you don't mind——"

Marsden leant forward to look out of the window.

"H'm; beautiful night, isn't it?" he remarked. "Seems cooler out, too. Er—suppose I walk over with you? Like a business man, I'm cautious. If I'm to do anything for these people you've been talking about——"

"With all my heart," answered Vickery. "I'd like you to see them, and talk with them. We'll have a hansom. Besides, you look rather knocked up. My story—eh? No, but seriously, you ought to get out of town; this weather's enough to kill a man."

The cab took them to the East end. They alighted in a very poor neighbourhood, in front of a dilapidated house.

Vickery led the way through the open door, and up a steep flight of stairs. The younger man stopped before a door and knocked.

"I think this is the place," he said.

It was a minute before the door opened; and then a woman with a baby in her arms stood before him. Her cheeks grew rosy, her eyes kindled.

"Oh, Mr. Vickery!" she cried, "Henry's got the place! He——"

She broke off abruptly and reddened even more when she saw the other man behind.

Marsden brushed past his friend and the young woman. In a corner he had seen a rough couch, and upon it, hollow-cheeked and feverish-eyed, a youth. He crossed the room rapidly and sank to his knees beside it. There were some incoherent cries.

The young woman looked upon the scene for an instant, then turned her blue eyes wonderingly upon Vickery. The infant in her arms, with eyes just as blue and infinitely more wondering, looked at him also.

For a moment there was neither sound or movement in the room. Then the child, frightened doubtless at the foolish blankness of Vickery's face, began to cry.

In another moment Marsden had risen and come back to the door. He put out his hand to the woman. Then he turned to confront his astonished companion, who had become rooted to the spot.

Marsden mopped his forehead savagely with his handkerchief; then, with two wet lines down his plump cheeks, he tried to speak. An instant his lips moved mutely; but at last he blubbered:

"Oh, bother it, man! Can't you—can't you see you were telling me my story?"

THE TOUR OF THE FOUR.

It was Saturday afternoon, and I was on my way, in an omnibus, to make a long-delayed call upon a distant aunt—no favourite of mine—who, I knew, must be pining for my society. I had taken the only vacant seat, opposite a very pretty girl who held a huge box in her lap, while another occupied the space beside her.

She had cast a quick glance at me when I entered, as if she thought she knew me, and, indeed, there was something familiar about her own face; but I was at a loss to recall it.

She was a well-dressed girl, and the enormous cardboard boxes did not at all harmonise with her neat costume. Of this she tried to appear serenely unconscious, as well as of the fact that everyone was looking at her, and she really did it very well.

The boxes were tied and knotted carefully in every direction with stout twine; moreover, the covers and the sides were punched full of good-sized holes, and at last it dawned upon my slow comprehension that there must be something alive inside.

Hardly had I reached this astute decision, when a prolonged and mournful meaou from the box beside her betrayed its correctness. The passengers began to smile broadly, and the girl's cheeks flushed, but her lips twitched on the verge of laughter as she bent over the box and appeared to whisper words of comfort through the cover.

We had reached the suburbs and were jolting along not far from my destination, when the 'bus stopped to admit a lady, for whom the girl hastened to make room by hastily lifting the heavy box beside her on to the other in her lap. The box slipped, came down with a dull thud, and a sound of rending cardboard. There was a sudden frantic meaou, and through the side of the lower box was thrust a black head with bulging yellow eyes.

The sudden movement of its prison cell had also greatly disturbed the occupant of the upper box, and with wild kickings and scratchings a corner of the cover was unexpectedly loosened, and another head protruded.

With a little ejaculation of horror, the girl clapped a hand over each furry head, and tried to force them back. Several of us sprang at once to her assistance, with imminent danger of choking both cats, but among us all we succeeded only in increasing their struggles, to the further collapse of the boxes.

At that moment the girl, looking up wildly, cried:

"Oh! stop, conductor, please! I want to get out here."

Raising my hat, I begged her to allow me to assist, and forthwith seized one cat by the neck, entangled in a chaos of string and smashed cardboard, and followed her, she grasping the other beast in a like condition.

She thought I meant merely to help her off the omnibus, and looked surprised when I allowed the vehicle to go on and stated my intention of helping her to carry the cats to her destination.

She opened her lips as if to speak. She looked at me doubtfully, then at the struggling cats, which we each held at arm's length, and saw the folly of refusing my offer.

"I was taking them to the Home," she volunteered simply.

"I beg your pardon," I queried in stupid perplexity, "the Home?"

"Yes, the Home for Stray Cats; it is somewhere near here—close by the Common. These are both stray cats. I had to take them in, but I couldn't keep them, poor things—I have three already," she went on to explain with sweet compassion.

"I should say not," I assented fervently, as the grey villain I held began to struggle and scratch afresh in frantic efforts to regain his straydom.

She looked reproachful. We walked on in silence for a few yards. Then she spoke again:

"This is very unconventional," she began hesitatingly, "and I don't know that I ought to let you help me, Mr.—ah——"

"Smith," I prompted her.

She raised her eyebrows and looked at me queerly, and I saw that she believed it to be an alias, which frightened her.

"But there is nothing else for you to do," I assured her earnestly. "It may be unconventional, but it's common sense."

I tried to look affectionately at the cats.

"Do you know where this Home is, Miss—er—er——"

She hesitated a moment, then her eyes twinkled.

"Miss Jones," she said.

I saw at once that she had not given me her real name, though I had been more frank.

She had launched into a vivid and enthusiastic description of the charitable refuge, and I was growing quite interested in it, when, with a mighty effort, the black cat which she was carrying kicked himself free of her arm, and was off like an inky streak.

"Oh, catch him!" she cried, turning piteously to me; "do catch him, Mr. Smith!"

Her tone was not to be resisted, and another moment saw me in the chase. The other cat, which I held under my arm, grew frantic at my pace, and struggled madly with my ill-protected flesh; but I heeded not.

Such a chase! Down the street, over the Common, did I pursue the wretched creature. I might be chasing him to this day but for the tangled mess of string and cardboard which he dragged after him, and which at last caught in a bush in a private garden.

I grasped him by the scruff of his neck, and breathed in his tattered ear some words not calculated to soothe his wounded spirits; then, with a beast under each arm, I strode triumphantly back to meet Miss Jones, who was hurrying towards me.

"Oh, you are so kind!" she faltered, as I came up. "How can I ever thank you? Here is your hat; I picked it up in the street."

I told her, of course, that I was sufficiently thanked already, as I sat on the step of a house recovering my breath, while she bent over me, trying to disentangle the graceless cats from their harnesses, and from one another, and from me.

The spirit of our adventure was fast sweeping away the barrier of conventional restraint, and she laughed aloud at the spectacle which I presented, and I know it must have been an unusually picturesque one, sitting there breathless and hatless.

"Patience on a monument," she laughed.

"If you will represent Grief, I think I can feel it worth while to smile at her," I remarked, with a feeble attempt to illustrate my words.

"Oh, don't smile," she hastened to add. "It was so much funnier before when you glared so tragically at the poor cats, Jer— Mr. Smith."

I almost thought she was going to say something else. But how could she know my name was Jerome? It must have been imagination. And yet again I caught that half-familiar look, which once more set me to puzzling my brain in vain.

We again took up our line of march, Miss Jones gathering up the black cat in both arms, and I holding the grey one less tenderly but quite as firmly. Thus we proceeded for nearly half a mile, till we came to a quaint little lonely structure, which from certain sounds we judged to be the Home.

Imagine our dismay on seeing this notice:

"Closed to visitors on Saturdays and Sundays. No animals received after 2 p.m. on Saturday."

"What shall I do?" asked Miss Jones in despair.

I looked at Miss Jones; I looked at her cat, and at mine; I looked about me, and suggested turning them loose. But she would not entertain the proposal.

"But—why, you must have some engagement," she said, as if this possibility had just occurred to her. "I must not bother you any longer—er—Mr. Smith. You have been so awfully kind already."

Her gratitude was charming; she had beautiful brown eyes. I assured her that I had no engagement. Aunt Rosa never knew how near she came to the great happiness of my company.

"But," I went on, "you simply can't carry both those cats," and Malkin gave a howl of anguish.

"Oh, yes, I could!" she replied, but somewhat doubtfully, as Tom voiced a contradictory sentiment.

"No," I said firmly, "as you won't desert the cats, Miss Jones, so I will never desert you until you have disposed of them to suit yourself."

It was a rash promise, but I was now thoroughly interested in the game. Even playing knight-errant to homeless cats (and a pretty girl) was better than an afternoon with Aunt Rosa.

She decided that we should try to dispose of them to some inhabitants of the place. She went on one side of the street and I on the other. I draw a veil over what passed. When we had at length succeeded in disposing of the brutes we were tired and hungry.

"I think they will really be happier than they would have been in the Home, don't you?" she asked.

"Yes, doubtless it is better—for the cats," I replied significantly.

"They were very nice cats," she retorted.

"I have nothing against them," I answered promptly. "On the contrary, I owe them a very interesting and thrilling afternoon, and a most pleasant acquaintance with—Miss Jones."

Her face changed immediately, and a return to conventional dignity took the place of her simple freedom.

"And now, when I have thanked you most heartily for your very great kindness, Mr. Smith," she said primly, "I will bid you good afternoon. I am going back on the next 'bus."

"So am I," I began boldly, but I stopped at the almost frightened look on her face.

"You—you mustn't," she said quickly. "We—we are strangers, you know, after all. I really—you know you promised as soon as the cats were disposed of—"

I argued in vain about this absurd convention of Society. She was firm, and I had to give in.

"Very well," I said sadly. "I will leave you then; but really, Miss Jones, I must take this 'bus too, for I have to get back, and you know it is rather late."

She saw the implied reproach, for I had wasted a whole afternoon upon her cats.

"Well—then you must sit at the other end of the 'bus, or on top, please," she insisted. "I know I am doing only what is right to ask you this."

She was adorably confused and troubled, and so of course I had to agree to this also, absurd as it was. We formally said good-bye at the corner, and she thanked me very prettily again.

Then the 'bus came up, and as it was full outside, I went inside and took a seat at the other end. What an absurd situation!

When she alighted she did not even look my way.

For weeks I was haunted by the puzzling familiarity of Miss Jones's face. And yet—knowing that this was not her real name, I did not see how I could manage to meet her and gain an introduction. It was maddening, for I had never wanted anything so much in my life before as to renew our acquaintance.

I haunted the street into which I had seen her disappear, in the hope of learning her address even, but in vain.

I decided to write an exaggerated account of that excursion, and send it to the local paper of my native place.

One morning, three weeks later, I received a copy of the Autocrat. I scanned the pages eagerly for my story—for even my own history of that afternoon with "Miss Jones" seemed precious to me. I found the article and was pleased to see that they had illustrated it. But what—! How the deuce—! I looked at the first picture a second time. It was I myself, the very image, helping Miss Jones herself from the 'bus, with the two cats, as natural and ugly as life, between us. What did it mean?

I turned the pages. Yes—there was I, hatless and undignified—the artist was no flatterer—scouring wildly after the escaping cat, the other hanging under my arm. Here we sat on the step, liberating the cats; here, two weary pilgrims, we stood in despair outside the Home; here was I, hawking a cat from door to door, and lastly, our dignified return at opposite corners of the 'bus.

The whole story was told in a series of most clever pictures—it needed no words by Jerome Smith to complete the tale. It was all there. And the artist?

There was only one eye-witness who could have caught those sketches. I searched for the name eagerly, and at last I found it in a corner of one picture: "W. Irene Jones."

Her name was Jones then, after all. Hurrah! Now I could find her address from the publishers. Then a thought struck me: Why had she also favoured the Autocrat? "W. Irene Jones"—suddenly I understood it all—her familiar face, the smile that haunted me.

Why, I knew the girl! She was Winny Jones, of course, my little playmate of fifteen years ago, whom I had not seen since I left Shefton! My little Winny, whom as a boy of twelve I had carried pickaback, and teased and kissed and romped with, a baby of five. And now I thought of it, I remembered that when I was in Shefton last they had said she had come to London to study art.

I lost no time, you may be sure, in learning Winny's address. Two days later I called upon her.

She entered the room with flushed cheeks and her eyes laughing to match the corners of her pretty mouth. She held my card in her hand.

"So it was your real name after all," she said, as she stretched out her hand cordially. "I thought——"

"So did I," I interrupted eagerly.

"I thought," she went on, "that it might be a false name, but I was almost sure it was really you. For you see I remembered you, though it is so long."

"But why didn't you say so, then?" I asked half impatiently.

She pouted:

"Why—you didn't recognise me, and I was provoked. I wasn't going to be the only one to remember."

"But a girl changes so much more than a man in ten years," I apologised. "You were only a little girl when I left, and even your name is different now. I used to call you 'Winny.'"

"And I almost called you 'Jerry' lots of times that afternoon, just as I used to," she laughed. "But I tried to be very dignified, so that you shouldn't guess."

And so we chatted happily about the events of that wonderful day, and she told me how she had sent the sketches to the Autocrat as a joke on me, not thinking that I had sent a story.

"I was sure you would see them," she said.

"And call?" I boldly hinted.

But she indignantly scorned the imputation, and we almost quarrelled. Then I asked what she thought of the ending of my story.

She flushed a delicious rosy pink.

"It was impossible—an altogether far-fetched and improbable ending," she declared emphatically.

"Oh, no, I don't think so." I rejoined. "I think it very natural and just what the story needed to make it end well. Don't you like stories to end well?"

We argued the matter for some time from a literary standpoint, and later we touched upon it from other standpoints. And in the end I succeeded in convincing her.

So it happened that our adventure finally did "end well" after all. And I hope each of those cats has as happy a home as I now enjoy. DOWNE PATRICK.

LOVE'S DECEPTION.

Mr. Thomas Ward was a client of our firm for about thirty years. He had two daughters, Maud and Helen; they were twins, and as like as two peas.

I know that many a joke has been made about the resemblance of twins, but in this case it was an absolute fact that friends and relatives couldn't tell one from the other. And the striking similarity of form and features remained as they grew up—which is not always the case. The girls themselves, full of fun, took a delight in the general mystification, and purposely dressed alike in every detail.

Howard Britten paid particular attention to Maud, and after the first few weeks, as the matter began to assume a serious aspect, Helen ceased to pretend that she was Maud. But Britten himself admitted that, even when he thought he could well distinguish the one from the other, he occasionally made a mistake.

When Ward saw that it really was serious, he made inquiries about Britten, and finding that he was not possessed of a fair quantity of this world's goods, put his foot down, and said that Britten should not have her unless he could "give a better account of himself."

I pass over the tears and expostulations. Ward was firm, and Britten proud; the upshot of it was that the young man went to South Africa, and correspondence between the two was forbidden.

Luck was against the young man at first, and he toiled on for months without getting any nearer the goal. Once or twice he was tempted to send a few lines to his sweetheart, but he scorned to break the condition imposed by Ward.

After many months luck favoured Howard; in a short time after the change of fortune he felt that he had enough for his purpose. With his suddenly acquired wealth he could return to the old country, and purchase a share in a business, or do something else that would please Mr. Ward and gain his consent.

He sat down to write to Maud; but after having written a few lines, he tore up the paper. He would be his own messenger. How sweet the meeting would be! No one knew the depth of his love for her!

He sent word to his relatives in Ireland that he was coming home, but that he had first to go to London on an important matter. On arriving in London, he lost no time in making his way to the home of his sweetheart. A disappointment awaited him; the family had removed to a country house in Surrey. He obtained the address, and went off.

As soon as he came within sight of Heath Lodge, he recognised an old man-servant, who was doing something outside the house.

"Is Miss Maud in?" Howard asked the old man. "Did you hear what I said?" he added impatiently, as the man looked at him with a peculiar expression, but made no reply. "You know me, don't you?"

"Yes, sir," replied the man at length, slowly. "You'll find the mistress in the garden."

In his haste Howard forgot the old man's behaviour. In the distance, on a garden seat, he saw a form that he knew well. She had her back to him, and he crept along quietly, rejoicing in the glad surprise he was preparing for his beloved Maud. He reached the seat, and called her gently by name.

The girl started up with a cry and faced him. Before she could utter a word he was by her side and had folded her in a loving embrace, while he kissed her passionately.

"Maud, my darling, home again to claim you!"

At first the girl made a feeble effort to disengage herself, but giving way to an impulse, returned his kisses.

The rapture of the meeting over, they went into the house to find Mr. Ward. She left him in the drawing-room while she sought her father. She was gone so long that he began to get impatient, but at length the old gentleman appeared and welcomed him effusively. A few minutes later Howard asked after Helen, and learnt the sad news that she had died of fever twelve months previously. That was really the cause of their removal.

Six weeks after his arrival in London Howard was married to his sweetheart, and took her to a new home in Ireland, near his own people. It was Mr. Ward's express desire; he intended to sell Heath Lodge and live near them.

Mr. and Mrs. Britten were the happiest of married couples. His wife simply idolised him, and he was devotion itself to her. People who heard of the story of their courtship—if we may so term it—said that it was but just that two young people who loved each other so much should be mated, and they were inclined to blame Ward for his share in the affair. "But," said the neighbours among themselves, "would it not have been terrible had Maud died instead of Helen!"

The same thought occurred to Howard, and he expressed it to his wife; but she went so pale, and trembled so, that he reproached himself for having mentioned it and never referred to the subject again.

Their married life lasted several years; then Howard, still young, met with an accident that proved fatal in less than two days. In the one interval of consciousness—immediately before his death—he blessed his wife for her faithfulness in their hour of trial and for her great love and devotion to him during the years that they had been man and wife.

And the secret of her life remained untold! That secret was known only to her father and the old gardener; it came into my possession later, and there is no harm in telling it now.

Helen Ward had loved Howard Britten with that love which comes only once to a woman, but when she saw that he preferred Maud, she stood aside in favour of her sister. After Howard's departure, Maud's affection for him declined, and she said that she would tell him so if she knew his address. It was she who had been attacked by fever and had succumbed.

When Howard had surprised Helen in the garden, all her love for him was intensified, and yielding to the impulse of her heart, she conceived a plan that would spare him lifelong grief, give him the happiness to which he had looked forward, and enable her, Helen, to wed the man she loved. She won her father over to her side before she took him into the drawing-room, the gardener was bribed, and the removal to Ireland completed the execution of the plan.

Deception is never right? Well, strictly speaking, that is correct; but there are exceptional circumstances, and in Helen's case—as I always shall insist—it was not merely pardonable, it was praiseworthy.

DO STOUT PEOPLE LIVE LONG?

This is a question which has occupied the attention of medical authorities from time immemorial. Some argue that the lean kind take longer to shuffle off the mortal coil than their stout brethren. The statistics naturally favour this argument, and no doubt are correct to a great extent, because sufferers from obesity are more susceptible to disease in consequence of the debilitated state of the system when clogged with abnormal adipose tissue; but a curious fact has been overlooked, viz., that corpulence generally commences about the age of thirty-five to fifty, after which time it seems to decrease; therefore, before the proverbial "three score and ten" is reached, the whilom fat man is, by a natural process, again reduced to what may only be called moderate plumpness, and thus cheats the statistician. Stout persons can now, thanks to science, reduce their weight in a most extraordinary rapid manner, without the slightest injury to their constitutions, or without resorting to those drastic remedies which only operate for a time, or by the continuance of the use of toxical drugs extending over such a period that renders it baneful to the long-suffering patient. An eminent Continental therapeutist recommends the victim to obesity to eat fat meat, while an equally eminent American prescribes lean ditto, and the stomach is to risk an accumulation of serious disorders by swallowing a pint of hot water daily, a most nauseous remedy we should think, and not unattended with danger. The past master in the cure of corpulence is Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, London, W.C., whose book (256 pages), entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure," price only two penny stamps, seems to impress us considerably, for he reduces more weight by his system than the Continental and American physicians, without any of the absurd restrictions which would make life scarcely worth living. He uses simple herbs, the properties of which he seems to possess a more than usual knowledge, and he makes but little secret of his method, so refreshing after the mystery made of most chemical and herbal concoctions for various complaints.—Wetherby News.

SUMMER HEAT AND OBESITY.

Summer heat, with the outdoor enjoyments which come in its train, is a source of unmixed delight to all whose physical condition is sound. The full feast of pleasure to which hospitable Nature at this season invites mankind is not, however, for those whose infirmities forbid them to undergo, without serious discomfort, a considerable amount of bodily fatigue. To those in particular who are the victims of excessive corpulence the arrival of the genial summer warmth serves chiefly as a painful reminder that, for them, the delights of long woodland rambles, the climbing of mountain tops, and all the adventurous ways of flood and field are prohibited joys. The palpitating heart, the reeling brain, and the possible deadly sunstroke, which are the concomitants of obesity, banish all the pleasant anticipations which once came with the advent of the glad summer-tide. How much of this deprivation of enjoyment and positive misery is absolutely and easily avoidable may be learned by consulting Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), a little work whose popularity is proved by the fact that its eighteenth edition has just been issued. This fact, too, indicates in some degree the wide area now covered by Mr. Russell's wonderful success as an expert in the reduction of excessive fat. His process, which is absolutely safe and pleasant, is so rapid in its operation that any over-corpulent lady or gentleman can easily get rid of all unnecessary weight in a very few weeks, so as to be able, before the autumn is with us, to enjoy the delightful feeling (and the appearance too) of renewed youth and energy. Mr. Russell makes no mystery of the nature of his curative preparation—apparently miraculous are its effects in simultaneously reducing weight and increasing appetite, the larger amount of food being consumed with impunity. He prints, therefore, his recipe in his singularly suggestive book, which may be obtained, post free, by sending two penny stamps to his offices, Woburn House, 27 Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Gloucester Standard.

CORPULENCE. INCREASING POPULARITY OF AN EFFECTUAL CURE.

Extreme Obesity Becoming a Thing of the Past.

Many of our readers are, doubtless, familiar with the nature of the extraordinary revolution in the cure of obesity which, within recent years, has been wrought by the original researches of that now eminent expert, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, of Woburn House, Store St., Bedford Square, London, W.C. It is evident that the certainty, the rapidity, and the agreeable surroundings of his curative process have been recognised, in a very large degree, among ladies and gentlemen belonging to the highest social circles. Keen observers who have an opportunity of judging inform us, through the pages of Society papers and otherwise, that owing to the general employment of Mr. Russell's treatment, extreme obesity is becoming as much a thing of the past at fashionable gatherings as intoxication; and no doubt it will soon be regarded as nearly as disgraceful. The issue of an eighteenth edition of the author's singularly convincing little text book, "Corpulency, and the Cure," however, serves to remind us that the popularity of the system has now reached spheres far remote from those of West-end fashion. The book of 256 pages may be had post free, by sending two penny stamps to Mr. Russell's offices, as above; and it is worth the careful attention of those who wish to free themselves of a burden of fat—not merely because it is unseemly and adds enormously to the apparent age of the sufferer—but because extreme obesity terribly interferes with the energy necessary in these days of competition to make one's way in the world or even to earn a very modest competency. A large proportion of the letters of Mr. Russell's grateful correspondents refer to their delight at being enabled—within a very brief period, and without any irksome conditions implying semi-starvation—to attack their accustomed tasks with pleasure instead of wearied disgust, through being reduced to their normal weight. The popularity of the system is also largely due, doubtless, to the English hatred of mystery, which is utterly swept aside by Mr. Russell. He fully explains his modus operandi, and supplies the recipe for his preparation.—Bicester Herald.

YOUR ESTEEMED INQUIRY DULY TO HAND.

Rain.—The East coast generally, from Grimsby to Southend, has a much lighter rainfall than the rest of the United Kingdom, and an extensive district to the south south-west of the Wash is the driest part of the Kingdom. The single place with the least rainfall appears to be East Linton, Haddingtonshire.

M. E. D.—It is very seldom that a tall or very stout person is admitted to a lunatic asylum, except insanity result from shock. As the mental condition improves, the weight increases.

Fare.—Railway travelling is cheapest in Norway and dearest in Turkey. In the latter country the fare is, on an average, three halfpence per mile for third-class, while in the former it is only one-third that sum.

Superstition.—The idea that peacocks' feathers are unlucky is based on the classical story of Osiris, King of Egypt. When he started on his Indian expedition, he left his Queen, Isis, as regent, with Argus as her chief adviser. Argus shut the Queen up in a strong castle and proclaimed himself King of Egypt. Mercury was sent against him with a large army, captured him and cut off his head; whereupon Juno turned him into a peacock and set his hundred eyes (spies) on his tail. The superstition has arisen from that legend and the additions that have been made to it from time to time.

M. E. would like to know which battle was called the "Battle of the Three Emperors."———Austerlitz, fought in December, 1805. It was called by the name you mention because the French were commanded by the Emperor Napoleon, and the Austrians and Russians by the Emperors Francis II. and Alexander I.

E. X.—The Spaniards put the notes of interrogation and admiration in front of the sentence or clause as well at the end. They say that it prepares the reader for the significance of what is coming, and enables him to give the proper tone to the words if reading aloud. The signs placed in front of the sentence are inverted.

No. 1.—Houses were not numbered in London till 1764. Lincoln is said to have anticipated the Metropolis in this respect; a row of houses facing the west front of the cathedral are called the "number houses" because they were the first in the city to be numbered.

S. K.—The weight of an average skeleton—that is, of a native of this country—is twenty-four pounds for the male, and eighteen pounds for the female.

Annie.—The daily use of curling tongs removes the natural oil from the hair and dries it, while crimping the hair with hot irons causes it to crack and break. That may not be of great importance in the case of young people, but in later years it induces baldness. In any case, it is not to be recommended.

Q.—It is estimated that about three-quarters of the land surface of the globe cannot be cultivated, because that proportion of the surface is covered by swamps, mountains, deserts, and the like.

Smoker is curious to know why meerschaum "colours."———Meerschaum would not colour at all but for the fact that it is boiled in wax. If used in its natural state it would become soiled very quickly, the material being so porous that it absorbs the slightest moisture from the hand or anything it comes in contact with. The wax, however, fills up the pores and gives it a sort of enamel.

Infant.—It often happens that strikingly clever children grow up mediocre or even stupid men and women. The human brain grows in two ways, size and weight, and structure and development. The very clever child is one in whom development is proceeding more rapidly than it should at the expense of the other form of growth. There is a given amount of energy bestowed by nature upon individuals, and if this is used up for development it is not available for growth in size and weight, which stops short. The child grows up lacking in the qualities of reasoning power, judgment, grasp of detail, and others which make the clever man.

Z. Z. writes: "What is meant by 'hunger stones'? I think they have some connection with a Continental country."———When the Rhine falls very low in the winter certain stones are exposed to view. The people assert that this is a sure indication that the ensuing year will be one of scarcity for them, so they call the stones by the name you mention. The date is sometimes cut upon them.

Flag.—All the flags, except the Royal Standards, required for the British warships are made in the Government dockyards. In the colour-loft of Chatham about 18,000 flags are made each year.

S. W.—Although a day is usually reckoned as being twenty-four hours in length, strictly speaking it is a mistake. The standard unit of time is the "sidereal day," which is 23 hours, 56 minutes and 4·091 seconds.

Jaw.—There are eight muscles in the human jaw, and in the ordinary man they exert a force of five hundred pounds.

Level.—The average height of the British Isles above the level of the sea is 714 feet. In many parts of the world the average altitude of the land is either rising or falling. Observations in connection with the most important peaks of the Cordilleras show that their height is gradually diminishing. Quito is 76 feet lower than it was a century and a quarter ago. On the other hand, the coast of Finland is being gradually elevated; during the last century islands have become peninsulas.

Tommy A.—The most murderous battle of modern times was that fought at Borodino, a Russian village, on September the 7th, 1812, between Napoleon and the Russians. The battle was one of the most obstinately disputed in modern history, and about 80,000 men were placed hors de combat. The fights before Plevna in 1877 were very sanguinary; the Russians had nearly 30,000 men killed or wounded in one battle.

WOLFF & CO.'S NEW GENUINE COMPETITION.

In order to advertise the wonderful discovery of the JET BLACK and BRILLIANT RED "EGYPTIAN" MARKING INKS, we have decided to offer the above prizes to the purchasers of a bottle of WOLFF'S BLACK or RED MARKING INK, post free, 1s. 6d.; Foreign Orders, 3s.

We would say that our previous competitions have given the fullest satisfaction, and we have many letters from delighted prize winners.

Grasp this opportunity to win a prize. The competition consists in filling in correctly the missing letters in the six following sentences relating to

1.—W*'S I*E MG I*K
2.—P*Y FD
3.—A S*E P*E
4.—AS R*N U*D
5.—IY UE
6.—RS CE

WOLFF'S IMPERISHABLE MARKING INK is perfectly fluid. It has a simple procedure, and articles marked with it remain uninjured. Wolff's Marking Ink is irrevocably unremovable, and even resists chlorate. It requires no heating or preparation, may be used with any ordinary pen, and articles marked with Wolff's "Egyptian" Marking Ink can be washed immediately, as this ink requires no fixing.

THOUSANDS OF UNSOLICITED TESTIMONIALS.

The Cash prizes will be awarded as follows:

To EACH purchaser who fills in correctly ALL THE WORDS, £10; 13 words, £5; 11 words, £3; 8 words, £1.

For less than 8 words, no prize.

WHAT TO DO.—When you have found what you think are the correct words, write them out on a sheet of paper, numbering the sentences 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, as set out above, then send same, together with a Postal Order for 1s. 6d. (not stamps), for a bottle of our famous Marking Ink, saying whether you want Red or Black, and a stamped addressed envelope for results to—

WOLFF & CO., 82 MILTON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

A little trouble will secure you a prize.

Write distinctly and fully your name and address, put name of this paper at top of your letter, and send in your order for the Marking Ink as soon as possible.

The competition will close on July 30th, 1898. The prizes will be awarded and results posted in the following week. The solution of this competition has been sealed and deposited with our solicitors, and will be opened at their offices on the appointed day.

In connection with this exceptional and Genuine Competition, we would particularly point out that competitors will receive not only full value for their P.O.'s in the shape of a bottle of Wolff's Imperishable Egyptian Marking Ink, but the bottle we supply for 1s. 6d., post free, contains three times the quantity usually sold by other makers for 1s., and is the largest bottle of Marking Ink in the Market for the price. We are willing to spend a considerable sum of money in advertising our Egyptian Marking Inks, and we prefer doing it this way to expending it on newspaper advertisements, etc. We ask all competitors who do not receive their Marking Ink in a few days not to jump to any hasty conclusions. Parcels sometimes get lost in the post, in which case we will willingly replace same if you will communicate with us, giving number of your P.O.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Miss S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

25 Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.
Miss M FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."
Mrs. F. HARPER, 61 Portland Crescent, Leeds, writes: "My doctor persuaded me to try a box, and I find they have done my breathing a lot of good and I can get about much better. My doctor did not wish his name mentioned, but they have done him good personally."
Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.
"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."
Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.
Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."
Mrs. WOODS, 447 Cowbridge Road, Canton, Cardiff, says: "Tablets have a most marked effect, and I shall take every opportunity to make known the wonders of your remedy."

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."
L. LUDDRINGTON, "Sunnyside," Station Road, Sidcup, says: "I have benefited greatly, and have lost a stone."
Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."
A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."
Miss A. ATKINS, 329 Southdown Road, Liverpool, writes: "I lost nearly a stone from taking one box."
Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."
Mrs. JAMES SMITH, of Cowell Terrace, Soham, says: "Your 2s. 6d. box of Tablets reduced my weight 12lb."
Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."
Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."
"Miss HUMPHREYS, of Claremont Buildings, Shrewsbury, has lost 1st. in weight already, and thinks the Tablets deserve every success."
Mrs. O'CONNOR, 2 Kensington Square Mansions, London, writes: "I am much less stout for taking them."
Surgeon Colonel E. S. BRANDER writes from Ihansi, India, in September, 1897: "Your Tablets in my own experience form an excellent remedy for reducing weight."
The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."
Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Balgowan Lodge, Methven, N.B.
Miss MCPHERSON writes: "I have taken a box, and am reduced 1st. in weight."

AUNT SOPHIE'S PORTRAIT.

"SOME people would call it superstition, said grandmother. "I said it was nonsense when I first heard of it; that people fancied the different expressions which they declared they saw on the features of the portrait. Of course, I had heard of pictures with eyes that seemed to follow you wherever you went; but this was something entirely different."

"But why was Sophie Windham's portrait never placed with those of our other ancestors? It would have been quite an attraction to the gallery to have a constantly changing portrait to show visitors."

"Sophie Windham was a beautiful woman," returned our grandmother gravely, "and her intellectual abilities were so far in advance of her time that she was regarded as a witch by many persons; and had she not died young, she would probably have had the charge of witchcraft brought against her. This portrait was finished after her death and was hung with the others."

"Then why did it not remain there?" I asked.

"Because almost everyone was scared by it. One declared that it glared at him as though it would like to kill him; another asserted that it smiled contemptuously; and so on. It caused such a disturbance in the household that it was taken down and placed in the lumber room, where it remained until I came here.

"When I heard the story I did not believe it, as I have said. The idea that a portrait would reflect the conscience of the person who looked at it seemed absurd to me."

"Did it do that?" we all cried in a breath.

"Yes. In the light of later experience, that is the most fitting description of the vagaries of the portrait. I had it brought down and hung up in the drawing-room. To me, the expression always seemed gentle and loving; but I couldn't keep a servant—except one—for more than a few weeks, and many of my visitors said they didn't like it. In fact, people refused our invitations and my husband finally insisted that we must put it away. And I have not seen it since."

Then I remember that they all clamoured to see the picture, and that at first grandmother would not tell them where it was. But at last she reluctantly yielded, and bade my cousin Maud go to the attic with a light and bring it back with her, because she best knew the old house.

Maud was gone a long time, until one of the other cousins got up and declared that she was going to find her. But just then the door opened suddenly and Maud stole into the room—without the picture. It was the last time I ever saw her, and I shall never forget the expression of her face. She groped her way across the room to the dark corner where she had been sitting, but as she went the firelight streamed across her pallid face and showed it drawn with horror, repulsion and fear. Her hands were trembling, and she had barely strength to reach her chair, into which she sank heavily.

All the cousins jumped up to help her, but she thrust them back impatiently, and they looked at one another in wonder, while grandmother's hands trembled on the arms of her chair. Then someone asked about the picture.

Maud sat silent, covering her face with her hands; then suddenly she cried, shuddering:

"It's horrible! Oh, grandmother, how could you say it was beautiful? Don't let them bring it down. Don't let them touch it; it is—oh! I cannot say what it is!"

Grandmother's face blanched, and she looked at Maud with an expression of fear.

"Yes, let it stay there," she said. "It is the best place for it, in the attic. I should have known better. I will never let anyone touch it again."

Our fun for the evening was spoilt, and I remember that we all crept silently away to bed, frightened and awed.

But the next morning my curiosity got the better of my nervousness of the night before, and I stole secretly to the attic to see the dreadful picture for myself. I found it in the darkest corner under the low eaves, but already someone had been before me. Whether it had been done by grandmother or by Maud herself I never knew, but the face was completely obliterated under a fresh coat of black, thick paint, and so my curiosity remained unsatisfied.

The family separated after the holidays. A few weeks after that night came the tragedy which forms the only stain on our old family name, and which destroyed all our loving associations with the old homestead. One morning Maud was found drowned in the pond near grandmother's house!

I was too young to understand then, but years later I learnt with a second shock that my cousin had not fallen into the pond by accident, as I had always supposed, but that she had drowned herself, and that it was better so.

When grandmother died, some years afterwards, her precious heirlooms were divided among us all; and to me, the youngest grandchild, was given, among other things, the choice of all I wished in the old garret. And so it happened that when I married I carried to my new home the blackened and disfigured old portrait of Sophie Windham.

I scarcely know how I came to take it, except that from childhood its story had left a deep impression upon me, and I could not bear to have the picture thrown away.

At first, remembering Maud's face that night, I was loath to have the fatal features uncovered to view in my own happy home. At last, however, I yielded to my husband's curiosity, and indeed, to my own, which had not remained idle all these years, and the picture was sent to be cleaned and to have the coating of paint removed.

When the portrait came back I hesitated long to look at the face. But John was standing by me, and, together, at last, we raised the wrappings; and, lo! we had merely a quaint and curious portrait of olden times, an ancestress of whom, indeed, I might be proud.

It was a beautiful face, smiling and very happy. The powdered hair was brushed high from the fair white forehead, and below shone the deep, liquid, searching eyes, which held and attracted one. The only fault I saw was a haughty, almost arrogant poise to the long, white neck, and an expression of self-complacent satisfaction in the curved, full lips. John, indeed, did not notice this, but fancied he read a tendency to jealousy and a little sadness in the droop of the eyebrows. Perhaps we were both right.

We placed the portrait first in the dining-room. But this made trouble. Servant after servant gave me notice without reason, until at last one confided to me that none of them could bear the horrible picture, which glared at them when they passed and caused innumerable accidents to gravy dishes and soup tureens. Evidently each read her own shortcomings—which were not always trivial—in that sweet young face.

My only relief from constant turmoil was to remove conscience from their path, and the picture was taken to the drawing-room, where they would not see so much of it. I did not wish to put it away altogether, for I liked it.

But here I found my ancestress even more embarrassing. The comments of my guests, who did not know how this powdered lady was betraying them, kept me in a constant state of anxiety. To one the face showed cruelty, to another deceit. One declared it to be villainously suspicious, melancholy and morbid.

I was repeating my grandmother's experience, and finally had the portrait placed in the nursery.

Here, at least, I knew that it would cause no trouble, for it could reflect only baby purity and innocence in sweet, sympathetic eyes. I hung "Aunt Sophie" (as we called her) above my Harold's cot, and left her there in peace to smile down upon him and to watch over his happy dreams.

My baby dearly loved the pretty lady, and would often beg to be lifted up so that he might rub his little cheek to hers and kiss her smiling lips. For in her eyes he at least read nothing to fear.

We lived in a quiet suburb, where John was then superintendent of a large factory. Among the hands whom he employed he was brought into contact with some rough characters, though his tact and kindness of heart made him a general favourite and he never had trouble with any save one.

Three years after our marriage he had been obliged to discharge from the factory a certain Dick Harlow, a surly man, who had never come under John's influence and had always seemed to dislike him. He was a ruffianly fellow, an habitual drunkard, though when he first came to the factory he had been an excellent workman. His manner was at times wild and strange, for already, though we did not guess it, his drunken habits had begun to unsettle his brain, and he caused continual trouble among the other hands. Outside the district he bore a very bad reputation, and, indeed, as we afterwards learnt, he had already served time for house-breaking.

He bore a bitter grudge to John, and came to let us know it. For the morning after his discharge I saw his horrible face at our gate and heard his oaths and threats of vengeance. But he disappeared altogether from the neighbourhood after that, and we hoped it was for good, and gave up thinking about the matter.

Several months passed uneventfully, with peace restored to the factory and a feeling of security lulling our instinct, which was to be on guard. June had come, and already we were beginning to make preparations for our summer trip to the seaside.

It was a warm, beautiful night, and the moonlight flooded our east rooms. The air was oppressive and kept me awake and restless, while I heard the church clock strike the hours several times.

Little Harold slept alone in the nursery on the second floor, in the room next my own. He was a very sound sleeper and seldom stirred in the night. And yet as I lay there with my eyes closed, in the small hours of the morning, I thought I heard a slight sound in the next room. Instantly I was on the alert, raising my head to catch any indication that Harold wanted me. All was quiet for some seconds, and I began to think that I was mistaken.

Then suddenly there arose, sharp and shrill and piercing, the most horrible scream of mortal fear and anguish which I have ever heard. Then came a heavy fall, followed by silence, and after that a second scream, in which I recognised Harold's frightened voice.

My heart sank with a dreadful sickening throb of fear, and I rushed wildly to my baby's room, not daring to think what I expected to find there. John also had jumped up as if shot when the cry came, and followed me with his hand grasping the little pistol which he always kept under his pillow.

I ran instantly to the cot. Harold was sitting up in a flood of moonlight, sobbing with fright, his eyes big and wild, looking fearfully into the darkness over the foot of the cot.

"Are you hurt, darling? What is it?" I cried, as I clasped and kissed him passionately, finding him apparently only frightened.

He pointed with his chubby finger past my shoulder into the room.

"The man!" he sobbed, clinging closer to me in terror. "Man wiv big eyes."

Then I heard an exclamation from John and the click of the trigger as he cocked his pistol quickly. Turning with the sudden rush of new fear, I saw him bending over something lying in the middle of the room where Harold's eyes were staring.

Then I noticed the writhing body of a man at John's feet, and a streak of moonlight fell across the distorted face with its set teeth and pain-drawn features. But it was the eyes that thrilled and terrified me. For glaring and protruding with mortal fear they were fixed upon something above my baby's bed.

I followed their direction and gazed into the calm and tranquil face of "Aunt Sophie," which stood forth vividly in the moonlight. I turned to the man again, and clasped my boy tighter as I recognised the brutal features of Dick Harlow.

"Get up!" cried John hoarsely, with horror and loathing in his voice, covering the wretch with his pistol. But except for the convulsive twitching of his limbs the man lay motionless, his eyes still fixed in their look of horror on the picture.

"He is in a fit," said John. "Call the servants, Grace, and send for the police. I will see that he does no harm."

He stooped to the floor beside the fallen figure, but recoiled with an exclamation and turned quickly as if to keep me from seeing. But I had noticed the long knife clenched in the powerless hand, and also something more on the floor beside him.

Wrenching the knife away John stooped and picked up the huge handkerchief which I had seen. It smelt strong and pungent, and from the folds fell a sponge saturated still stronger with chloroform.

John turned to me with a sob.

"Take the baby away," he said, "and thank Heaven that he is safe and sound!"

"Thank Heaven and Aunt Sophie!"

Harlow lay there helpless in his fit until the police came and took him into custody, his eyes fixed to the last upon the face which reflected we shall never know what horrid vision to that guilty soul.

For he never spoke again. The shock of that night's fear was too much for his enfeebled strength, and his mind already unsettled by drink and passion. He was taken to the lunatic asylum, dumb and hopelessly crazed for the short remaining span of his evil life. And the look of fear, they say, remained in his haunted eyes to the end.

We never knew Harlow's full purpose in entering the house that night, except that he evidently came for revenge. But whether with a half intelligent cunning he had meant to chloroform and then kidnap the child, or whether in a fit of insane revenge he had contemplated murder itself, we have never dared to think.

The secret of that portrait may never be explained to us, but it shall always hang in that room while our child sleeps there, and when, in course of time, he leaves us to fight the battle of life for himself, he shall hang it in his own house.

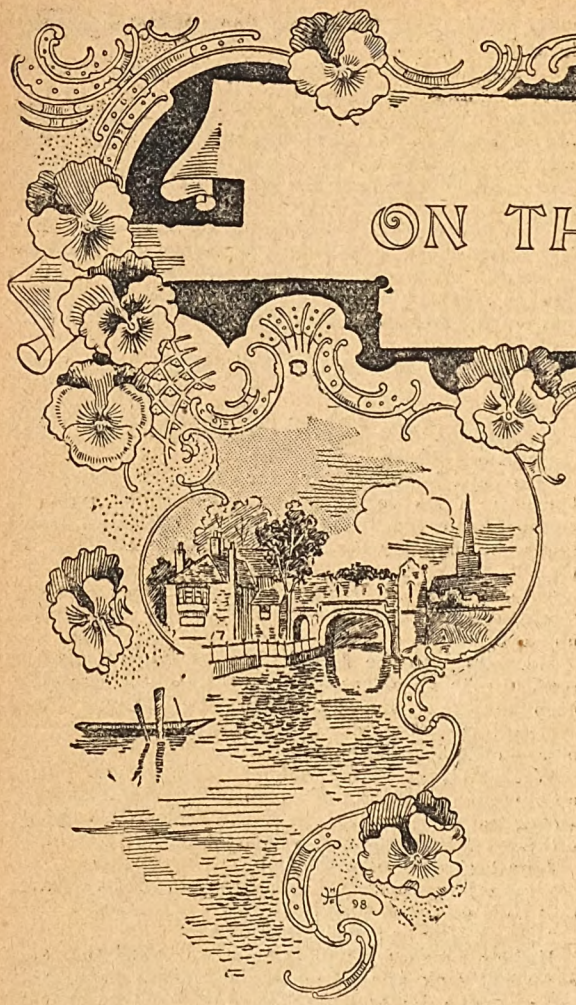
ON THE BRINK.



It was too late when they met, for she had been married to Jack Alton for a month—a month that had been an awakening for her, in which she saw the man she had wed, slowly emerging from the dream-like mist of the days of courtship into the clear, cruel light of truth. Already she had begun to despise him and to look drearily into the coming years as a galley slave might look forward to the deadening years at the oar.

Henri Vibois knew the truth about Jack Alton. Vibois was not a sentimentalist nor much given to consideration of the happiness of anyone, but when he saw Hulda Alton he pitied her.

Every man has respect for purity, hard and careless though he may be, and Hulda Alton combined purity with a strength and gentleness that made her a noble woman. She was of the world, to be sure, and took her part in its frivolities and make believes, and when she found Jack Alton to be what he was, she simply made the best of a bad matter, and hid the scar under the robe of womanly dignity and self-restraint.

Henry Vibois, the prospering and courted artist, had drifted through a score of flirtations before he met Hulda Alton, and nothing had changed him. Women! He cared for none of them.

He admired Hulda Alton. She was so strong, so womanly. She was a revelation. He once went so far as to say that he might be induced to marry, if two such women existed. She was the ideal of his thoughtful moments.

Vibois saw her often, and each time he wondered at her self-control. This was, indeed, the one perfect woman. He knew Jack Alton and he knew the horror that a woman so noble must feel toward such a man. He admired her faithfulness. Hulda Alton remained the strong, pure woman she had ever been. And it was this strength and purity that drew them together.

Hater of women and scoffer at men, Henri Vibois found his admiration for Jack Alton's wife growing rapidly. He spent much time in her company, pleading to his conscience that he drew strength and inspiration from her. But it was impossible for Hulda not to see. She saw, but gave no sign, and Vibois would not have risked the idol he worshipped by proposing aught that might shatter it.

They were friends. And thus the year passed.

It was at a private view where Vibois had a couple of small landscapes that he first saw sorrow darken her eyes.

She was standing before a panel by Herter when he pushed his way up to her.

"Ah!" she said; "I thought you would be here. That was why I came. I am alone—and you?"

He nodded "Yes."

"Then let us go out. I want to say something to you. There is a cab at the door. I came in a cab to-night—for—reasons."

Vibois handed her into the cab.

"Where, sir?" asked the driver.

"Where?" Vibois asked Hulda.

"Tell him to drive in the park," she replied.

The cab rolled away, and for a minute there was nothing said. Then Vibois spoke.

"I know," he remarked.

"But you cannot know all," she cried. "It is too dreadful! I have tried so hard. I have done everything I could, and it has all been very difficult. I have no one to whom I can go for help or advice."

She was leaning back in the corner of the cab, her head thrown back listlessly, while her hands were tearing a rose that had fallen into her lap.

"You can't know how I hate him! how I despise him! You do not know him as I do, nor what it is to live with him and to feel that it must go on for years."

She paused and put her hand to her forehead.

"I have tried," she continued, "but what is the use? Am I to go on year after year suffering as I do? Must I always bear it? Is it right that my life should be made miserable by what is no fault of mine? It is not just! Why should I have no joy, no love in my life? What have I done that I should have to bear it?"

Blessed are those who, to such a storm of questions, can answer:

"It is the hand of Heaven. Have patience and all will be well."

Vibois writhed. Why, indeed? And what could he say? Trite platitudes rose to his lips, but he scorned to offer them to a scarred heart. It was not dead words this woman needed. Not hackneyed sentences. Fighting alone against a host of sorrows, she craved the living sympathy of a living heart.

Vibois was silent, and the cab rolled on past other cabs coming and going. He was trying to formulate his thoughts, to find some phrase that would tell something of his feelings, but not too much. He wanted to help her, but he did not know how.

Hulda was silent, waiting for him to speak. Twice he began, only to stop before he said five words.

"Tell him to drive me home, please," she said at length, and her voice was tinged with disappointment.

"No!" said Vibois, "not yet! Let me do something for you. Let me help you in some way. Don't you see I would gladly do anything in my power, if I but knew how?"

They were passing a lamp and the light fell on her face. He saw the tears in her eyes and her brave lips tremble, and all the love he felt swept over him.

He put out his hand and laid it on one of her hands, but she drew it quickly away.

"Hulda," he said, "let me help you. If in no other way, let the knowledge that I love you—I who have loved no other woman—give you strength. I know how hard it is, I know all you have to bear, and I, too, suffer when you suffer. You are not alone, Hulda, for I love you."

"Stop!" she cried, "you must not! It is not right. I should not have come. But I was so sad, and I did not know where to turn for help. I thought perhaps you could help me, but not that way. I see it all clearly now. I must try to bear it. It is the only way. Tell him to drive me home, please."

When he had left her he drove to his apartments.

"She is a woman after all," he thought, "but such a woman! She will go on day after day suffering in silence, until——"

For six months Vibois kept out of her way. He knew he loved her too much to run any risks, and he had no wish to shatter his idol, even if by that means he would come into possession of the pieces. He gave himself up wholly to work, and meanwhile kept his eye on Jack Alton. The fellow was becoming a drunken wreck.

One day in May he received a letter from Hulda. It only said: "Please come this evening."

He went.

He found her dressed ready to go out.

"You once said you loved me," she said. "If you do, take me away. I can bear it no longer. I—oh, Henri, take me away!"

"Hulda," he said, "I love you still and I shall always love you."

"Then take me away," she cried. "Anywhere, I will go anywhere away from him."

Her cheeks were bright and her eyes glistened. Vibois hesitated.

"Do you mean——" he began.

"Yes," she replied, "I mean I will go with you. I love you. See!"

She held out her arms toward him. He took her in his arms, and she held up her face for the first sweet kiss, and then she looked up smiling.

A cab was waiting and they drove away. She let her head fall on his shoulder, and one arm she slipped round him.

His idol was tottering on the brink.

The cab rolled on, round many corners, through dark streets, and over rough pavements.

"Where is he taking us?" Hulda asked at last.

Vibois looked down into her face and smiled.

"To perdition!" he said quietly.

"What?" she cried, sitting up, and gazing at him with frightened eyes.

"To the realm of fallen idols," he said, "to the place of tarnished honour and vain regrets, and long days of self-accusation and growing dislike that lurk in the shadow of lost self-respect, to——"

"Stop!" she cried, covering her ears with her hands. "Stop! Oh, why do you say such things?"

"It is the truth, dearest," he replied gently, taking her hand; "to all these he is driving us, and I go willingly with you. I know well all that follows; but were it a thousand times worse I would go, if you wished, but with one regret."

"And that?" she asked.

"That the one true woman I have ever known has fallen from her high estate."

"Henri," she said, "tell him to drive me home, please."

The cab turned and bore them back. He to worship his idol, she to slow and soul-slaying torture. They did not speak as they rolled homewards, and at her door she would not let him help her to alight.

She climbed wearily up the steps and paused a minute at the door before she let herself in. Inside was all she hated. Outside—well, at least Vibois still loved her. She had not made him despise her. She had gone far, but he could forgive much. She had been tortured to madness. Yes, it was best!

She entered the hall and met a physician descending the stairs.

"Madam," he said, "I have sad news. Your husband has been run over. He can scarcely live until morning."

She put her hand on the wall to steady herself and then gazed closely in his face.

"Is it true?" she asked.

"Too true, I fear," he answered.

"Then," she said calmly, "I will go to him at once."

And she walked calmly up the stairs.

THE ENGINE-DRIVER'S DAUGHTER.

Kane Creek was a station on a branch-line of the Canadian North-West Railway, about two miles from the junction at Mercer. It was in the midst of a scrubby pine forest, with a sandy road running out from the trees on one side and into the trees on the other.

There were only two or three houses, a little general shop, with a porch like the visor of a military cap, and a school, all arranged in a scattered row along the line. The dusty station was an oasis in the midst of a timber desert, with a great many telegraph wires singing overhead.

A dozen trains whirled through Kane Creek every day with only a shriek of greeting and a wake of fine sand. Only two of them paid the slightest attention to the girl in a blue gingham dress who stood in the little look-out window.

One of them was a goods train, which stopped at Kane every time it came by for the conductor to hand the girl a bundle of yellow papers, and receive another like it in return. The other was the night "express," running at forty miles an hour.

This latter was a splendid train—ten carriages, with the finest engine on the road, big No. 606. As its glaring eye flashed round the bend in the direction of Mercer, the girl in the gingham dress often thought of the great train as a powerful and ferocious beast roaring westward on a race with the sun, and she knew the hand that guided it.

When the train was a mile away there were always two blasts of the whistle. Everyone in Kane thought they meant simply "Wake up, look out!" for that is what all locomotives say at every crossing, but the girl in the gingham dress heard, "Hallo, Polly!" and darted out on the platform and waved her handkerchief.

As the great train thundered nearer a hand was thrust from the engine, and, although it was usually dark, she could see the flutter of something white, and often, as the engine darted through the station, she heard the blurred sound of a voice and caught a glimpse of a grimy face and a blue jacket. Then she went back to her place in the little station with a sigh of content.

For it was a moment of great joy to Polly Marshall when her father's engine went through. Polly was in charge of the station at Kane Creek. Anyone could have told that a woman presided in the little station, for was there not always a bouquet in the window, and dainty pictures surrounding the grimy time-tables on the walls, and a kitten curling upon the doorstep?

At seventeen Polly had gone in as assistant to learn telegraphy, and when Clark, the "station-master," was promoted, the company had left the independent girl in charge. She and her father lived in one of the wooden houses a stone's-throw from the station, and since Polly's mother died they had been everything to each other.

Marshall was a big, silent man, and some of his companions thought him gruff and ill-tempered; but to Polly he was always as tender as a mother. Often when she was a mere girl he took her with him to Mercer on his engine, and he explained to her how the big black creature was started and stopped; what this brass crank was for, and how, when the engine squeaked here or squeaked there, a little oil was needed in this cup or in that crevice, and Polly had learnt to know an engine as well as she knew the neat little pantry in the house at home.

Indeed, she had more than once managed the levers and throttle, although it was very heavy work for a girl to do.

It was one night late in the autumn that Polly Marshall had need of all her knowledge of engines. She was sitting at her desk in the little look-out window, a shaded light throwing its rays down on her telegraph instruments and the sounding key clicking sleepily. Suddenly she was startled by the call of her number.

Instantly her fingers sought the keys, and she gave the answer that signified that she was all attention.

"Look out for——" clicked the sounder, and then it suddenly ceased, and try as she would, Polly could get no further communication from the station next to the eastward.

What could the trouble be? Polly sprang to her feet, remembering that the night express, of which her father was the driver, was the next train due. Could anything be the matter? She ran out on the dark platform to see that her lights were all in order, and that the switches were properly set, so that the express would slip past the station without an accident. Then she went back and called up Mercer.

"Can't you get Pullton?" she asked.

Pullton was the station which had sent her the warning so mysterious interrupted. She knew the operator at Pullton well. Every night he told her of the approach of her father's train, and whether or not it had left his station at the proper time.

"Pullton quiet. Can't get answer," was the report of the wires. "What's the matter?"

Polly answered as well as she could, and Mercer made another attempt to arouse Pullton.

Her father's train was now due. It should be whistling cheerily at the lower bend. Polly stepped out on the platform and peered up the line. Yes, there was the familiar headlight. She would have known it among a hundred.

Then came the whistle, "Hallo, Polly!" and Polly ran back into her office much relieved and sat down to warn Mercer.

At that instant she heard a peculiar cracking sound that sent her heart quivering deep in her bosom. Then there was the shrill scream of the locomotive whistle, suddenly interrupted as if the hand that had drawn the lever had been struck from its place.

Polly knew it was a cry of distress. It seemed to say "Help!" in a long, tremulous wail. Instantly Polly darted outside and flew up the line. Already the express should have thundered past the station, but she could see its headlight a hundred yards or more away.

With a hundred terrifying questions flashing through her mind, Polly ran on through the gloom. When she was within a few yards of the big head-light, she saw half-a-dozen armed men swarming round the engine, she heard fierce oaths, and then the engine started up again.

She saw in an instant that it had been cut free from the train. In the place where her father usually stood, there was a big, unfamiliar figure managing the lever and the throttle. Terrified, Polly sprang to one side into a clump of bushes. As the locomotive passed her on its way up the line she saw that the man who was driving wore a black mask on his face, and then she knew what had happened.

She understood why Pullton had tried to warn her and failed. Robbers had "held up" the train, and were preparing to rob the express carriage.

For a moment Polly was torn with doubt and terror. Had they shot her father? She knew that he never would submit to have his train captured without a struggle. Should she go to him? Then she remembered her station and the telegraph, and in a moment she was flying down the line towards the station. She would send for help to Mercer.

But squarely in front of the little station the locomotive stopped, and the black masked man sprang from the engine and darted across the platform. Hardly thinking what she was doing, Polly ran up on the other side of the engine, and, raising herself up, peered into the tender. She had half expected to see her father's dead body lying on the floor, for she had heard much about the terrible doings of train robbers.

Through the look-out window she could see the robber sitting at her own little desk in the station sending a message. It flashed over her all at once that he was wiring Mercer that the express was delayed, thus preventing any alarm. The robber had pushed up his mask, and she saw him plainly.

What should she do? She dared not enter the office, and she, a mere girl, could be of no service where the robbers were making their attack on the train.

At that moment three shots rang out, clear and distinct, from the detached train. The man at the telegraph instrument sprang to his feet, and ran to a side window in the waiting-room and looked up the line.

Now was her chance! Hardly thinking what she was doing, Polly threw back the reverse lever and opened the throttle steadily. The big steel wheels began to turn, very slowly at first. Farther and farther the throttle opened and faster and faster turned the wheels, and yet they did not go half fast enough to suit Polly, who was now glancing fearfully over her shoulder.

Suddenly the station door was thrown open, and she saw the robber darting up the line. He had a pistol in his hand. He was pointing it at her and shouting for her to stop, but the engine was now going at good speed, and, run as he would, the robber could not catch it. But he stopped and fired, the bullet whizzing over Polly's head.

The engine was now tearing down the line at full speed. Polly knew that it must be fired or it would not go far, and so, leaving the throttle open, she flung open the firehole, and with the heavy shovel in her small hands threw in load after load of coal.

When she returned to her place she could see the first signal light of Mercer already blinking into view. She pulled down on the whistle valve and the engine shrieked its distress.

Two minutes later Polly strained at the heavy reverse lever, turned hard on the airbrake and brought the great iron horse to a sudden standstill. How she ever managed to stammer the story she never knew, but in a few minutes the engine was speeding back with half a dozen armed men. Behind them came another load of men on a switch engine.

They heard the firing before they reached Kane Creek, but it ceased soon afterwards. The robbers had gone. They had taken with them much plunder from the passengers, but they had not been able to get the express safe open, although they were at work drilling when relief came.

From the time that the engine stopped Polly was missing. When the rescued and excited passengers and express messengers began to crowd round and inquire, the Mercer men remembered her. A party of them went out to find the girl who had brought help to the beleaguered train.

In a little clump of bushes they heard a man moaning, and an instant later they saw Polly kneeling in the sand with her father's head in her lap, crying bitterly, and they gathered up the brave engine driver and his daughter and carried them down to the train.

Marshall was not badly hurt, and he was able to be in Mercer when the general manager of the railway thanked the blushing Polly officially, and offered her a new and better position in Mercer. And of course, all the passengers and express messengers heard about Polly's brave deed and said a great many pleasant things about her, but Polly, being a sensible girl, only blushed and said that she had to do it, and that any other girl would have done the same under like circumstances. Which no one believed, of course.

Later, when the robbers were captured, Polly was able to identify one of them positively—the one who had run the engine—and through him the entire party was convicted and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment.

The Love that Was Lost.

She had charge of the glove counter in a large establishment, while he looked after the black goods across the way. She was plump and fair, with merry brown eyes, and hair that waved about her face in a most distracting manner—a faithful little soul, busy from morning till night, her stock in perfect order, and her manners to customers at once sweet and obliging.

He found that she was unselfish also, for she often helped to do the work of the girl who stood next to her—a delicate creature, who always looked tired.

In short, he had in his idle moments, or while arranging his sombre stock, learnt a great deal about his fair neighbour.

Her name was Helen Clare. Her favourite colour was pink. She had a small foot, and a musical voice.

It took him three months to find this out, and with it came the knowledge that he was deeply, hopelessly in love with her.

As yet, their acquaintance had progressed but little further than a "good morning" as they took their places each day. Prudence suggested to him that it would be as well for it to end there.

On his salary of twenty shillings a week he supported his mother and himself. Could he ask such a girl as Helen to share the future he saw before them?

Whether it was the effect of his hopeless love or the close confinement at the shop, he grew thin and pale, and his large eyes looked so melancholy that the clerks christened him "Mournful Harry," and joked about his funeral goods. Helen seemed to grow pinker and prettier every day.

At last, one night, they passed out of the shop together. It was raining and he offered to take her to the tram under his umbrella. He found to his joy that she walked home, and that she lodged with an aunt very near where he and his mother lived in modest apartments.

So it came to pass that they often went home together. Her aunt found that she used to know his mother, and that they were very respectable people indeed. After that the acquaintance progressed rapidly.

With her merry talk, and still merrier laugh, she tried to cheer up his spirits, and he, warming under the influence of her smiles, found himself quite another being.

But this could not last. The more he loved her, the drearier the future seemed, for he could not ask her to marry him. She divined his feelings and in her innocence of heart felt that she loved him in return.

Several months had passed this way, when one evening Harry came over with some wonderful news. An uncle of his had come to see them, who owned some land in Australia. Noticing Harry's failing health, he offered to give him some land and pay the passage out for his mother and himself if they would go out there and live.

"He says it is a grand country and that I shall have better health and far better prospects there," explained Harry eagerly. "Oh, Helen, if I could only take you!"

But he did not ask her to go, and he was too honourable to bind her by any promise to wait for him.

In a year at most he would be well enough off to send for her. No doubt of success crossed his mind. If he had been melancholy before, he was jubilant now, as he thought what this great chance meant for him.

So he went away. She missed him, of course, but being a very sensible person made herself as comfortable and as happy as possible. The day came, however, when her step lagged and the colour left her cheeks. Harry's letters at first were wildly enthusiastic. It was a glorious country. The pure air and the outdoor life were making a new man of him. His mother liked it, although it was lonely. He had built a cosy house with his own hands.

It took him several months to get down to dry facts. Then he wrote that there had been a drought. Everybody told him he must not expect to make anything this year. It would certainly be better another season. After that, weeks passed without a word.

The long, hot summer was drawing to a close. Helen had lost all her pretty colour, and her big brown eyes had a pathetic look. In the autumn she received another letter that explained his silence. It told of trouble and disaster to crops and stock.

She went to the shop and took her place. But her feelings got the better of her and she laid her head on the counter and cried. Someone stepped in front of her and said kindly:

"Are you in trouble, Miss Clare?"

It was the senior partner, Mr. Seaforth.

Helen dried her tears quickly, she felt very much in awe of him, although he had always been exceedingly kind. She remembered after she had answered him, and he had passed on, that he had been very thoughtful for her of late.

Digitized by Google

He rarely passed the counter without a pleasant word or look for her. A year ago she had fitted black gloves to the plump hands of his little daughters, and watched them trip out of the door of the shop to their carriage, attended by their governess. They had just lost their mother.

At last, one morning, after weeks of keeping up by exerting her will power, Helen could not get up. Her aunt, quite alarmed, sent for the doctor. He said all she needed was rest and quiet.

The next day someone sent a box of lovely roses. The next day, a basket of fruit; and, finally, one morning, when she was able to sit up, her aunt came to her, with a look of amazement mingled with triumph, saying that some ne wanted to see her in the parlour.

Then, as the girl started to go down, her aunt caught her hand and said pleadingly:

"Be sensib e, Helen, do be sensible!"

On entering the room Helen was surprised to see Mr. Seaforth waiting.

She was still more surprised to hear what he had to say.

He was a fine-looking man, with iron-grey hair and clear eyes—very kindly eyes, she thought, as he told her that he wanted to marry her. He did not say that he loved her—and that hurt her a little. This practical little girl had a romantic side to her nature; carefully kept in the background 'tis true, but still there.

"You are just the one I want for a mother to my little girls," he said. "I have been thinking of this for a long time, and I think I could make you happy."

She thought a moment, then with quivering lips told him of Harry Graves. He smiled, as if pleased with her frankness.

"I know all about that; but I understood that you were free or I would not have spoken. Don't answer me now—take a week to think it over."

After he left, Helen flung herself on the couch and cried for a long time. Her aunt looked in, but went away again very softly.

A week later Helen made her choice, and before her fellow employés had time to recover their breath after the astonishing news, had married the senior partner, had been to Paris for the honeymoon, and was settled in her beautiful new home.

There she soon won the hearts of her little step-daughters and had the reins of household affairs well in her firm little hands. Mr. Seaforth had been a good judge of character. She was a capital housekeeper, a firm yet loving step-mother, and under her rule all the rough places in his life seemed to be smoothed over.

There was nearly a year of this life, when one day as Helen came out of a shop to enter her carriage, someone touched her arm. She turned and saw Harry Graves.

She hardly knew him at first. He was gaunt and thin. His clothes were ill-fitting, and his hands looked hard and brown. Under his wide brimmed hat were the same dark eyes—only now they had a wild look that terrified her.

"Why, Harry," she cried, offering her hand, "when did you get back?"

He said nothing and seemed not to see her hand. He looked at the coachman in his fur cape, at the dainty little carriage, with its green satin cushions, then at her, clad in rich furs and picturesque hat.

"Won't you come home with me to dinner?" she asked timidly. "I would like you to meet my husband."

He shook his head and murmured hoarsely:

"I am going back to Australia. I only came—I did not know."

Then he turned his head away.

She got into the carriage and laid her head back upon the cushions. She was very pale. The coachman shut the door with a sharp slam, then drove away.

She sat for a while as in a dream. Once her lips moved as she whispered:

"Poor Harry, I had forgotten him."

She dressed as usual for dinner, said good-night to the two little girls who were in the nursery, then sat by the library fire and waited for her husband.

The carriage had been gone a long time, and still he did not come. He was usually the most punctual of men.

At last she began to worry; a terrible thought came into her head. How wild Harry looked, what if—oh, why did he not come?

At last there was the sound of wheels and someone entered the side door. She arose, her heart beating wildly.

Just then the butler came to the library door.

"There has been a little accident, ma'am, and the master——"

She heard no more. With a scream she rushed past him into the hall, then into the arms of her husband, who was just removing his muddy and dripping coat. Then she hung about his neck sobbing and murmuring words of endearment.

"Why, Helen!" he cried. "Helen!"

His face seemed transfigured as he bent over her, and gently drew her into the library. The butler retired to the kitchen.

"The dinner is just about spoilt," said the cook gloomily.

"Never mind," chuckled James, "they won't never know the difference."

"What's the matter?" cried the children's maid. "I thought I heard somebody scream!"

The butler told them.

"She loves him, then," said the cook, as if surprised.

"I should say so—that lovely new dress against his muddy coat," replied the maid. "What did he do, James?"

"Do," said James scornfully, "what 'ud any man do with a pair of pretty arms round his neck? I must say he acted quite like a young man, did master."

The cook, who was a grass widow, sighed as she stirred her soup, while the maid blushed and looked coquettishly at James.

* * * * *

On the deck of a second rate steamer, sat a man with a wide-brimmed hat pulled over his eyes. He was quite motionless for hours as if absorbed in thought. He seemed unconscious of everything. Above the noise of wind, wave and machinery, another sound seemed ever in his ears—a sound that had been like a death knell to his hopes. It was the slam of a carriage door.

By GEORGE C. WALLIS.

SUMMARY OF PART I.

The opposing factions in the public games of ancient Constantinople were known as the "Blues and Greens." The Emperor and Empress favoured the Blues, and consequently the enmity that existed between the two factions was so strong that they could not meet in the streets without coming to blows.

Rhesus, a country youth from Sicily, lands at Constantinople with his friend, Proclus, and with a fixed determination to become famous as a gladiator. He adopts the cause of the Greens, and the first contest in which he takes part is a chariot race, which he would have won had it not been for the foul play of Hermiot, his opponent of the Blues.

Rhesus falls in love with Eutasia, a pretty little waif of the circus, of twelve years, who speedily becomes warmly attached to him.

A few years pass and Eutasia is affianced to Rhesus.

One night Proclus and Rhesus chance to overhear a plot between Hypatius, a claimant to the throne, Marcen, a gladiator of the green faction, and Hermiot of the Blues, to raise the city in revolt, remove Justinian from the throne, and make Hypatius emperor in his place.

Hypatius proceeds to take them singly down to the flooded catacombs under the ground upon which they are standing, where he has vast treasures stored with which he purposes to buy the sympathies of the people. Marcen goes with him first, leaving Hermiot on the watch. Rhesus and Proclus spring out upon Hermiot, bind and gag him. Upon the return of Hypatius and Marcen, Proclus assumes the blue sash of Hermiot, personates Hermiot under the cover of the darkness, and goes down into the catacombs with Hypatius in order to discover the whereabouts of the treasure.

Meanwhile it occurs to Marcen that if he were to cut off the only means of egress from the catacombs, his fellow conspirators will be heard of no more, and he will be the sole possessor of the hidden treasure. He returns to the entrance of the catacombs, followed by Rhesus, who watches him carry out his murderous designs. Marcen discovers the presence of Rhesus and rushes at him. Rhesus eludes him, and a hot chase follows. Rhesus finally gives Marcen the slip, and, together with Pelak, a charioteer of the Greens, returns to the catacombs in order to release his friend Proclus. Upon arriving there, however, they find someone has been before them, and the place is empty.

PART THE SECOND.

"In the Toils of Treachery."

CHAPTER I.

The Key of the Treasure.

Overworn with exertion and want of sleep, Rhesus came up the stairs and let the stone fall into its place again. Then, judging that no attempt would be made upon the treasure during the day, he arranged to meet Pelak the following night just after dusk, and the two parted, Rhesus making the best speed possible towards home.

To his inexpressible joy, who should meet him as he entered the peristyle but his friend, dressed in his usual attire. He thanked the gods for it, and for all his stoicism, his eyes were dim with unshed tears. He sank on the couch exhausted, and as Proclus bade the slaves wash his feet, and set before him a draught of reviving wine, and a goodly meal, he told the exciting incidents of the night.

"It seems to me," he said in conclusion, "that we have been drawn into a most complicated conspiracy, and one that is likely to bring us into trouble."

Proclus did not answer at first, but stood gazing through the casement into the dark-avenued garden in silence, nor until Rhesus had finished the meal did he speak.

"You have assuredly had a busy night," he said, "and a most narrow escape, and now, I should think, you will begin to see the reason of my cynicism. Who is there one can trust in this accursed city; who worth one's consideration, saving only as to what service can be got out of them? A plague on them all! But that's neither the one thing nor the other. Plot or no plot, it will go hard with us if we cannot get enough of that tremendous hoard in the Hall of Waters to make your fortune and replenish mine—I am a sad squanderer—and enable us to shake the dust of this corrupted place from our feet for ever. I am weary of it all, and I think I will travel. And think what a fortune would mean to you, Rhesus! Power, name, Eutasia, and the opening of your father's door to you again. We must foil these traitors, and particularly that arch-villain, Marcen—who is no doubt on your track even now—and secure this treasure for ourselves."

"But how, Proclus?"

"That you will understand better when I have answered your first question as to my adventures while you were racing over the city."

Then he told Rhesus of the Hall of Waters, which many knew by repute, but few had seen, owing to the few inroads to it, and the danger of getting lost therein—small though it really was—where the treasure was secreted, how vast it was, and how he and Pompey and Hypatius came to the top of the stairs to find the stone fast.

"And you were so near and acted so foolishly," he went on. "Well, that is over. One cannot pluck good opportunities from the clutch of the flying past. I must own that I felt the chill of the shades on my face, Rhesus, when the stone refused to move, but fortunately I preserved my disguise as Hermiot and kept my tongue pretty still. The brothers suspected Marcen at once, and said so—I felt sure of it, but affected to laugh the idea to scorn. The torches we had steadily burnt down, until at last we each held one alight and had no more. Then the others gave way to utter despair. I left them, and in a careless, aimless manner, went alone down the steps and back to the treasure. Anything was better than inaction.

"About half way down the last passage I noticed a curious projection on the left wall, make the sloping tunnel at that place rather narrow, and a close scrutiny showed that the broad stone which stood out was of a different nature to the wall. It was smooth and shining, where that was rough and dull, and had sundry tracings cut on its face. Holding my flaring torch close to these tracings, I saw at once that it was an inscription in the ancient Assyrian characters, which I—and two others only—had learnt to decipher when I studied at Athens. So far as I know, no one in Constantinople, saving myself, can read them, and therefore the plotters had passed them by—as, doubtless, plotters and criminals and refugees have passed them by for generations—in ignorance. I hastened to read the inscription, thinking to perchance discover a way of escape. With patience and the exercise of memory, I translated it, and in our tongue it would run thus:

"'I, Imgur, once the favourite of Hatensit, the Queen "of Nineveh, being cast into this noisome dungeon to "die, do hereby bequeath my hatred to the world in its "folly and sin, and hurl my maledictions at her whose "wayward fancy has thus requited my loyal service and "deep love. And lest any should be cast here in the self-"same plight, in this foul vault under this far fortress of "our empire, I leave behind me the key of this sliding "stone; so peradventure, when the assassins come to "finish their task, they may, like me, move back the "stone and seek death instead in the quiet water below, "in the blackness of the pool that is so near my prison. "Search diligently the edges of this stone until thou "seest a small round hole on each side—a hole that "will admit the passage of a finger—and then count "two stones away downward from the right-hand hole. "The third will yield to the pressure of the hand at "either end, swinging on a central pivot, and in the "dark recess behind is a long slender key that fits the "holes above. Place it therein and turn it twice "round, and the stone will fall across the passage or "recede to its resting-place, according as it may be at "the time. This secret was told me by one who loved "me, but whom I loved not; one who knew of my "doom and could not help me otherwise; one, who for "love of me, bought it from the builder of the fortress "with her kisses, and then slew him.'

"It was no message of hope for a man to read who felt that the same or a worse doom was his," went on Proclus, "but it took my thoughts away from my own misery for a while, and I stood in mute contemplation of the writing and the memory of the ages and the nations that have passed since the hand of Imgur scratched it on the stone; and I reflected that if that deep dungeon was there in his day it must be old indeed—older, perchance, than the Christians would have us believe the world to be. But presently my thoughts took a fresh turn. If Imgur's writing was true and the key was still in its recess, it was in my power to close up the passage and bar the way, and I alone would know the secret.

"With trembling hands—for, for the moment, I had forgotten the helplessness of my position—I found the swinging slab and the key behind it, and with a grim smile of exultation, pressed it in the small hole on the left of the smooth rock and turned it twice. By the expiring flame of my torch I saw the great mass move forward from the top, with a slow falling motion. Noiselessly, almost steadily it came down, and at last settled with a dull shock upon the floor. It rose to the roof and touched both sides, filling the square of the passage. And then my torch began to flicker with the last efforts of its flame.

"The horror of my situation came back upon me in full force then, and I hesitated, before I rowed back and joined the others, whether to keep the key or not. However, I placed it in the folds of my sleeve, and went back, landing at the foot of the steps as the last red ember of the pine-branch smouldered out, and stumbled to the top. The other two sat in darkness also, but just as I reached them footsteps sounded overhead and a heavy crash, and presently the flag was raised, dim light shone down, and someone cried to us to come out. That someone was——"

"I hastened to read the inscription."

"Hermiot!" cried Rhesus, remembering that he had escaped.

"No," said Proclus, "Marcen. Who more likely?"

"But he wished to imprison you all there until you died of starvation!" Rhesus cried. "And I saw him in the chariot of the Empress not long before I came to rescue you."

"That may be," said his friend. "But who more likely than he, I repeat, when he knew that you had discovered his treachery and evaded his vengeance? And, surely, the steeds of the Empress would take him thither swifter than you or Pelak could walk. And he was in great haste, too, and laid our imprisonment to your charge. We needed little bidding to leave the gruesome place and get out of the mephitic exhalations that were suffocating us slowly, and still preserving my identity concealed, I made excuse to be away on urgent business. As I ran round the angle of the wall I saw a couple of monks bending over the prostrate form of Hermiot and unloosing his bonds. I barely got out of sight before he was liberated, and my last glance back from the shelter of an empty dwelling's portal was of the meeting of the four plotters and their expressions of consternation and amazement. I stayed to see no more, but came here without delay, intending to seek you when I had changed my attire and eaten. And now you are here."

"But who wrote my name in the dust where Hermiot had been?" asked Rhesus, bewildered.

"Who else, again, but Marcen, to show that he knew you? We shall have to play our game with subtle skill, Rhesus, to overmatch that arch-traitor, but I think I have the best of matters so far, in possessing this key, even if he suspects its existence and that I have it."

"But he cannot know of it at all, nor of your identity when you personated Hermiot!" cried Rhesus incredulously. "And why carry it about with you—why not have left it in the secret recess?"

Pelak knocked thrice.

"My young friend," said Proclus gravely, "I will wager that he knows already that it was I who took Hermiot's place. Think. He was, up to to-day, a champion of the Green, yet we know him to be in league with the Empress, who favours the Blue. He is a traitor to both factions, then—to Theodora as well, very likely—and he means as we do, to secure this treasure for himself. He will have spies everywhere—amongst the slaves of his own household, in the palace, at the hippodrome—and they will by this time have told him of our movements last night, when I returned, and how, and where your friend Pelak now is. He will see at once that we know the secret, and will argue, from the fact that we stay at home, that we have either set men to watch the entrance or have discovered something that he has not.

"To lead him astray I have already sent two experienced ruffians to keep an eye on the convent and report to me his doings. As for keeping the key, Rhesus, there is no other way, for the secret recess is on the lower side of the great rock door, and the door is shut. It is a curious piece of workmanship, is it not?"

He drew from his sleeve very carefully a long thin rod of bronze, with a curious design cut into one end and a round handle formed at the other.

"It is very old," said Rhesus, examining it with interest, "and it would be difficult to imitate. We must guard it well. And much as I should like the half of this wealth, for it would mean, as you say, Eutasia and home for me—I think we had better let it be in safety for awhile let the ides of January pass, and see whether Hypatius relinquishes his plot or no."

"That will be the better plan," said Proclus. "And when you are rested we will go and make arrangements with old Sibron for the games, and see Eutasia."

CHAPTER II.

In the Shadow of St. Sophia.

When Marcen escaped from the mêlée in his patron's chariot, he was raging bitterly at his foolishness in not having been more careful when he entered the convent for the second time. Yet he masked his chagrin with a good-humoured smile as he turned to answer Theodora's questions.

"It is true, your Majesty," he said, "that I have not yet discovered the exact whereabouts of this hidden treasure, but I know that it is somewhere near the Convent of St. Conan. Will your Majesty drive me thither swiftly? I was on my way there to keep watch on these conspirators, when I got entangled in this rabble."

And in his mind, Marcen was at that very moment resolving to liberate the said conspirators, since by so doing he could shift the blame of their imprisonment on other shoulders. They were certain to be rescued, now Rhesus and perhaps others knew of their position; and who better fitted to free them than himself?

Whilst he thought, Theodora gave orders to her driver, and they were rolled rapidly across the city. On the way the Empress pursued her queries, Marcen answering as vaguely as possible; and reposing a fuller confidence in him than was usual with her, she agreed to let the plot of Hypatius go on until the day of its dénouement, and then unmask all the traitors at once and wring the secret of the wealth from them.

"Always providing, my Marcen," she said, with a warning gesture, "that you do not discover it yourself in the meantime."

"Always providing that," he echoed, smiling inscrutably. "And before I leave the sun of your presence, Majesty, for the darkness of this intrigue, I would pray of you a favour that you can easily grant."

"Say on, most useful of men. There is much I would give you for your past services alone."

"It is only a little matter to you, perhaps, Empress, but it means a great deal to me. There is a maid I love to distraction, and whom, I have courage to believe, I could teach to love me in return by the time she comes of marriageable age; but she is kept at the house of crusty old Sibron, under the patronage and love-designs of that very Rhesus I spoke of to you yesterday, that meddling country youth, who flaunts his paganism in our faces and has been overheard to utter veiled treason. Could you buy this maid for your own service in the palace, I might yet hope. Her name is Eutasia, and a pretty little golden-haired witch she is."

"I have seen the wilful jade often," said Theodora. "It is a thousand pities that she is not given a better chance in life. I grant you your request without more words. She shall enter the palace this very day."

And leaving Marcen returning thanks with a real gratitude, the Royal harpy drove away.

Marcen turned down the passage and set free his friends, as Proclus has told us; but his confidence received a ruder shock than it had yet done when he found that Hermiot had never been in the Hall of Waters—that someone unknown had been in his place, penetrated their whole secret, and yet got away safely and still unknown. He raved and called on all the saints in the calendar, and blank surprise and deadly fear sat heavily on the faces of his three friends.

"It is the work of that pair of wretches who thought me their friend!" he cried. "'Tis Rhesus and Proclus who have spied on us and unearthed our plans! It is clear that we cannot pursue our scheme at present. We must wait."

"But why, and for what?" asked Hypatius.

"Because our intentions are known and our secret also, and the slightest move on our part would bring all to public notice. At the same time they know we are desperate men, and beyond trying to secure the treasure themselves, will not molest us if we refrain from action. In that case we must set a watch on the convent and endeavour to trap them here or elsewhere, and make away with them quietly. Failing that we shall doubtless find means to bring about their ruin at the circus, for a riot is almost certain when the games begin, and it is hinted that Justinian contemplates strong measures if the green faction proves troublesome. After that, we shall be free to proceed with our project."

Deceived by the words of their co-plotter, the three men agreed to his plan, and promising that the convent should be well watched and guarded, parted with assurances of mutual fidelity.

Marcen, too cautious to return to his own house now that the news of his change of colour was abroad, sought the private palace of Theodora, on the shores of Propontis, and there, later in the day, received and welcomed little Eutasia in her new finery of silk embroidered robes and pearl-crusted tiara. She, not knowing but that the hour of her good fortune had arrived, greeted him merrily, and was full of praise for the great Theodora, who, seeing in her a useful tool for the future, had exercised upon the impressionable girl those graces of speech and manner that had won her so much in the past.

But there was a note of regret in the girl's happiness because she had not bidden farewell to her Rhesus, because he did not know of her success; and Marcen, inwardly full of wrath at her fancy, had to promise that he would bring them together in the garden next day.

"It is a perilous thing to do," said he, "for the green badge is not in favour here, and there are sharp-eyed spies in hiding everywhere. But I will risk much for you, my blue-eyed beauty, and I will bring Rhesus—if he dares to come!"

The giant staggered for an instant.

"Rhesus will dare anything for me, because he loves me," said Eutasia boldly, "but you must be careful, Marcen, or I shall not like you. Tell him I will walk in the garden every night, under the trees over there, with the leaves of gold."

Marcen repeated his promise, and with less reluctance now, for his fertile brain saw a chance of making his rival's love lead to his rival's destruction, and before night fell, he had made his preparations.

* * * * *

Rhesus, not knowing the depth of the world's cunning, fell easily into the trap. When he and his friend entered the hippodrome and greeted old Sibron heartily, they found him strangely silent and morose. He answered their questions regarding the condition of the horses and bears, and who was to drive in the race, and how the betting stood, very grudgingly and shortly, and listened to their nocturnal adventure with scant attention. At last Rhesus grew impatient, and asked where Eutasia was, who was usually so ready to meet him in the portico. Sibron's brow blackened yet more at that, and he replied:

"It is just that saucy minx who troubles me. She has gone."

"Gone!" shouted Rhesus. "Where? By Zeus, but if you have let her come to any harm, you and I are friends no more, old fox!"

"A thousand maledictions rest on me!" cried Sibron, "but, in faith, I had no choice. 'Tis not so long ago, but just after dawn, that the Empress came dashing up in her golden car, and seeming to have forgotten her enmity to our colour, bade me bring the little maid to her. Though suspecting something wrong, I was unable to make excuse, and so, nothing loth, I can tell you, the little one came smiling and spoke a pretty greeting to Theodora. The Empress talked very flatteringly of her beauty and charm, and in the end asked her to become one of her serving girls in the palace. Eutasia drew back from the thought at first, wondering if you would like it, but Theodora painted such a picture of bright scenes and gay company and rich dresses and an amplitude of gold, that the maid would have no nay but she must go; and when asked to go there and then, was in transports of delight. I would have dissuaded her, but she tossed her head impatiently, and, Theodora pressed for a decision; and when a sovereign requests she commands. So she has left us, and it seems to me as though the sun shines not so brightly as it shone yesterday."

"And left she no message for me?" asked Rhesus, growing cold with fear.

"She had no time, so imperious and urgent was her Majesty, but she did slip this into my hand unperceived, and bid me give it to you. And I knew no more."

"This" was a thin ring of gold that Rhesus had beaten out for her from an old coin, and which she had worn ever since, and he placed on his little finger straightway. And how often, in danger and despair, in solitude and sorrow, on distant seas and in a far land, did that tiny memento revive his courage and recall her face.

"You should have kept her from that harpy's clutches at least a day, until I had seen her," said Rhesus. "However, all is not yet lost. Gold will do much amongst the pampered minions of the palace, and I shall snatch my jewel from the Empress and Marcen yet—for this is his doing, I'll swear. Do not grieve so, my worthy Sibron; if I can hope, who have lost all if I have lost her, you need not despair. Let us put our heads together, and we will confound the plots of all these renegades and wretches. The gods help those who help themselves, and Rhesus the Roman, as the urchins of the gutters call me, is on his mettle! We have frustrated one sedition already; we will prove that strong arms and resolute wills can do yet more!"

The old man, steeped in the cunning of the time, smiled grimly at the younger's determination—and Proclus made a cynical grimace, but as the first promised secrecy and advice and the latter declared that he would help with all his heart and soul, Rhesus went away more buoyant than the position warranted.

The city was already seething with the ferment of the approaching holiday; the drivers of the chariots practised daily in the circus, and more than one met his death at the hands of the roving assassins who hourly grew more insolent; the arrogance and oppressions of the blues grew steadily more intense; and so Rhesus had need of care in his nightly efforts to get speech with his stolen love. He bribed several of the sentinels to let him into the palace gardens after dusk, and once got right to the casement of Theodora's gilded chamber and peered in; but the one he sought he saw not. Sometimes Proclus went with him, sometimes Pelak the charioteer, and sometimes—though seldom—grey-haired Sibron himself, whose rough nature his fair charge had softened wonderfully; but as the days went by and they were still successless, Rhesus began to despair.

At last, on the eve of the fête-day, he encountered Pelak in the gate of the arena, and saw good tidings written on his face. They passed along the palace front without a word, looking to their weapons as they went; and not until they stood in the shadow of the battlemented walls of St. Sophia, did Rhesus ask what news. Pelak answered; "The best." He had bribed his way judiciously with the money Rhesus had given him, to the inner parts of the imperial residence, and had discovered there an old friend long lost. He had found that Eutasia usually escaped into the garden an hour before midnight, but only for a short time and always watched; and that Marcen now lived in the palace and was with her every day.

"My friend gave me instructions how to evade the outer guards easily," said Pelak. "So you must take note of what I say. Follow me in silence, now."

They emerged from the shadow and crossed the open space towards the palace again, then skirted the fortress-like wall of the garden until they came to a small gate. On this Pelak knocked thrice, and it was at once opened. They passed in in silence, and in silence a shrouded figure closed it behind them. They stood on the edge of a thick grove of fragrant-smelling sandal trees now, and the two great domes of the palace, as well as some of the statues and pillars of Parian marble about it, stood out dimly vast in the starlight. Pelak then plunged into the grove, the other following, and at the farther side, where grew a bed of brilliant flowers, and beyond which waved a row of artificial trees with foliage of beaten gold and birds of wood with jewelled wings perched in their branches—a luxury bought with the ransom of many humble lives—stopped, and bade Rhesus, in a whisper, go on.

"Cross the open space quickly," he said, "and shelter under the third tree. If the sentry sees you in passing, you will know how to deal with him—and you must not hesitate. If the soldier on this side sees you, I shall be ready. And if we are discovered by Marcen we must climb the wall about a dozen paces below the gate. Hasten."

Rhesus needed no telling, for now was his chance or never. The night was in his favour, and he sped across the well-kept paths with the feet of a deer and gained the shade of the costly trees, and there looked towards the palace that held his love.

Lights multitudinous gleamed from the marble casements and shone on the statuary of the balconies and the garden; the sound of light laughter and the tinkle of wine-cups came from the banquet-room where Theodora—comedian, profligate, and Empress—dispensed her hospitality to her favourites of the hour; and presently, on the spice-laden air, rang the wild, gay notes of a Bacchanal song. And in that nest of intrigue and infamy, of wine and wealth and wickedness, his sweet Eutasia was a prisoner—a willing prisoner, perchance—a victim to the glamour of its gold, the exquisite aroma of its Maronean wine, and the flattery and false tales of Marcen the renegade, his bitterest foe!

As he gazed at that splendid pile and thought these rankling thoughts, a figure moved across the grass towards him with a measured tread. A battle-axe glinted as it swung in his hand, and as he passed within an arm's length of where Rhesus stood, the latter saw that he was a Briton from the far-west isles. A brawny, iron-limbed man with great sinews, a type of the men who had made the Imperial Guard a terror to all rebels, and the pride of their master. Twice he passed Rhesus unsuspectingly, before she for whom that waiting heart yearned came pacing slowly down the path, and entered the little avenue.

In a flutter of excitement, Rhesus stepped forward to fashion out the fair vision more clearly from the dimness, and for that one moment forgot the sentinel. He had just passed, but heard the rustle of the movement and turned his head. Rhesus had no time, nor choice. He sprang forward suddenly, ere the other could move, placed his foot against the Briton's back, his arms round his neck, and put forth all his strength. The giant staggered for an instant and an inarticulate gurgle came from his throat; he reeled, something in his neck gave way, cracking with a horrible sound, and over they both rolled on the soft turf. When Rhesus freed himself the other lay dead, and Eutasia was at his side, terror in her wide blue eyes. He seized her hand and drew her under the trees.

"I had to do it for my life's sake and yours, Merry-one," said he, between the kisses that, despite her reluctance, he bestowed upon her, "and now—and now—" And now the words of advice and appeal he had thought would be so ready, suddenly failed him.

"What have you done, Rhesus?" she asked, struggling out of his embrace and glancing hurriedly at the silent figure on the grass. "You have neglected me and my messages these nine days, and now you condescend to come you must needs slay Beric—an honest and good-natured soldier, who was only doing his duty. And you gave him no chance of defence, you coward!"

She attitudinised before him like a comedy-queen-of-passion, and but for the danger of the position, Rhesus could have laughed aloud at her youthful gravity, and praised her ruddy beauty at one and the same time. But instead he took her hand and spoke seriously.

"I had to kill him, child, or he would have given the alarm, and we might both have been slain or imprisoned. And I want to get you away from here quietly; if not to-night, to-morrow-eve—this painted palace of revelry is no place for your sweet soul."

"Why, Rhesus?" she asked, drawing away from him again. "You talk strangely to-night. I thought you would have been glad because of my good-luck in getting here, where everything is nice and one is always merry. I thought you loved me; I shall think Marcen is better than you, for he says that I have done well and shall be a great lady some day if he can have his way."

"He is a lying villain!" cried Rhesus impetuously. "He has attempted my life already, and has only lured you here to keep you out of my way. Don't trust him; don't believe him at all. I will tell you why when I have more time. If you love me as you used to do, Eutasia—as I love you—be ready to meet me here to-morrow night while the feast of the games is being eaten in the banquet-room, and I will take you to a place of safety. I shall have riches soon, and we can leave the city and go far away."

Eutasia hesitated a moment, then pouted.

"I don't want to go away from here. It is gay and pleasant, and I have always lived in the city.. And I don't believe Marcen is as bad as you say; you are jealous, that is all. I will not go, Rhesus, and if you like me you will let me have my own way. If you had liked me you would have answered the little letters I sent you. But you know where to find me now, and I must go in before they miss Beric, and come to seek him."

"Eutasia!" he cried, as she turned away, "stay only a moment! let me tell you why! see how I cherish your ring! Ah!"

A warning whistle came from the grove behind, waving lights were approaching from the palace, and voices called to each other. Rhesus had but one glimpse of her pretty face, wreathed with petulance, as she cried: "Hasten, Rhesus, for your life!" and of her light form flitting over the sward; then he turned and ran for the sandal trees and joined Pelak. They gained the wall unseen, and clambered over, grazing their shins and knuckles in their hurry, and fled beside the church, in the deep shadow of its sacred stones.

As they went three men suddenly stepped out from a little recess and stood before them with bows drawn, and discharging their arrows simultaneously, rushed forward with spiked maces in hand. Pelak fell with a shaft in his breast, but as he went down, his battle-axe flew from his hand with true aim, and clove open the head of the foremost assassin. The second Rhesus disabled with his sword at first stroke, and the third, seeing his reckless daring, took to his heels without a blow. Rhesus wasted no time in pursuit, but sank on his knees beside Pelak and strove to restore animation to his still form.

It was useless, and registering a deep vow by all the gods to bring retribution on the slayers, or those who had set them on, he went over to where the wounded man lay groaning, and placed the wet edge of his keen blade on his throat.

"One movement, one cry, and I press down this sword," he said. "Tell me, in a word, who paid you and your comrades to waylay us here?"

The man was silent; defiance was in his eyes.

"Answer, and truly, or I end your wretched life here and now!" cried Rhesus. "If I leave you you will be found, and may recover. Answer, or meet your end. Who paid you?"

"Marcen, the gladiator," he said sullenly.

Not deigning him another word, Rhesus put back his blade in its sheath and left him, and picking up the body of Pelak, bore it to his home. And he knew not which was the heavier weight—the burden upon his shoulders, or the burden of sorrow upon his soul at the words Eutasia had spoken in the garden.

AMBER.

"Another expedition starting out for the North Pole, I see," said I, reading aloud from the evening paper. "Really, these expeditions to the North Pole should be stopped. They do no good, and are a nuisance."

"You don't seem to take much interest in the North Pole," said my companion.

I looked at him. There was a peculiar ring in his voice, a singular scrutiny in his eye. I had not known him long, but circumstances had thrown us together at a friend's house. She had told me that Maurice Connor was a scientific man, a great traveller; that something unpleasant had happened, no one quite knew what, in connection with one of his explorations; but still he was a nice fellow, and very interesting.

"Well, no, I can't say that I do," I responded; "I think, to begin with, that there is no such thing as the North Pole."

"No such thing?" he repeated.

"Of course there is a spot of ice, or snow, or frozen land at that particular point of the earth, but as for there being anything mysterious or wonderful about it, or worth investigating, I simply refuse to believe it."

"And yet the expeditions still continue," he said slowly.

"Why, what's the matter with you? You look so strange in your eyes. Have I said anything I ought not? If you have a pet theory on the subject, kindly forget my remarks."

Though he made no reply, I was fascinated by the peculiar little red flame burning in his eyeball. Suddenly I felt that the man was repressing himself by a violent effort.

I became curious at once, and, unconscious of any reason why I should not, began to question him.

"You have a secret you are afraid you will tell me, haven't you? But I won't tell anyone. What is it about? Not the North Pole, surely? Oh, it is! Why, you haven't been there, have you? Tell me all about it; I should be only too pleased to believe, if I could. Come, be generous; share this secret with me."

It was some time before my importunity had any effect; then, rather unwillingly, he said:

"Well, I will tell you, though you must promise, in return, that you will not repeat what I say until I give you permission."

To this I willingly assented. And then he told me that he had joined an expedition going North some five years before, and, after describing the usual vicissitudes attendant upon these explorations, he continued:

"We were frozen in, as always happens. Weeks passed, and I got tired of inaction. One morning I started off alone, intending to go a short distance. But I went too far and became lost in that awful region.

"I will not describe my sufferings. After wandering about for three days, and when I was nearly done for, I fell in with some Esquimaux.

"They were far from their settlement, and I was glad to go in any direction, for they knew nothing of the ship and could not be induced to help me to find my companions, and I knew that if I did not go with them I should die.

"I was not very strong when first I met with Immu, the Esquimau, his two sons and their sledge with five dogs; but after being with them a few days, a new feeling came into my blood. I was so delighted at my rescue that I gained new strength, and prepared for some interesting experiences.

"I saw that Immu was making his way due North, and came to the conclusion he belonged to the extreme Northern tribes. Of course, I was consumed with curiosity to know everything about our route. At last, one day, when it was fearfully stormy, travelling became very bad, and Immu decided to build a snow hut and remain in its shelter till the worst was over.

"I will not stop to tell you the details of our stay. There came a sudden change and lull in the storm, and we decided to move on. It was strange how different the air was. Immu several times shook his head and, with his sons, examined the ground. Later, I discovered what was the matter; the sudden change in temperature had affected what seemed to be the solid earth beneath our feet.

"There were cracks and fissures dimly outlined on the surface as we proceeded. Immu and his sons held a conference; but we could do nothing, it seemed. We could neither push forward or go back. A seal thrust out his head, and that, for the moment, made us forget all else until we had him skinned and packed for provision for the future.

"It is needless to say we found we were on an ice-floe, and with nothing to do but to accept the situation. The weather became warmer, and Immu and his sons shook their heads ominously. I had not mastered their dialect yet, but made out that some misfortune was awaiting us.

"It bothered me very little. If this meant death, I was no worse off than I had been; and if not death, there was adventure before me, which was just suited to my frame of mind. I might be on the verge of a great discovery; anything was possible in these frigid regions.

"Those 'warm currents!' I had heard of them always in fanciful legend and story; were they to be proved?

"Well, we floated due North. I don't know what kind of a current it was. It seemed to me it was like a stream on its first course, not quite decided in its direction; it was very slow, making no haste at all. We had provisions for some days, and so had no immediate fears.

"Then, one day, came an unusual sight: a flock of geese, far overhead, with their familiar cry. That, too, I had heard of. Immu was greatly excited, and talked with his sons, still predicting misfortune. I hardly knew how it was, but the change of weather had affected us all very much, we were oppressed and demoralised. Even the sledge dogs felt the influence and howled incessantly.

"I don't know whether it was the result of fever, but I certainly lost my head for several days. When I came to, I found myself on a pleasant green shore, Immu was standing near, in a dazed state, with two of his dogs, but naught did I see of his sons. A magnificent aurora was playing over the sky in ribbons of the rainbow, so that at first I had a vague idea that we were both dead and that this was the gate leading into Heaven. I remember that I thought it rather strange that the dogs should be there, too.

"Coming towards us, I saw several figures, and was almost confirmed in my idea of the nearness to the regions above, for they certainly were angelic in appearance.

"'If I were on earth, I should be tempted to call them albinos,' I said to myself.

"They were pinkish white as to skin, and had phenomenal hair, snow-white, wavy, and standing out round the head in a sort of halo about two feet in diameter.

"Their garments were loose and simple, made of oddly woven material, unlike anything I had ever seen. As they came nearer I saw that their eyes were not pink, as I had expected, but were of a topaz colour, giving more strength to the countenance than has the ordinary albino.

"Of course we could not reply to their questions, and one of them produced a curious instrument, one end of which he rested on my head, the other on his own. By some power, which I did not comprehend, he conveyed to me his thoughts in questions, and I replied to them by thought. I suppose it was a 'thought-telephone,' if there is such a thing in creation.

"Very kindly they told me I was welcome, and invited us to partake of their hospitality. I presume I was still light-headed, for I asked something about whether this was the land of the dead or the land of the living, which query my questioner immediately repeated to his two companions, and all three seemed much excited.

"He responded through the thought-telephone, 'Come, let us learn of each other, for there is much to know for us both.'

"Now, I cannot stop for details. I have it all written out, in case I need it. But in telling this to you, I shall condense my experience into as few words as possible.

"We had reached a remarkable part of the earth's surface, as I soon found out. As in some better known northern latitude, next to the great glaciers, grew beautiful forms of green vegetation, almost rankly—trees, plants, and ferns. There was one large citadel, or community-house, in which it seemed, these strange people lived. Their form of government was the community idea elaborated and made practical.

"It took me some time to understand, even faintly, what kind of a land I was in, and what kind of people they were. All of our latest inventions were here realised and applied practically—things which, of course, I can no more explain than I can Tesla's discoveries, for instance.

"You have heard of the loadstone of the North Pole? This was used for a building material for their citadel, which loomed up like an immense tower of Babel. From the sea's quantities of jet and amber were washed up, and these materials they had put to a thousand beautifying purposes of which we have never dreamt. The only iron they had was such as was drawn to the shore in old wrecks, many of which I saw cast up on the beach—wrecks from time immemorial. I could go on for hours, telling you of these things in detail; but these are of the least importance, compared with other things which bewildered me, and which were beyond my comprehension then, and are now.

"After being restored to health, Immu and I were taken to a council chamber, and there met what seemed to be a committee, who asked us many questions, and by some kind of a quick process carved the answers on blocks of slate, of which material there was a vast quantity in their land. Naturally I was puzzled by the absence of paper.

"Finally, however, the facts of the case dawned upon me. It was indeed 'a land of the living'—for so seldom did one of these strange people die that everything was contrived and arranged to last a long time. Therefore they had no use for paper. If a thing was too trivial to be worth recording they let it perish at inception. Only that which was of value was ever preserved. And if it was seldom that any one of this strange tribe tasted death, so also was it seldom that any one was born, and which, of course, balanced things so evenly that there was no excess population.

"Their customs were the reverse of ours. They mourned when a babe was born and rejoiced and held festivities when one of their number passed away."

As Mr. Connor was telling me this wonderful tale I simply grew more and more fascinated, so that I could not utter a word. But, finally, at this point, I managed to ask a question which it was impossible to withhold longer.

"But, Mr. Connor, did you ever see any of the women? And what were they like?"

"They were just like the men; you could not tell them apart. The men had no beards, and their hair was arranged just the same as that of the women, and they all wore the same sort of garments—a kind of loose princess gown, with clasps of amber and gold down the front. These garments, by the way, were woven of material to serve as non-conductors of electricity; the air there was surcharged with the fluid, and they had learnt how to resist it, as well as how to utilise it. It was the electricity which made their hair stand out so strangely. They used it for a thousand purposes of which we know nothing. Their laboratories were built outside the citadel-house and made a separate city, as it were, they were so numerous.

"One of the first things I noticed in 'the land of the living' was the marvellous colours and designs which they produced upon the skies. It was a constant panorama cast upon no less a canvas than the heavens itself."

"You surely can't mean that these people produce the Aurora Borealis at will?" I asked timidly.

"No, it is merely the result of their interference with the laws of electricity as ordinarily prevailing in that region—it is their joy and delight to bend it to their will and make it their servant. You see, they live so long and waste so little time—one capsule a day, serves them for food. As I said, they waste so little time, that they are masters of the earth."

"Mr. Connor, may I ask a question?"

"Certainly."

"Did you like the women?"

"Very much indeed."

"Were they pretty?"

"Just the same as the men."

"Were they young and charming, then? That's what I meant to ask."

"The youngest was fifty years old, as nearly as I could make out, but that didn't count, for her grandmother looked just as youthful as she did. No one was old there. Everyone was the same age, apparently."

"Was that nice?"

"I thought it delightful."

"Did you admire the fifty-year-old young lady?"

"Yes, I will confess I thought her a wonderful human creation. To wisdom she added unconsciousness of self, which alone is a great charm."

"Did you—did you let her know—know that you liked her?"

"Yes."

"What was her name?"

"I gave her a name I thought suited her better than the one she was known by. I called her 'Amber.'"

"Did she—did she like you, Mr. Connor?"

"Yes."

"Well?"

He looked at me questioningly.

"Did they have marriage laws there? Did they let people marry for love?"

"No, everything was pre-arranged with an idea to longevity, and to the welfare of the community. As soon as they had learnt all they could of the customs which prevailed in my land and that of Immu, they gave me to understand that we were to consider ourselves free to return to the country whence we came.

"I made bold to tell them that I admired their country more than I did my own, and that I was willing to adapt myself to their habits and customs, and, finally, of my love for Amber, whom I wished to marry.

"'Love!' ejaculated the chief councillor of the Albino tribe, 'love, indeed! You cannot talk of such infantile things as that to us! Do you think you can come to us out of the childhood of your race, with all its crudities and pitiful ignorance and darkness of intellect, and with your miserable idea of love, graft on to our splendid race in its full manhood, and help to pull it back to the puny stature of your own?

"'Why, by your own showing, you belong to the ephemera—a race which produces a new generation every thirty-three years. One such specimen as yourself, grafted on to ours, would destroy the race entirely. What compensation have you to offer in return for the destruction of this evolved race?'

"I was dumb. No words came to my aid. And do you wonder? I looked at Amber and saw that her eyes were full of tears. She was in reality about like a girl of twenty of our race.

"The councillor went on: 'There is no knowing how much damage you have already done with these ideas of yours—they are s reading, I see. Oh, my daughter, I am surprised at you, to see you shedding tears for a mere ephemera.'

"'Yes, father,' she said meekly.

"'Bid him good-bye, once and for all time. You will never see him again.'

"In that land they never kiss or touch hands. She simply gave me the thought telephone, one end of which I placed on my head. She thought to me and I understood her. 'I will never forget you, beloved, though you may belong to the ephemeral world, it is true. As long as I live—and that will be when you are long turned to clay—still will I dwell in thoughts of you. Often will I, while you live, send you a thought-current, that will tell you that I am thinking of you still with deepest affection. And in the state beyond, perhaps a thousand years from now, we may meet and not be parted.'"

"Was that all?" I asked.

"That night Immu and I and the remaining dog (for one had died in the meantime) were placed on a curious raft with an electrical contrivance for the motive power, and taken away from the strange 'Land of the Living' and the Albino Tribe there dwelling. I presume there was something soporific in the capsules they gave us for food, for both Immu and I were unconscious of ourselves and our whereabouts until we awoke on a shore bleak and sombre.

"Immu seemed to get his bearings in a few hours, however, and we took a line of march which, after several days, led us to familiar ground It was in the direction of the old settlement made by the men of our expedition, whom I had forgotten utterly. But with the remembrance came back looking—I felt I did indeed belong to the ephemera.

"I was pretty well played out with the change of climate, coming back again to the cool so suddenly, and at sight of a shadowy form in the distance, gave out completely.

"It was a party who were making an excursion over the ice. They carried me into a hut, and from there into the ship, the last one taken on board. A roughly-made monument marked the graves of the less fortunate ones who perished in that dismal solitude.

"I had a long illness, in which they said I raved of strange things. Immu, who was brought along with me, nursed me through it faithfully. And when I returned to reason he corroborated the strange experience I had had as well as his limited knowledge of our language would permit. He has since returned to his own land again. The story of the return of the expedition contained nothing remarkable."

"What a strange story," I said meditatively. "I don't wonder expeditions are continuing to go towards the North Pole. But, Mr. Connor, do you really think that love is such a childish thing, and a mark of ignorance? Because, in spite of all that the Albino councillor said, I think that Amber's love for you is its own compensation for everything. Isn't it?"

"Yes."

"And shall you wait a thousand years for her?"

"No."

"Oh, Mr. Connor, why not?"

"Because I am, in reality, only an ephemera."

Told in the Indian Bazaar.

By H. HUNTER.

No. 5.—THE ORIGIN OF RUBIES.

In the seventeenth year of the Emperor Shalivahna, the Royal City of Ilapur was plunged suddenly into mourning. The Princess Vasanti had been carried off by a demon. In three days she was to have been married. The Maharajah of Madanpur, to whom the Princess had been betrothed, had sent swift messengers before him to announce his approach.

On the following day, he was to make his entry into the city. But, alas, for the vanity of human wishes. He found Ilapur clothed in sackcloth and sitting in ashes.

One morning the Princess Vasanti, accompanied by her maidens and attendants, had gone as usual to bathe in the Laughing Light—a beautiful tank on the edge of the tree-jungle—and had vanished in a manner most mysterious and alarming.

Few facts were forthcoming, but such as there were pointed unmistakably to the darkest agency. In what other way indeed, could the disappearance of the Princess be accounted for.

The tank, which the giant Mahisha had excavated in a single night at the bidding of Indra, Lord of the Lower Firmament, was a favourite bathing place with the ladies of the Palace.

It was the Princess Vasanti herself who had named it the Laughing Light; because, as she explained it, the water always thrilled with pleasure under the warm kisses of the ardent sun, while it tried with poor success to hide its smiling features beneath the balmy branches and graceful Llianas which overhung it.

On the fateful morning, the birds sang their sweetest, the monkeys in the tamala trees swung themselves sportively from the lowest limbs to the topmost twigs, and rained down green leaf and purple blossom upon the passers below; black bramra bees buzzed and soft breezes blew, filling the air with pleasant sounds and delicious fragrance.

Everything in nature rejoiced; and the young Princess, whose heart was brimming over with happiness at the thought of her fast approaching marriage with the Maharajah, laughed and chattered with the gaiety of youth as the procession of palanquins wound itself along.

Never had she seemed so full of life and health and spirits as at this time; when the bow was bent and the shaft was drawn.

Learn from this, O ye blind, to expect nothing from Fortune, who ever smiles her sweetest when she is meditating the foulest treachery. Be wise, tempt not the future, and put no trust in the promises of the morning. The man who reckons the blessings of the day before the sun has gone down, is likely to repent of his folly at night.

After they tired of pelting each other with the lovely blossoms of the lotus and the rich crimson flowers of the asokas, the girls descended the steps of the tank and entered the water.

They flung the purifying element over each other in merry sport, they shook it in glittering showers from their shining locks, they made a scoop of their hollowed hands and solemnly poured it over one anothers' pretty heads.

For awhile the Princess watched her companions splashing about in the clear cool depths of the silvery stream; then bidding her maidens remain behind, Vasanti herself went to a mango grove hard by to perform the rites of purification and prayer.

It had been the custom of the Princess whenever she came to bathe in the tank, always to retire to the grove for meditation and worship before returning to the city.

So there was nothing to remark in the request she made to her maidens.

As she did not appear, however, at the usual time, her attendants, who thought it might be merely a test of their fidelity, went in search of her.

Up and down they wandered, looking everywhere for traces of their royal mistress, but finding none.

They scoured every green alley, peeped behind every bush, stared into every fig-tree—not a sign of the Princess was anywhere to be seen. What could it mean?

Something too dreadful for utterance. Speech was arrested on their lips.

They wove flower-spells of the jasmine and the lotus; they called upon Krishna of the woods and forests. It was to no purpose. They looked into each other's faces, and saw only terror and dismay reflected from every countenance.

The Princess had vanished. Nothing was certain but that—and that, alas! was too certain to admit room for the smallest doubt.

The maidens returned to the city weeping and throwing dust upon their heads.

The Emperor listened in profound silence while the Grand Chamberlain told the story. Then everyone waited, scarce daring even to breathe.

"Clearly," said the Emperor at last, after taking time to consider, "it is the work of some malevolent Being, jealous of human happiness."

The jungle swarmed with unclean creatures, Nagas and Bhutas, servants of the Servant of Darkness. Yet the day was so bright and fair, the mango grove so far from the jungle and so close to the tank where the Laughing Light was always running—and everybody knows that there is virtue enough in running water to scare away the boldest imp that ever came out of Naglok*—that the Emperor was sorely puzzled to decide whether Vasanti had been taken to the realms below, or carried to the meads above.

The Chamberlain made a grab at the ring-tailed favourite.

To satisfy his scruples and set the matter at rest, he referred the question to the Nine Gems of Science, who were the ornament of the Court.

They laboured on it till noon, and were allowed only half the usual time for bathing, eating, sleeping, and worship, so anxious was the Emperor to hear their opinion. At 2 p.m. they resumed their labours, which lasted till twilight; and after a short interval for rest they returned to them again till midnight, when the result of their deliberations was communicated to the Emperor on a double sheet of flower-scented rice paper.

After applying to the question the whole force of their united intelligence, the Gems discovered that the Princess Vasanti had been carried off by the demon Ravana, who, to effect his purpose, had disguised himself as a beggar.

She was lovely beyond any woman who lives in kings' houses—were I to begin to describe her, I should never be able to finish—and he was jealous that such a peerless pearl should become the wife of any earthly monarch, though he were a son of Indra himself.

It was Vasanti's exceeding great beauty, said the Gems, which tempted the demon. Alas! excess is always fatal, therefore, be wise, O mortal! who hears this story, and seek no more than is sufficient.

To console the Emperor, the Nine Gems of Science were able to add that Vasanti had been made chief Maid of Honour to Indrani, Queen of Heaven, and slept on a bed of gold and precious stones more glorious than the meridian sun; and that when the Maharajah should ask for her saying:

"Give me my wife;" he was to give him a green mango which a blind beggar would bring from the grove by the water tank, called the Laughing Light, and say:

"Great King, the gods would not permit so much beauty and virtue to be wasted on a mortal. They have taken her for themselves; but to you she has sent this mango. Cherish it as a gift more precious than the half of thy kingdom."

Now it happened that in the cool of the day there came to the water tank by the mango grove, three brothers, Shridat, Bhowat and Vidhat; and of these Shridat was blind, Bhowat was deaf and Vidhat was unable to speak a word. They were the victims of Lakshichara,* who is ever dogging the feet of the children of men; and for daily sustenance depended on the alms of the charitable.

Had they been suffering by the Will of Heaven,† of course it would have been impious to relieve them; but the poor fellows had been overtaken by ill-luck upon "the road," and the wealthy and benevolent saw in them only so many steps to a seat under the Celestial tree in Indra's Paradise, where the wish of every virtuous soul is gratified sooner than it can be expressed; so there was always honey and butter and rice for to-day; and as Shridat would often observe, who knows what may happen to-morrow.

He had just delivered himself for the thousand-and-first time of this excellent observation, and was sitting down with Bhowat and Vidhat to the frugal repast which formed their evening meal; when, a stranger, approaching, asked permisson to put his hand in the dish.

"Draw near, friend," said Shridat, who was the eldest, "by the blessing of God, what was prepared for three will suffice for four. The sun shines on rich and poor alike, and shall he who hath food refuse a share to him who hath none? Nay, eat thy fill, friend, and be satisfied."

Thus adjured, the stranger sat down and fell to. But while all ate heartily the mess in the dish seemed never to grow any the less for all that was taken out of it.

At last, having appeased his hunger, the stranger inquired whither they were travelling; and Shridat replied, to the royal city of Ilapur, where the Princess Vasanti was to be married in three days to the Maharajah of Madanpur.

"We have heard of nothing else," said he, "all the way from Shumshushabad. It is the talk of every well-side—the gossip of every village street. The charity and magnificence of the Emperor is in every man's mouth. Surely, then, we may hope to come in for a share when so many good things are going."

The stranger pondered a while.

"It would be a thousand pities," said he at length, "if such worthy persons should suffer disappointment. Take this mango, my friend, demand of the doorkeeper an audience of the Emperor. Make thy obeisance before him, and he will grant thee permission to speak. Then shalt thou say these words:

"'O Pearl of Equity, and Protector of the Poor, I bring thee the fruit which the learned Pundits wot of, from the grove by the Laughing Light. Baksheesh! my lord Emperor, baksheesh!'"

With this the stranger thrust into Shridat's palm a large green mango, and rising quickly was soon lost to sight.

Now, as we all know, the gods have power to grant or withhold as seemeth unto them good; and by favour of Kartikaya,* whose votaries they were, the disabilities under which the brothers laboured in public were removed in private. At these times Shridat regained the use of his eyes, Bhowat recovered his hearing, and Vidhat was able to use his tongue. Only the dispensation they enjoyed by the goodwill of Kartikaya they kept to themselves.

"Brothers," said Shridat, as soon as they were alone, "who knows what may happen to-morrow?" And, Bhowat, smiling, answered:

"To-morrow?"

And Vidhat, who was unaccustomed to speaking, repeated:

"To-morrow!"

Then Shridat put the mango in his turban and they lay down to sleep.

At the hour appointed for giving audience next day, Shridat, standing before the Emperor, made his obeisance, and in all things did as the stranger had commanded. Then withdrawing the mango from his turban he laid it at the Emperor's feet.

"Stretch forth thy hands," said the Emperor.

Whereupon Shridat held out his palms.

"You brought them here empty," said his Majesty, "take them away filled," and he poured into them so many gold pieces that numbers fell to the floor.

At this moment, the shouting of the people outside announced the arrival of the Maharajah. He was received by the Emperor in person and conducted to a chair of State in the Hall of Private Audience. Here the Emperor explained to him exactly how the matter stood, ending his recital by presenting his Highness with the mango.

The Maharajah was cut to the heart, but concealing his grief he accepted the mango with "dignified humility," said the Court Chronicler. However that may be, we know that he accepted it; but no sooner was it in his hands than Ratipati, the Emperor's favourite monkey, tore it from his grasp and ran off with it.

"A gift more precious than the half of my kingdom!" cried the Maharajah. The Chamberlain made a grab at the ring-tailed favourite: alas! he was too late to save the mango. The monkey's teeth had pierced the skin, whereupon there dropped to the ground a jewel of such size, water and colour that none had ever seen the like before.

Loud were the expressions of wonder. All the jewellers in the city were sent for to say what might be the name and value of the wonderful red stone, whose colour, quality, and beauty surpassed everything in the way of jewels that the lapidaries had ever handled.

"To put a value upon such an inestimable gem was to ask them to attempt the impossible. The whole earth did not contain its like"—and then, from a shabby old crow which had flown into the chamber unperceived, came a hoarse cackle.

"Go, look in the mango grove by the Laughing Light," said he. "Find the tree which stands in the middle of the ninth row. Every mango which hangs on its branches contains a drop of the blood, which, in her earthly life, animated the body of the Princess Vasanti—an elixir so pure and precious, that Sarvitri, the Giver of Life, would not permit of its being contaminated by the common fluid found in the veins of Rajahs, Ameers, and others of the baser sort. And to preserve it for ever in all its pristine purity, Kama Deva* was commanded to form of each separate drop a flaming jewel; and these he imprisoned in the fruit of the tree, beneath which Vasanti was met by the messenger who bore her to Indra's Paradise.

"The stone in the mango, Great King! is a ruby! which the Princess has sent to the Maharajah as a consolation for the loss of herself."

Then he spread his wings and flew away.

Next morning, the Emperor, accompanied by the Maharajah, went to the mango grove by the Laughing Light to see if the crow had spoken the truth. But a great wind had risen in the night and behold all the trees were bare.

Since then rubies have only been found at those places where the wind carried the mangoes.

Mr. HEADON HILL,

Author of "The Zone of Fire," "Guilty Gold," etc., has written a Short Serial Story for PEARSON'S WEEKLY, entitled:

The Strange Case of "The Tintern Abbey."

It commences in P. W. published on Saturday, July 9th, and it will last only till the August Bank Holiday Number, in which a Grand New serial, entitled:

by a new writer, will commence.

The Strange Case of "The Tintern Abbey" is, therefore, quite short, and those who are not in the habit of reading P. W. regularly will be able to enjoy this story without the necessity of buying the paper every week for any great length of time.

A Shattered Idol.

A RUSH of footsteps, gay snatches of song, an impetuous throwing open of the door, and she swept in, radiant with health, glowing from exercise and bringing with her a breeze as of frosty violets.

A man sitting by the window turned with a smile to greet her. His eyes were very bright, there was a brilliant flush high on the cheek bones, and his face wore that hectic beauty which, as if for a slight compensation, consumption stamps on its victims.

His eyes swept lovingly over her, resting caressingly on her face, on the muff that hid her hands, the dark cloth gown with its hidden silken frou-frou, the high-arched, slender foot just showing beneath—lovingly, lingeringly, yet with a trace of sadness as if loath to give up so much beauty. He stretched out his hand to her and she kissed him tenderly.

"Did I stay too long? Have you been lonely, Herbert, dear? The air was so cold and crisp, and the day so beautiful, I am afraid I almost forgot you were shut in here alone. What a shame the first touch of winter should make you one of the 'shut in!' And I—I am so strong, so happy! Why can I not share my health with you, my husband—my dear, dear husband?"

She sank to her knees beside him and rested her soft, cool cheek on his, and he kissed her dark hair and was happy.

* * * * *

Only twenty-four hours had passed and all the world was changed! He had sat again by the window watching for the carriage, wondering at his wife's delay, when there came a loud shouting, the clatter of horses' hoofs on the asphalt, and an eager, morbid, ever-growing throng surged on the scene. The ambulance clattered by, the crowd went on, and the noises grew faint in the distance.

Presently he saw the ambulance coming up the street.

Why did his heart grow cold and his hands tremble? Why did the hateful thing come slowly nearer and nearer? Why—why do they stop at this door?

Staggering, with pallid face, between two burly, tender-faced men came the coachman. Only the coachman! Oh, thank Heaven! And the relief was so great he laughed.

But the coachman only came to the foot of the steps, and shivering and sobbing, hid his face in his bleeding hands. Then he saw a form stretched on the ambulance. The watching man at the window stood paralysed, his face growing greyer and greyer as the ambulance was borne past, the weeping coachman and up the steps of his own house.

After that everything was a dream. There were reporters and a misty figure of a lugubrious-faced undertaker. There was his wife's maid, who had to be taken away because of her incessant noisy weeping, and the kindly-meaning, but intrusive neighbours.

Then her mother came—her mother with the same tender eyes—and took him in her arms. He rested his head upon her sorrowing breast, but he could not weep.

After a while she left him, for no one but herself might touch that beautiful, idolised form.

In a few hours she came for him and led him to her room, and bade him look on the dear face now so white and inscrutable in death. He knelt beside the bed, staring dumbly, and she left him there with his dead.

The next day came cards and notes which he would not look at, and hundreds of flowers which made the air sickening sweet.

The hours passed, and then someone came for him. He looked again on the still face beneath the violet-laden cover. He kissed her brow with lips which were as icy-cold as were the dear dead lips, but did not quiver; and his burning, strained eyes felt no welcome moisture, for his was that awful grief which is too great for tears.

They took her away, and kind friends sat and talked to him, and he wished they would go away.

At last he was alone, and he paced the floor and moaned and beat his breast, and tried in vain to weep. When his tearless grief had spent itself he went to her little sitting room. Her mother came, and they sat alone in the early winter twilight. A little fire burnt merrily in the grate, and her favourite perfume still floated in the air. The mother had sobbed her heart out, and now they both sat quietly before the fire and talked in low, sad tones of the dear dead one.

"She was so beautiful," the mother sighed. "When she was a little, chubby baby, clinging round my neck, her limbs were just as perfect as they are now, and her eyes as black and deeply fringed. And as she grew her mind grew, too, and expanded. Ah, Herbert, even you never knew the beautiful thoughts she had! And then you came and took her away. Oh, how grudgingly I gave her to you! But she loved you so much that I was silenced. I could deny her nothing. At any rate there was the consolation that you were her first love. My little Emily, she went to you so sweet, so pure——"

"And," he said, "she was sweet and good to her last day. These last few months I have not been able to share in her gaieties, but she always had a thought and a tender word for me. No man's name, I know, except my own, has ever crossed her lips lovingly."

There was a knock at the door, the postman's knock, and in a moment the maid entered, bringing a silver tray with three letters.

He looked at them and groaned.

"All for her! There are some friends still who do not know. Ah, what a little time for such a change!"

He turned the letters over but seemed unable to open them.

"Will you open them, mother? I cannot."

She seated herself beneath the rose-shaded lamp, and, taking the letters, slit the envelopes.

The first was an invitation and, after glancing over it, she dropped it in her lap. The next was a sweetly-written note from an invalid friend with thanks for flowers. She opened the third. It read:

My Darling Emily.—Why did you not come? I have been sitting here in my room for hours since the time agreed upon—hours—days they seem to me, my sweet—and now I have given you up. What has happened? Is he worse? I had almost said I hope so, but that would shock you, my sensitive, beautiful darling. Ah, how I envy him! I could wish myself dying, as he surely is, to have you all my own.

I shall have to leave to-night for a day or two. I cannot see you or hear from you for at least three whole days—an eternity, my own. Are you not sorry now you did not come?

You have told me I must not write you, but I think you overrate the danger. I will not do it again, but to-night I so long to see you I cannot help it.

Good-night, my only love, good-night.—Your Ned.

She read it through, then through again, with staring eyes, her face growing rigid and ghastly. She crushed the paper in her hand and held it tight, staring at him with furtive, hunted eyes. He aroused himself from a deep reverie and met her glance, then sprang quickly to her side.

"What is it, mother? Are you ill? You are so frightfully pale! Was it something in the letters?"

She collected herself with an effort. Her eyes were dull, but her voice was low and even.

"Nothing, Herbert, nothing. I didn't feel quite well; the strain of the day—the sorrow! The letters, did you say, the letters? Oh, yes, only these two short notes."

As he read them she walked to the fire and, standing with her back to him, dropped a crumpled ball of paper into it. She watched it till it was consumed, then turning to the window, raised it and stood there breathing deeply.

"Does the room seem warm?" he said. "I thought it rather chilly."

"No, it was only a momentary faintness. I am quite well now."

She shut the window and resumed her seat, but with her back to the light, and there, in the little room, which was Emily's, they sat far into the night, the broken-hearted husband talking tenderly of her, and the broken-hearted mother listening.

Julian King.

Years and years ago, in a certain country, a certain queen reigned supreme; she was a cold, haughty, imperious woman, ruling absolutely.

The country prospered during her reign, but although the people acknowledged her power, she was held in great awe. After all, she was but human, and had a heart, which once, at least, was touched.

The man on whom she secretly lavished much affection treated her with all homage due to her rank, but she was uncertain whether he really cared for her for herself alone.

One day this queen heard of a palmist, who had acquired much fame for his accurate telling of the future and people's character from the lines in their palms. She would not lower herself by going to him unknown, but would have him come to her in the midst of her court.

The palmist was notified of the great honour conferred upon him, and an evening was appointed for him to visit her majesty. Punctually to the minute he presented himself at the palace.

He was not much over thirty, pleasing to look at, and carried himself with dignity. In his eyes one might have observed a troubled look. He always told the exact truth of what he saw, and he realised that the queen had been accustomed to flattery all her life.

All the lords and ladies of the court had been bidden to hear the future of their queen. She thought it would add one more drop of complacent self-esteem to have all the people hear from the lips of this celebrated palmist how great and virtuous she was.

He was, therefore, conducted to the throne, where he bowed low before her. She thus addressed him:

"We have called you hither, sir, that you may read our palm and tell us of the things you see therein."

The palmist bowed a second time, and replied:

"Your majesty overpowers me with your gracious condescension, but think you it is right that I should presume to predict the future of one so illustrious as yourself? Power and greatness are yours. We all see it and feel it. Is it not enough for you to know?"

The queen's eyes flashed.

"Is it for this you have come—to invent excuses, methinks, to hide your ignorance? Proceed, sir, to look at our hand. We would know what deceits are being practised on our people!"

An answering flash came from the palmist's eyes.

"As you will, so be it, your majesty," he replied, sinking on one knee in front of the throne.

Then he placed a cushion for her to rest her hands upon, and, when all was in readiness, said to her in a low voice: "Is it the queen's wish that all this assembled court shall hear what I have to say, and that will be what I see in these royal palms?"

She smiled slightly at the last words and nodded assent.

"I would 'twere otherwise! But to begin;" and the palmist continued: "You will gain your desires, your majesty, no matter what be the cost. You are selfish and could be cruel on occasions. Your aim is power, and in this life you will gain it to the fullest degree. Men's minds you will control, their hearts never. In fact, through the line of heart a——"

"Enough, sir, we see how paltry is your knowledge, and we are grateful to you for your opinion of us."

The queen snatched her hand away and stood quivering with passion before him.

"Now, sir," she went on, "your reward you shall receive. At noon to-morrow you shall die on the gallows. Have you aught to say, palmist?"

"What you have said is not strange to me, your majesty. I foresaw by my own hand that at this time I was to die by the cruel injustice of one far above me in this world," he replied.

"'Tis well, sir, you are prepared, and, fortunately, in the next world people will be spared your arts." Thus spoke the queen.

During this time the courtiers and ladies had remained motionless, so astonished were they at the scene going on before them. There was a slight remonstrance from a few of the boldest who dared to venture to reason with the queen. She waved them all aside and said:

"The court is dismissed; take the man away and see that my orders are obeyed."

Then she stepped from the throne, and swept from the room, looking at no one.

* * * * *

The palmist was taken to a prison cell. There, that night, a touching scene took place. He had requested one last interview with his wife. They had been married but six months, and she was a beautiful girl. How nobly now she bore her part.

"Is there no hope?" she whispered; "no line to save that awful break in your line of life and of fate?"

"None," he said. "She may repent, but it will be too late to save me."

He took her hands in his, and, looking into her eyes, went on: "My wish is that you continue my work. You know much already, and from my books you will soon know all. You and I are the only ones to keep this great science from falling into the hands of gypsies and mere fortune-tellers. I have given my life for it."

"And I will do no less," said his wife, interrupting him.

The last few words of parting were spoken between them, too sacred for anyone to hear, and then she was led away.

When the Queen reached her private apartment she walked rapidly up and down, trying to calm herself. She spoke half aloud.

"He told me more truth than I cared to hear, and before the courtiers and ladies, for that he shall be punished; but not as he now thinks. Only frightened, but not hanged. I can't condemn the first man who has spoken truly to me for many months. At a quarter of an hour before noon a reprieve shall be sent to him at the market place. He shall then see that some, at least, of his predictions are false. I can be generous when I please."

The morning sun streamed in through a narrow opening into a prison cell, resting gently on the bowed head of a man. It streamed in through a lattice window of a dilapidated house, touching a woman sobbing as if her heart would break. It played about a palace, and, as a shade was drawn, crept into a royal dwelling, but was as quickly excluded. Perchance it heard a voice say: "I would sleep longer, let no light in."

So it scampered away, and danced merrily up and down a gallows erected in the square.

The hours slipped by. At length the shutters in the royal abode were thrown open. When the queen was ready to receive once more, she called for her special messenger. As he entered, he made the customary salutation, but his face was white, and he looked at the queen as no loving subject should look. She handed a paper to him, and said:

"It acks but a quarter to the noon hour. Take this paper to the square where the gallows is erected, and read it to the palmist before the people. It is his rightful reward—a reprieve. Nay, more, give him this purse of gold, and say to him—before all the multitude remember—'Behold a queen's generosity.'"

"Too late, your majesty," the messenger replied; "your clock is twenty minutes slow. I have but just come from the square. The palmist is dead."

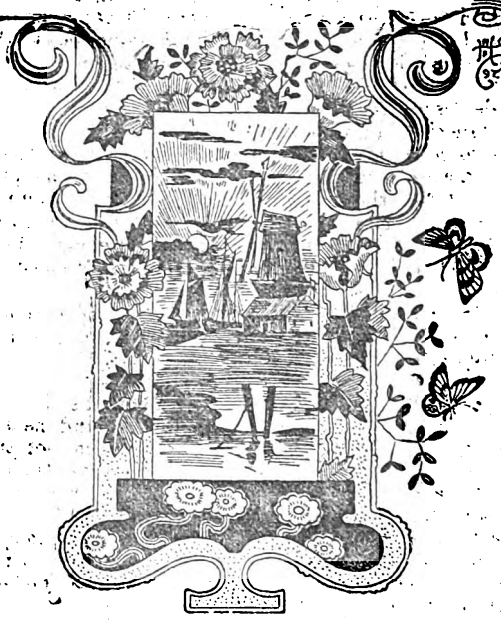
The Mystery of the Missing Liner.



At ten o'clock on the morning of March 14th, 1903, the Anglo-American liner, the Oklahoma, left Southampton on her regular trip to New York.

The fact of her departure, ordinarily of merely local interest, was telegraphed all over Europe and America, for there was a significance attached to this particular trip such as had never before marked the sailing of an ocean steamship from these shores.

It was not because the great vessel numbered among her crowd of passengers a well-known duke and his young bride that her sailing was heralded by such a blowing of trumpets, nor because she had also upon her lists the names of the British Ambassador to the United States, returning after a brief leave of absence, and a score of other illustrious personages whose names were household words.

The presence of these notables was merely incidental. What made this trip of the Oklahoma an event of international interest was the fact that the Oklahoma was taking to the shores of Uncle Sam the largest lump amount of gold ever shipped upon a single vessel within the memory of man.

Not even in the memorable gold exporting year of 1893, ten years previous, had any such sum as this been sent abroad at one time.

It was not the usual paltry quarter or half million sterling that she was carrying away in her great strong room of steel and teak wood, but ten million pounds' worth of shining bars and money, hastily called across the ocean because of the adverse "balance of trade" and the urgent need of money on the part of the American Government, both consequent upon the United States' great scheme of absorbing all the South American Republics and her conflicts and bargains with them and Spain and Portugal during the past five years.

The mere insurance premium on this vast sum was in itself a comfortable fortune. Business men wondered why such a large amount was intrusted to one steamer. Suppose she should collide in the fog and sink, as one great ship had done only five weeks before—what would become of the insurance companies then?

Suppose some daring Napoleon of crime should hatch a startling conspiracy to seize the steamer, intimidate the crew and passengers and possess himself of the huge treasure? It would be a stake well worth running great risks, thought some of the police officials, as they read the headlines in the evening papers.

The Oklahoma was a fast steamer. Her five hundred feet of length and her twelve thousand tons of displacement were made light work of by the great, clanking, triple-expansion engines when their combined force of fifteen thousand horse-power was brought to bear upon her twin screws. Under ordinary conditions she ought to have made port on the other side in time to let her passengers eat late dinner on the fifth day. There was nasty weather in mid-ocean, however, and so her failure to reach her destination on the sixth and even the seventh day was not particularly remarked.

The public had been busy with other weighty matters in the interim, and the departure of this modern argosy with her precious freight had almost passed into history. For history in the year 1903 was anything that had happened a week ago—a day—if it was not of overwhelming importance.

If the big ship's arrival had been cabled on the eighth day, or even early on the ninth, it would still have found the public in a comparatively calm state of mind, for the mid-Atlantic storm would naturally account for a multitude of lost hours; but when the ninth changed into the tenth, and the tenth into the eleventh and twelfth, with no tidings whatever of the tardy steamer, surprise grew into anxiety and into an international sensation.

Of course all sorts of plausable theories were advanced by the steamship agents, newspapers, and other oracles, including that of the inevitable broken shaft; and these might have sufficed for a day longer, had it not been for another and much more startling theory that suddenly came to the surface, and threw two continents into a fever of trepidation and suspense.

It was the following announcement in a leading London paper that roused excitement to a white heat:

"A new and most astounding phase has come over the case of the mysteriously missing Oklahoma. It has just become known to the police that James Lang, known as 'Gentleman Jim,' the noted criminal and forger, whose ten years' sentence expired only a few weeks ago, was in the city several days previous to the sailing of the Oklahoma, and went with her as a passenger under an assumed name. Even at that very time detectives were looking for him, as there was reason to believe that he had some great scheme on hand. One of those clever people whom nothing ever escapes had seen him go on board almost at the last minute, and gave an accurate description of his personal appearance which was evidently but slightly disguised.

"Lang is probably the only criminal in the country who ever would conceive and try to execute such a stupendous undertaking, and it is something more than suspicion on the part of the police that he has smuggled on board a couple of dozen well-armed desperadoes, who could easily hold the entire crew and passengers in check and make them do their bidding, for a time at least. The idea is so replete with thrilling possibilities that the entire community stands aghast at it."

It is to be noted that the public always stands aghast in such a case as this; but it is more to the point just now to say that the article went on, through a column or more, to describe in minute detail the circumstances attendant upon the departure of "Gentleman Jim," even to the exact size and shape of the bag he had in his hand.

The famous criminal was very boyish in appearance, and one of the last persons in the world whom a chance acquaintance would think of looking up in the "Rogues' Gallery."

The theory and the news acted upon the British Government much like an electric shock, and nearly threw the Foreign Office into a panic; for was not the British plenipotentiary himself a passenger on the ill-fated Oklahoma, and possibly at that very hour being butchered in cold blood by a lot of cut-throats?

The thought was too horrible for a moment's endurance, and the result was that within a few hours after the appearance of the paragraphs, one of the fastest and most powerful of Her Majesty's cruisers, quickly followed by a second and a third, hastily steamed from Portsmouth, the three spreading out north, west, and south, like a great marine fan, as they hurried to the rescue of the Oklahoma and the British Ambassador.

Meanwhile, three or four American warships were getting up steam for a similar errand, and a small fleet of ocean-going steamers, specially chartered by newspapers to go in search of the absent leviathan, were already out at sea.

Not for years had there been such world-wide interest in an ocean expedition. The newspapers commanded an unheard-of sale, for everybody was on the tiptoe of expectation concerning the fate of the missing steamer, her six hundred passengers, and her ten million pounds' worth of gold.

While the public were thus feverishly awaiting the news, certain discoveries were being made by the police, which tended to confirm their previous suspicions. Four or five other hardened graduates from prison were found to be absent from their accustomed haunts, although they had been seen just before the Oklahoma sailed.

These discoveries had the natural effect upon the public mind, and the friends of those on board the steamer began to despair of hearing that even human life had been respected by the piratical band.

Three days passed by after the departure of the search vessels, during which time all incoming steamers reported that they had not found a single trace of the Oklahoma, either in the northern or southern route. Vessels from other parts of the world made the same ominous report.

The tension was terrible. The public by this time was convinced beyond reasonable doubt that the robbers had successfully carried out their fiendish plan. But how, and when, and where?

When they opened their newspapers on the morning of the eighteenth day they found the answer to the question, and the greatest marine mystery of centuries was solved.

In the small hours of the night there flashed across the European Continent, and under the dark waters of the Atlantic, this startling message from the representative of the Press Association:

LISBON, April 1st.—"The missing Oklahoma is disabled at Fayal, Azores, where she was discovered by the Press Association special expedition. Many of the half-starved crew and passengers are on the verge of insanity. The officers tell a most astounding story of the steamer's exciting and almost fatal adventures.

"On the third night out, the Oklahoma suddenly came under some mysterious but irresistible influence, by which she was carried rapidly out of her course towards the south. Every effort was made by the officers to bring the ship back to her course, but the big liner drifted helplessly at the mercy of some powerful current. The compasses were useless, and the wheel no longer exercised the slightest control over the steamer's movements.

"Naturally the anxiety of the officers was in no way diminished, when, on the morning of the next day, another vessel—a low-lying vessel of shining steel—was discovered off the Oklahoma's starboard bow, about a mile ahead, but moving in the same direction.

"By careful observations it was discovered that the course of the two steamers was identical. Both were apparently under the same mysterious influence. Instead of sighting a rescuer, the Oklahoma had, so it seemed, only discovered another victim of the irresistible current.

"Again and again the Oklahoma attempted to signal the companion ship, but the latter made no reply. Close observation revealed that she was built on the whaleback principle, with nothing above deck save ventilators and signal mast, but failed to reveal any sign of human being.

"By afternoon, their continued failure to bring the liner back to her course had so worked upon the minds of her officers, that their anxiety infected the spirits of the passengers, who were now aroused to the real danger that menaced them.

"When the fifth day dawned, with the Oklahoma undoubtedly very far out of the regular transatlantic course, the gravity of the situation could no longer be concealed. Distress signals were kept flying, and all possible steam was put on with the idea of overhauling the companion ship and giving or receiving aid. To the amazement of both officers and passengers, however, in spite of every effort, the Oklahoma failed to gain a single inch on the other vessel.

"Before they had time to attempt an explanation of this remarkable fact, amazement gave way to consternation. For just a moment a third vessel had appeared on the horizon like a messenger of hope; but no sooner had she been sighted than, with the swiftness of lightning, the mysterious companion craft turned half round and darted away to the south east, with the Oklahoma following as helplessly as though she were in tow.

"In that moment the awful truth was revealed. The steel vessel was nothing more or less than a floating magnet, which, by some mysterious power, was dragging the great ocean monster hither and thither as easily as a child's magnet draws a toy ship from one side to another of a mimic pond.

"Who was she and what was her motive? Almost before those on board had asked the question, the answer flashed upon them. The ten million pounds worth of gold! Beyond a doubt, it was the capture of this treasure which she was planning to accomplish, either by luring the Oklahoma from the regular path of ocean traffic, and looting her and her passengers at leisure, or by compelling her to run aground upon some remote rock or shoal.

"With this revelation a new horror unveiled itself. Equipped as they were only with the supplies of a short trip across the Atlantic, the overwrought minds of many saw starvation looming before them.

"That night not a soul sought his berth. From time to time consultations were held between the chief officers, and many coloured rockets split and blazed their signals of distress incessantly across the sky.

"At length, soon after dawn of the sixth day, orders were given to bank fires and hoist sails in the hope that the Oklahoma, as a sailing vessel, might free herself from the awful influence that chained her.

"But the effort was vain. Wind and sail proved as useless as wheel and compass against the fatal power of that mysterious craft which drew the Oklahoma after her as irresistibly as though the two vessels were united by an unseen hawser.

"The steamer had now become a scene of indescribable horror. Meanwhile, all the customary routine was disorganised; and frequent prayer meetings were conducted among the more emotional of the passengers.

"Finally, seven days after she had left port, the officers of the big liner made one last desperate effort to offset the magnetic influence of the mysterious 'pirate.'

"The fires were revived in the engine-room, the steam pressure in all the boilers was run up to the blowing-off point; then suddenly the reversing mechanism was applied, and a shudder ran through the great floating city as the twin screws began to back water.

"For a few minutes there ensued a gigantic tug-of-war such as the beholders had never before witnessed. The water astern was lashed into a lather of foam, for a brief moment the triumph of steam over magnetism seemed assured.

"Only for a moment, however, for the cheer that had ascended from the anxious watchers had scarcely died away when, with a mighty crash, a vital section of the overtaxed engines gave way, and followed by a hoarse yell of consternation from the excited engineers and stokers—and both screws were helpless and still.

"With this failure hope was well nigh extinguished, and the Oklahoma, with her precious freight and her hundreds of human souls, abandoned all active effort to escape.

"With not a sail of any kind in sight, she passively rolled and plunged southward for seven days after her strange and terrible pilot, from which, to add to the horror of the situation, no human sign had yet been given.

"The supply of rockets was now exhausted, and food was doled out in minute portions, as to members of a shipwrecked crew, in order to husband supplies.

"On the afternoon of the fourteenth day, when the exhausted passengers had reached the verge of distraction, a gleam of hope appeared on the horizon in the shape of a solitary steamer, bearing down from the south-west. A glance through the telescope proved her to be a fast and formidable British cruiser.

"At this news a mighty shudder, half of hope, half of fear, seized the crowd assembled upon the deck. Would the British cruiser come to their assistance, and if so, would she, too, become a victim of the magnetic craft?

"For a moment their fate hung in the balance, then from the hundreds of throats rang out a hoarse cry of joy as the mysterious craft swerved, turned sharply and shot away over the surface of the Atlantic due north.

"The spell was broken. The big liner with her six hundred human souls and ten millions in gold was freed from the power that had for so long held her captive.

"But, crippled as she was by the accident to her machinery, she was unable to proceed unaided, and was taken in tow by the warship, the Midlothian, and a day later brought safely into port at Fayal.

"The Press Association steamer is the first to bring the thrilling news. The first officer of the Oklahoma and the saloon passengers, including the British Ambassador, accompanied your correspondent to Lisbon. A relief steamer is urgently needed, as the Oklahoma's engines are disabled, and she will not be able to proceed for several weeks.

"The passenger thought to be 'Gentleman Jim' Lang proves to be the Duke of Madfordshire, now on his wedding trip with his young bride."

Hardly had the excitement caused by this startling intelligence subsided, when it was once more aroused by the information of the capture, in the act of robbing a jeweller's, of "Gentleman Jim" Lang, and a gang of four other criminals. This was followed by an important telegram from Russia:

St. Petersburg, April 2nd.—The identity of the mysterious craft by which the Oklahoma was drawn from her course has been established beyond a doubt.

The vessel is a Hypnotic cruiser, recently completed by a Russian inventor, named Slobodenski, and possessed of an electric apparatus by which any vessel can be brought completely under control.

Whether the Hypnotic cruiser's outrage on the Oklahoma was merely a trial of power, or whether plunder was intended, can only be surmised. But experts say that this marvellous new invention will revolutionise naval warfare, and necessitate the passage of stringent laws to cover a crime for which at present no penalty exists.

A FIERY ORDEAL.

Tessie and I were friends. We had always been friends since—well, since we wore dresses together. That was when I was five and she was four. We were, from that time, always together.

We were chums. She went everywhere I went and did everything I did, and, as we grew up to boyhood and girlhood, we were inseparable.

She was strong and athletic, but of a slender build; could drive, row and swim as well I could; and had a complexion well browned by a long and intimate acquaintance with the Australian sunlight. A brave girl too.

Then Tess went to a boarding school, and came back at the end of three years somewhat different in appearance, but at heart the same dear old Tess as ever.

Now, although my girl friend and I had known each other so long and so intimately, yet we had never fallen in love with each other.

I am positive of this, because when I got soft on Jennie Bingham, and lavished all my money on flowers for her, Tess only laughed.

But now I was twenty and Tessie nineteen, and somehow, as I took the shapely little hand she offered me to welcome her back, after those three years at school, somehow it came to me suddenly that Tess was a beautiful girl, and that her eyes were bewitching. And there came into my heart a strange, uncomfortable feeling.

Suppose someone should take it into his head to fall in love with Tessie and marry her?

The summer I wish particularly to tell you of, the one following Tessie's return from school, my people and her people decided to spend the hot season at a little mountain hamlet with an unpronounceable name—a lot of "ongs" and "wongs" about it.

It was a little place in the bush, with about one hundred inhabitants. It was ten miles from the nearest railway—and that only a branch line, and about seven miles out of the ten was through the bush. A rough road had been cleared for traffic.

Our people went early in the season; I was to follow as soon as I could, which was more than a month later.

I expected the man to meet me at the station, but as I saw no one, I went on by myself. The season had been very hot, and everything seemed parched up. When I reached the road which ran through the bush I could not help thinking how easily it could be set on fire.

"Ugh!" I shuddered. "I hope that won't happen till I get out of this. I should be roasted."

But just then I spied the antedeluvian vehicle coming towards me about half a mile up, and I quickly dismissed from my mind all thoughts of fire.

Tess was driving the conveyance and she was alone. I was delighted with the prospect of a two hours' tête-à-tête with her, but thought it strange that old Joe had not come for me. Tess explained that the man was away on an errand, and she had come instead.

Then the thought of fire came to me again, and I could not help mentioning it to Tess. She laughed.

"No danger of that," she said, as she turned the horse's head back in the direction he had come. "You are nervous."

It was a delightful afternoon. The air was now cooling down and the ride along that road was very pleasant. We chatted and laughed until I quite forgot the existence of any such thing as fire or danger.

We had covered about a quarter of the length of that road when, on looking to the south, I suddenly noticed a dense black smoke rising in large, thick masses three or four miles off. It seemed to be rapidly approaching. Again that terrible thought of fire suggested itself.

"We had better get home as quickly as possible! That is the bush on fire!" said Tess suddenly. It was her turn to be nervous, judging by the tremour in her voice.

In a few minutes the whole situation had changed. The bush was on fire, and the flames were rushing towards us at an alarming rate.

Our octogenarian steed would not move any faster, and the road seemed to cross the track of the fire some distance ahead of us. Our situation was becoming serious. The road was not wide enough to afford us an oasis in this approaching simoon, and if the flames got within half a mile of us we could not escape, except by a miracle.

The fire came nearer. There was no mistaking it now. Vegetation of all kinds had become veritable tinder in the continued heat and drought, and before the destroying flames it disappeared as snow before the sun.

We could now distinctly hear the distant crack and roar of the flames. The twilight was coming swiftly on. We began to get thoroughly frightened as the fire came nearer and nearer.

A great cloud of sparks and smoke, the advance guard of the all-devouring enemy, began to blow in our faces and fire the dry undergrowth near us. A breeze had sprung up and helped our all-destroying enemy.

I applied the whip vigorously to the old horse, and he seemed to put forth his best energies, but the ancient cart was so heavy that he did not get along any faster than a good trot.

The girl beside me was pale, but her lips were firmly set and her eyes shone with a lustrous, determined light. She would not flinch, I saw. She came of stern stuff, this tender young girl, and the fierce, stubborn spirit of her British ancestry was standing her now in good stead. I knew Tess would not faint or scream or do anything foolish or wild, but would be a comrade to me in our danger, with a courage equal, if not superior to my own.

On came the fire. It was now within half a mile of us and roaring like a wild beast in sight of his prey. A great cloud of smoke and sparks preceded the flames and blew right in our faces, making our eyes smart so that we could scarcely see, and griming and peppering our flesh till it felt raw.

I scarcely knew how I managed to see the many minor features in the play which afterwards came so near being a tragedy, but every little thing is indelibly impressed upon my mind, even to this hour.

Our old horse was now fully alive to the danger we were in. He trembled and shook in every limb, and drew the rickety old vehicle along at a rate it had never gone before.

I held the reins and spoke encouraging words to him, and tried to comfort the brave girl at my side.

Tess was trying to keep the sparks off us with a little silk parasol, one of my gifts to her, but soon there were so many holes burnt in that dainty relic of civilisation, that it became a veritable colander, through which poured a red-hot blinding flood.

A great, hissing, cracking cinder lighted on her Tam-o'-Shanter, and that soon was so near a blaze that I pitched it off and threw it away.

Tess looked like an angry goddess. Her longt brown hair had escaped from its fastenings and swept out behind in the wind our passage created.

As she held the reins while I warded off a blazing bough that came hurtling upon us, with her eyes sparkling with excitement, her face pale as ashes, and her lips set, she looked like another Queen Boadicea driving her chariot of wrath over the necks of her proud Roman insulters. Even in those moments of agony I wondered how she kept up so marvellously.

We were now about half way home and almost in the belt of flame. Things might now get better, and if we could hold out for another half hour there was a chance of our getting off with our lives. I tried to speak, but my throat was so parched that I could not utter a sound.

The heat was frightful. Clouds of dense white smoke settled about us in suffocating closeness, while the ever-increasing roar of the flames made a grand and awful diapason. And the fire came closer and closer—and finally, it reached us.

"Tess!" I shouted, as I put my arm about her waist and drew her down below the side of the rickety old vehicle. "Dear girl, our time has come! Good-bye!"

"Dear Ben, good-bye!" I read, rather than heard, from her lips.

It was impossible to hear her words.

And after that, as the novelists say, all was like a dream. I have a confused recollection of a heat so terrible as to almost force my eyes from their sockets and shrivel my skin up to parchment—of the old horse dropping to the ground—of standing over my brave Tess trying to fight off the flames—of agonising burns on my head, face and hands! And then there came a terrible roar, I seemed to see ten thousand stars, and all was darkness.

I never knew just how long I was unconscious, but it must have been for many hours, for when consciousness again mounted her throne in my soul it was broad day. At first I could not open my eyes at all. Then I managed to just separate the lids, but it was the acutest torment to do so. I afterwards found that they had been horribly burnt.

When at length I could see about me, what a desolate scene it was that met my blurred and crippled vision. As far as my poor sight could reach there was nothing but blackness, except overhead—a landscape in jet silhouetted sharply against the soft azure of the clear sky.

A few feet from me lay the figure of a human being! It was Tess!

And was she dead? Merciful Heaven! About half of her clothes were gone and she lay motionless, as though dead.

How I suffered at that sight no one but myself can ever know. But I could not move, and the hot tears of which I was not ashamed oozed from my eyes like drops of liquid fire and ploughed red-hot furrows down my scorched cheeks. And then I again lapsed into unconsciousness.

Whole ages might have passed before I knew anything more. Then suddenly I opened my eyes and saw I was in bed at home. By the bedside sat my small sister Jennie.

"You have been ill just three weeks, Ben," said she, "and 'Tessie'"—everyone of us said "Tessie" and not Miss Mills—"is just able to walk about."

It came out afterwards that Tess had received her worst burn while trying to ward off a blazing branch from my head after I had become unconscious. Of course, she was lionised for her bravery—"when I didn't do anything brave at all," she afterwards said to me, with a bright blush. I didn't say anything, and my action immediately following is scarcely worth recording.

Now, when I take my youngest boy on my knee and pour into his never-tiring ear, again and again, the story of my escape from a fiery death, and then look across the table where sits my sweet-faced wife, I shudder at the recollection of that night of horror, and marvel at the strength of a true woman's love.

PLAIN SPEAKING.

A Feminine Reader writes to ask whether we consider it safer to ride on the top or inside a 'bus———There is a widespread superstition that the safest place is inside, but this is quite a mistake. In the event of a collision or of the 'bus being overturned, you stand a much better chance of escaping uninjured if riding outside than you do when cooped up and hampered by a dozen frantic persons, all struggling to reach the door. On top, too, there is less chance of your being crushed by the weight of the overturning vehicle, and in any case your hands and face wouldn't be cut by broken glass.

A. H. D.—Yes, every volunteer recruit has first of all to pass a medical examination.

Native.—Although idolatry still exists in some parts of the Philippines, the natives are not so bad as you imagine. There is one pretty custom, at least, practised in the interior portions of the group. The peasants fill small bamboo baskets with fruit and food, and set them outside their dwellings: any passing traveller is welcome to take what he wants. He pays nothing if he be poor, but if he can afford to pay, he drops something into the receptacle placed near for that purpose. The custom is not abused, or it would have been discontinued; which speaks well for the people generally.

Bustard.—The great bustard was once an ordinary object of chase on Newmarket Heath, and was seen in large numbers in Wiltshire also. The bustard scarcely ever flies, but on foot it is very swift, and tested the capabilities of horses and dogs before it could be captured. Taken all in all, it is the largest of British birds.

T. L. asks for information on a cheerful subject; he wishes to know the favourite method of committing suicide.———Your morbid curiosity may be satisfied by some statistics compiled by Dr. Whitcombe, of Birmingham. His experience shows that shooting and hanging are favourite methods with men, but women prefer drowning. Quite a number of people put an end to their existence by drinking carbolic acid.

D. W. S.—The best clay pipes come from the Devonshire pits. The original colour is grey, which turns to white in the process of baking. From first to last, a good clay passes through about a dozen hands before it is ready for use.

J. S. W.—The expression "red letter day" originated in the old custom of printing the saints' days—which were considered lucky—on the calendar in red ink.

Cyclist asks: "Has the bicycle furthered trade outside the business created by its own manufacture?"———Certainly. Every great industry necessarily has a reflex action on others, so that other trades would benefit by the money spent on and in connection with cycling. But the bicycle is having an effect upon trade in this way: Riders are not slow to complain of the condition of roads and highways, and undoubtedly cause more money to be spent to keep them in better condition; and good roads facilitate transmission of goods, and so increase trade. In Siam the cycle is proving a real blessing; the nobility have taken it up enthusiastically, and are bringing about a complete change in the condition of the highways to the great increase of trade.

E. S.—The dome of St. Paul's Cathedral is about as many feet high as there are days in the year.

Benedict.—After the first five years fowls cease to be profitable so far as the laying of eggs is concerned. According to an authority, the birds average twenty eggs during the first year, 120 in the second, 135 in the third, and 115 in the fourth. After this the number decreases by twenty a year, and in the ninth year only ten are laid.

O. R. writes to ask in which part of London is land most valuable.——— The land in Pall Mall and Piccadilly is valued at £500,000 an acre, and the very smallest shops in that vicinity can easily be let for £1,000 per year, while houses of any size that are situated anywhere near Hyde Park Corner, cannot be obtained for less than £3,000 a year. Land in the City, too, is exceedingly valuable. The ground on which the Mansion House stands is worth at least half a million, and the sites occupied by some of the big Lombard Street banks are of even greater value.

D. A.—The largest sundial in the world is Hayon Horoo, a large promontory rising to a height of 3,000 feet above the Ægean Sea. As the sun runs its course the shadow of the mountain touches, one by one, a circle of islands which act as hour-marks.

Despatch.—Reuter's first office for the transmission of telegrams was opened in Aix-la-Chapelle in 1849, but on the opening of the route from Calais to Dover in 1851, the office was transferred to London. Reuter then conceived the idea of supplying the papers with news, but the proposed arrangement was declined, although the principal morning newspapers were in the habit of running expresses at enormous cost. But at length some of them made a contract with him and the others were glad to follow their example.

K. T. puts this question: "Is it a fact that the tendency of the richer classes is to choose the western portion of a city for their abode—if so, why?"———The tendency is noticeable in almost every capital in Europe. The cause is difficult to ascertain, but one explanation seems reasonable. It is that the prevailing winds come from the west, south-west, and north-west, and blow the impurities of the air eastward; hence the air in the west is purer than in the east, and those who can afford to have the best of things have chosen the west. In time this has become a fashion, and the west is regarded as the rich quarter, and, therefore, the proper place for people with money. The question of purity of atmosphere has little or nothing to do with the selection now.

Red.—It is estimated that among English-speaking people one person in fifty has red hair.

Bobby writes to ask why "Scotland Yard" is so called.———Because on the site of the old building, a house was erected for the accommodation of King Kenneth III. of Scotland, when he came to England to pay homage to the King.

G. K. L.—"Keelhauling" was a form of punishment used in the navies of the last century. It consisted of tying long ropes round a man's head and heels and about each wrist, lowering him over the stem of the ship, and dragging him by means of the leg and wrist with ropes exactly along the keel from stem to stern. Only about one man in three survived this punishment.

£5 FOR CORRECT ANSWERS

Most Unique Contest of the Age—£5 paid for Correct Lists made by Supplying Missing Letters in Places of Dashes—No Lottery—Popular Plan of Education—Read all the Particulars.

On the vote for public education, Sir John Gorst explained in the House of Commons that it was estimated the sum spent upon education in the course of the coming financial year would be £11,690,000. This sum was an earnest of the conviction of the people that education was a national necessity, and that the country depended for its greatness on an intelligent and instructed population, just as much as it did upon fleets and armies. All readers of this paper will, doubtless, endorse this view, and we, the publishers of "HOMELAND," now offer you an opportunity to display your knowledge and receive most generous payment for a little study. The object of this contest is to give an impetus to many dormant minds to awaken and think; also, we expect by this competition of brains to extend the circulation of "HOMELAND" to such a size that we shall be able to charge double the present rate for advertising in our columns. By this plan of increasing the number of subscriptions, and receiving more money from advertisers of soaps, pianos, medicines, books, baking powders, jewellery, etc., we shall add thousands of pounds a year to our income, and with this mathematical deduction before us, we have decided to operate this most remarkable "missing letters" contest.

HERE'S WHAT YOU ARE TO DO.

There are thirty words in this schedule, from each of which letters have been omitted, and their places have been supplied by dashes. To fill in the blank spaces and get the names properly, you must have some knowledge of geography and history. We want you to spell out as many words as you can, then send to us with a Postal Order for 1/6 to pay for a One Year's Subscription to "HOMELAND." For correct lists we shall give £5 in cash. Also, if your list contains twenty or more correct words, we shall send you a beautiful Egeria Diamond Scarf Pin (for lady or gentleman), the regular price of which is 2/6. Therefore, by sending your list you are positively certain of the 2/6 prize, and by being careful to send a complete list, you have an opportunity of the £5 cash award. The distance that you live from London makes no difference. All have equal opportunity for winning. Full particulars of the prize awards will be published in "HOMELAND."

PRIZES WILL BE SENT PROMPTLY.

Prizes will be honestly awarded and promptly sent. We publish the list of words to be studied out. In making your list of answers, be sure to give the number of each word:

1. -RA-I- A country of South America.
2. -A-I-I- Name of the largest ocean.
3. M-D--E--A-E-- A sea.
4. -M--O- A large river in South America.
5. T-A--S Well-known English river.
6. G-AS-OW A great Scotch city.
7. H------X A Yorkshire town.
8. N-A-A-A Noted for display of water.
9. PO-TL-ND A place in England.
10. -A-RI- A city of Spain.
11. H-V--A A city on a well-known island.
12. D-BL-N An Irish city.
13. G--R-L-A- Greatest fortification in the world.
14. S-A-LE- A great explorer.
15. C-L-F---I- One of the United States.
16. B-SM---K A no'ed ruler.
17. --CTO-I- Another noted ruler.
18. P-R-U-A- A country of Europe.
19. A-ST-A-I- A big island. [American.
20. M--IN-E- Name of the most prominent
21. P-R-SM--TH A famous English seaport.
22. Y--KS--RE An English county.
23. B--G-T-N A south-coast holiday resort.
24. T-NN--ON A noted poet.
25. W-ST-IN-T-R A famous abbey.
26. J-RS-Y An island in the English Channel.
27. H-M-L-N- A popular family magazine.
28. B-H-I-G A sea.
29. A-L-N-I- An ocean.
30. M-D-G-S-A- An island near Africa.

In sending your list of words, mention whether you want prize money sent by cheque, money order, or registered post; we will send any way that winners require. The Egeria Diamond is a perfect imitation of a Real Diamond. We defy experts to distinguish it from real except by microscopic test. In every respect it serves the purpose of Genuine Diamond of purest quality. It is artistically mounted in a fine gold-cased pin, warranted to wear for years. This piece of jewellery will make a most desirable gift to a friend if you do not need it yourself. At present our supply of these gifts is limited, and if they are all gone when your set of answers comes in, we shall send you 2/6 in money instead of the Scarf or Shawl Pin, so you shall either receive the piece of jewellery or the equivalent in cash, in addition to your chance of winning £5 cash prize. This entire offer is an honest one, made by a responsible publishing house. Now study, and exchange light brainwork for cash. With your list of answers send postal order for 1/6 to pay for twelve months' subscription to our family magazine, "HOMELAND," which is only sold by subscription; also send a stamp for immediate reply. If you have already subscribed, mention that fact in your letter, and we will extend your subscription from the time the present one expires.

FOUR-LINKED CHAIN.

"GOOD evening. How are you?"

"Eh! I don't think—I mean I think you've made a mistake."

"You mean you don't know me? Well, do you think you would if I were to ask you for a light for this pipe I'm smoking while it was still in full blast?"

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, nothing particular. Perhaps I've made a mistake; if so, I must apologise. I don't often forget faces, and I thought yours was familiar to me."

"Well, now you speak, I seem to think I've seen you before. Let me see, where was it?"

"Were you on Putney Bridge about this time one night last May. If you were, you asked me for a light."

"Oh, yes, of course, I remember now. Odd you should have remembered me; it's nearly twelve months ago."

"Oh, I rather pique myself on my memory for faces; besides, when a man asks you for a light, and knocks the ash off a cigar that is still burning, and proceeds to light it over again, you naturally look at him a bit curiously."

"You don't mean to say that my cigar was alight? I certainly thought it was out myself, or I shouldn't have asked you for a match. However, that's nothing. What are you having?"

"Thanks; I'll take a whisky and small soda, I think."

"Good! Will your friend join us?"

"Thank you," replied the third of the three men who had thus dropped into conversation in the saloon bar of the Poplars Hotel, West Kensington. The meeting had been quite casual. The man who had spoken first had entered with his friend, and the man he had addressed was standing at the bar leaning on one elbow upon it, and chatting to the young lady who had just served him with a whisky and soda.

All three were well-dressed, gentlemanly-looking men, and the one who had been first spoken to was a peculiarly attractive looking man, at any rate, as far as first impressions went. He had one of those dark, strongly-marked, agreeable faces, which, at first glance, inspire confidence in the majority of men, and would be considered decidedly handsome by most women.

The man who had addressed him was of medium height, rather slender but well-built, and carried himself with a peculiar swing, which, taken in conjunction with his clean-shaven face and well-shaped mobile mouth, would have led anyone very quickly to the correct conclusion that he was an actor. The third man was a quietly-dressed and still more quietly-spoken individual, whose dark hair was somewhat dashed with grey, and whose carefully groomed moustache and side-whiskers gave him somewhat of a military appearance.

The only other occupant of the saloon-bar besides themselves, was a man sitting in a secluded corner with a glass of whisky and water in front of him, and apparently either tipsy or asleep.

The conversation thus casually commenced naturally turned on the faculty of remembering faces. Both the man at the bar and the actor seemed to pride themselves not a little on their powers in this direction, and by the time the third whisky and soda had been exchanged, they had each of them given one or two more or less remarkable instances of their exercise of it.

The man whom the actor had first spoken to, let fall the information that he was a barrister during the course of a story about a criminal case in which he had been engaged, and which had turned upon a remarkable recollection of a face seen once and identified again after five years.

"Yes," said the actor as he finished, "that was decidedly a curious case. It reminds me of a painful experience of my own a few years back, in which the recollection of a face played the principal part, only it was a girl's face, and a very pretty one, too. I'll call it 'A four-linked tragedy,' or 'A skeleton drama in four glimpses,' whichever you like."

"Ah, that sounds interesting," said the military-looking man. "Let us have it; we have half-an-hour to spare yet. I know you tell a story well."

"Well, there's not very much to tell," said the actor, nothing loth, "and not much scope for description. In fact, it's a mere matter of headings, though there's plenty of human interest in it."

He took a sip from his glass and went on:

"The first glimpse of the face I caught one night in the Strand three or four years ago now. I was playing in the second piece at the Globe, and I was hurrying along with my thoughts a long way from the pavement, when I almost collided with a lady who had got out of a brougham at the door of the Adelphi.

"I just pulled up in time, raised my hat, apologised and walked on. It was all over in a minute, but, brief as the glimpse had been, it was long enough to show me as pretty a face as a man need ever wish to look upon.

"It was one of those faces which you always want to turn round and look at again after you have passed; a face that you not only admire in the artistic way, but for emotional reasons as well. It was not merely pretty, too, there was sufficient character in it to stamp it upon one's memory, and distinguish it from the average pretty faces that you can see scores of in London at the beginning of the season.

"Well, she acknowledged my apology with a bow and just the faintest little flash of a smile, and I hurried on. So much for link number one.

"Of course I forgot all about the incident before the next morning, and thought no more of it until about thirteen months later, when I was playing in The Silver King at the Olympic. One night I noticed in the third row of the stalls a lady, whose face struck me as familiar. I was puzzled for a few minutes, and then the incident in the Strand came back. You know we mummers have trained memories, and have to be masters of the art of association.

"Well, I came to the conclusion that it was the same face, but what still seemed to cast a doubt upon it was the fact that it was apparently the face of a woman very much older. Presently I had an opportunity of taking a good look at it, and I was driven to the conclusion that it was the same face, but I was utterly shocked to see the difference that a single year had made in it.

"When I saw it first it was the face of a girl, who, to talk shop for a moment, had just come on, and found the performance a pleasant comedy. Now it was the face of a woman, who seemed to have found a good deal more tragedy than comedy in the drama of life. I have seldom seen off the stage such a perfect picture of stony wretchedness and half-resigned, half-rebellious suffering as it exhibited.

"Whatever the events of the year must have been she could have found little but misery and disappointment in them. However, the curtain fell on our mock tragedy in the usual way, and though I confess I thought not a little of the saddened face that night before I went to sleep, and though perhaps it may have haunted me for some time in a vague sort of fashion, still time went on and I forgot it again, and so the second link slipped out of sight.

"Two years after that I and four brother mummers took a week on the Thames, starting from Reading and pulling quietly down as the spirit moved us; sometimes camping out, and sometimes sleeping at a hotel, and altogether having a very comfortable time of it.

"We left Richmond about high-water one lovely moonlight night soon after twelve to pull over the last stage of our trip to Hammersmith, where we were to give the boat up. If it hadn't been such a very fine night we should probably have gone home by train, and in that case the odds are that my four-linked chain would never have had more than two links in it."

"What do you mean?" asked the barrister, with a sudden eagerness. "You don't mean to say you——"

"Saw her again?" said the actor. "Yes, I'm sorry to say I did, and under very miserable circumstances, too. We were about half-way between Barnes and Hammersmith, when our coxswain saw something floating in the water. We were ten or a dozen yards from it, and it was then so dusky on the water, as the moon had got rather low, that we took it for a floating basket or a bundle of hay, and we should have passed it without taking further notice of it if the coxswain hadn't just then struck a match to light his pipe.

"He threw the match still burning into the water towards the object, and just as the lighted match fell with a hiss into the stream, our stroke brought us up all standing by exclaiming:

"'Good Heavens! That's not a basket; it's a human body!'

"In a very short time we were alongside of it; it was the body of a woman, dressed neatly but very simply—almost poorly, in fact. She was not drowned, or at any rate she had been stunned first, for we found a bruise behind one of the ears. Added to that there seemed to be sufficient air remaining in the lungs to keep the body from sinking, and this, I believe, would not have been the case in drowning, as the lungs would have filled with water in the struggle to breathe. We took the body in tow to Hammersmith, and a pretty mournful journey it was, I can tell you. We had to tow her because our boat was so light that we should certainly have had a capsize if we had tried to get her in.

"I suppose you know what I'm going to say now, and you're right. As soon as we had hailed a policeman at Hammersmith and got a light, I saw for the third time the face that I had seen in the Strand and in the theatre. That is how the third link passed through my hands."

"Of course, there was an inquest, which I and my friends had to attend. Who, or what she was, there was not a word of evidence to show. All that came to light about her was the bald fact that a waterman at Kew had let a boat the previous day to a man and woman, and that he thought this was the woman, but he could not be sure, as he had scarcely noticed her.

"The man had disappeared, and as the boat had been found the day after we picked up the body down below Vauxhall, bottom upwards, it was concluded that they had capsized and ——"

"Yes, of course," interrupted the barrister. "A case of double suicide, I suppose, covered up by a pretence at an accident. I've heard of several of them."

"So I suppose everybody would have thought if it had not been for the bruise behind the ear, and if the woman had really been drowned. The verdict, I admit, was simply the open one of 'Found drowned,' though some of the jury were for 'Wilful murder against some person or persons unknown,' as the formula runs. If I'd been on the jury I should certainly have stuck out for that verdict."

"Would you? I don't see it," replied the barrister. "The bruise behind the ear was not necessarily a proof of violence, and certainly not of murder; it might have been given in a dozen ways. As for the lungs having air in them—well, the woman might have fainted from sheer fright before she actually drowned. You say the man was never heard of again?"

"No; he vanished completely."

"Ah! Evidently, as I say, it was either an accident or double suicide, or the man may even have killed the woman and then have committed suicide himself. Anyhow, it seems to be a finished chapter, and so what becomes of your fourth link?"

"Oh! that has to be forged yet," said the actor. "I am still of opinion that the woman was murdered, but I admit that I have never had the slightest reason to suspect any living man of the crime until now."

As he spoke the actor fixed his eyes on those of the barrister, and looked at him with such unmistakable meaning that the man took a step backwards and exclaimed angrily:

"Confound you, sir, what do you mean? What are you looking at me like that for?"

"I mean, Mr. Alfred Ferris, Barrister-at-Law, Printer to the Bank of Engraving, and murderer to boot, that you have just helped me to forge my fourth link by admitting that you met me on Putney Bridge a year ago and asked me for a light.

"Stand still now and don't make a fuss, and I will soon satisfy you that the game is up. Don't think of violence, please. My friend here is a detective with a warrant for your arrest as a bank-note forger, and there are two policemen within hail outside."

A wave of pallor passed swiftly over the face of the man addressed as Ferris; but it vanished in a moment, and his old air of assurance came back. He laughed aloud, and not at all unnaturally.

"Rubbish, man, rubbish!" he said, almost jovially. "Your Thespian imagination has led you away this time, and you have made a mistake in faces for once, if you think I'm the man you name. You can arrest me for him, if you like, and I'm quite willing to go with you; but I warn you that the risk will be considerable in the way of damages, for I shall not have the slightest difficulty in proving who I am to-morrow. You'll find it just as hard to prove that I am a bank-note forger as to show that I murdered this woman you were talking about. That is to say, both are impossible tasks."

"Very well, I'll take the risk," replied the actor. "No, sergeant, not yet. I am going to play my tragedy out in my own way," he continued, putting his hand on the arm of the detective, who was making a move forward.

"Now, look here, when you asked me for a light you didn't want a light, because your cigar was not out. The request was a prearranged signal with a man that you mistook me for, and who is now in Wormwood Scrubbs. We've got the story from him, and I needn't tell you who he is. He was caught that very night with the plate on him which he was to have given to you.

"Now it was not in front of the Adelphi, as I told you, but in front of the Haymarket, that I saw the girl for the first time. I changed the names to keep you from suspecting, because you were with her. You were also with her on the second occasion, not in the stalls at the Olympic, but in the dress circle at the Globe, and I recognised you again.

"That man in the corner there is the man who let the boat to you, and he will recognise you as the man who took the girl on the water. You have confessed already that you met me on Putney Bridge a year ago, several months after the girl was drowned, and, therefore, you were not drowned with her. That, Mr. Ferris, is the link that was wanting, and which you have assisted us to forge in this little comedy, or perhaps I should say tragedy, which we have arranged here for your special benefit to-night. Saunders, come out here, please."

The man in the corner got up and came forward to the bar.

"Is this the man you let the boat to the day before the girl's body was found?"

"Well, he's a lot better dressed now than he was then, but that's him, and no mistake."

"Now, sergeant," said the actor, stepping aside, "my part's over. It is time for you to come on, and I'll go and give the supers their call."

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

No. 6.—THE ROSE AND THE RING.

THERE was once in the country beyond Tamluk a king called Dhanapati. He was a mighty man of renown, rich in substance, great in power, and learned in the arts and mysteries; and many came to him seeking service and bringing gifts.

They came from the hills and from the plains, and from the island of Ceylon which lies far to the South. And Dhanapati listened to them all.

"Some day," said he, "mayhap I shall find amongst them an honest man—one who seeks me for my own good, and not for what he hopes to get for himself," for, notwithstanding all their fine talk and their gifts and their offerings, Dhanapati, who could read men's hearts by looking into their eyes, knew that each man's purpose was to learn, if he might discover it, the secret of Dhanapati's great wealth—the source of the inexhaustible treasure which gave him favour in the eyes of the Great God Jagganath over all the Princes of Hind; so that he alone of sovereign Lords was permitted to enter the holy place and stand before the high altar.

In the private garden of the Royal Palace, Dhanapati, by his magical arts, had found a well, which turned to gold everything that was put into it.

The well was guarded by a monster called Rahu, all head and shoulders, with a mouth like a tiger's and furnished with immense canine tusks. He was a servant of Asur the earth-demon, who knows where all the treasure is that is hidden in the dark places of the earth, and reveals the secret only to those who can pronounce the master-word which compels him.

Rahu would allow nobody but Dhanapati himself to approach the well; so, by order of the King, the people brought to Dhanapati all the vessels of brass which they could procure; and the King, having paid for them in good coin of the realm, put them straightway into the well, which in a few hours converted them into gold; and with the gold he built shrines and endowed temples. For all which, the high priest of Jagganath promised him the chief seat under Parigat—the undying tree of Paradise, the fragrance of whose flowers fills the heavens. He bestowed also upon him the office of sweeper before the god; of which title indeed Dhanapati was prouder than of his royal crown or his golden well.

Now, on a certain day, there came with the others to the Court of King Dhanapati, a poor mendicant without shoes to his feet and with only a ragged dhótee to cover his loins.

Yet of all who prostrated themselves before the Lord of Wealth—for by that name was Dhanapati known far and near by the people who served other lords—the shoeless mendicant was the only one who asked nothing.

When the King, addressing him, inquired whence he came, what news he brought, and what was the subject of his petition, the mendicant, before answering, stooped and, from the naked ground at his feet, plucked a wax-white rose, which he presented to the King, saying:

"'Tis Indra's flower, my lord, and but even now was growing in the meads of Heaven.

"A fool esteemeth a gift according to the gold which has purchased it. A wise man looketh to the craft which has produced it. But a just man considers neither the gold nor the craft, but values the gift only for the sake of the giver.

"Of gold, O King! you have no lack. Use it for the service of man, and Heaven will reward thee. Of craft, the best may be bought in the market for hire. But a rose from Paradise, no money can buy or craft can fashion.

"Remember then, O King! to cherish the white rose of Indra. Whence I come, matters not, nor whither I go; and suit I have none to make.

"But my lord asks for news; and what news, think you, is a poor wayfarer like to bear that will command attention from a king? Nevertheless, such as I have I will retail; and so be, the King will know if the beggar's speech concerns the 'King's crown.'

"In the kingdom of Kalinga then, through which I passed on my way hither, I chanced to see Rahini, the Lotus-eyed daughter of Srimanta, the great Emperor of the Lunar Race. Fair and good is she to look upon. None fairer, O King! have these eyes beheld in all the regions that lie west of the Sun and east of the Moon. But the Emperor, her father, keeps the maiden close in his Zenana, swearing that he will give her only to one who will acknowledge his god—Ganesha—as Lord of lords and Lord of All. That, for sure, is all the news I have to tell—yet, mayhap, it is not told without purpose, neither was the white flower offered without intent. But it is for thee, O King! to determine if aught I have said concerns thee."

Now, as Dhanapati listened, his vanity was piqued, his curiosity excited, and all the ambition in his nature aroused. He would fain have questioned the mendicant further.

This man, thought he, is surely the honest fellow I have been looking for; and a messenger from Indra to boot. He has sought me out for no profit to himself, but that he might give me the message from his lord. To how many now, of the followers of Indra hath he given it—or has it been told to my ears alone?

Closing his eyes while he pondered the matter, Dhanapati opened them to find the mendicant departed, and none could say how, or whither he went. He was gone, but no eye had seen him leave.

The White Rose was still in the King's hand, filling the air with fragrance, or His Majesty would have said: "Lo I have dreamed a dream in the daytime and seen a vision as in the night."

So the King took the White Rose and laid it on the altar before Jagganath, and shut himself up in his chamber to consider who the mendicant might be, and all he had told him concerning Rahini, the Lotus-eyed.

Now it happened about this time that Dhanapati was sore vexed and displeased because of Seetani, his favourite wife. She was jealous of Vavaishni, her lord's latest addition to his Zenana; and things were all awry in the women's apartments.

Though he was the possessor of the Golden Well and enjoyed the distinction of being the sweeper before Jagganath, Dhanapati's domestic troubles made him level with the lowest.

Thinking over what he had heard from the beggar-man, King Dhanapati determined that Indra desired him to ask Rahini in marriage from the great Emperor of the Lunar Race.

So he collected presents of silver and presents of gold, rare stuffs and rich shaws, diamonds of the first water and pearls of great price; and dispatched them with a large embassy to solicit the Emperor's daughter to wife. He offered to place her at the head of his establishment, giving her precedence over all the ladies of the harem and providing for her a handsome suite of apartments in a new wing. But Srimanta, the Emperor, laughed him to scorn.

Rahu would allow nobody but Dhanapati himself to approach the well.

"What!" said he, "give my daughter to a scavenger—a road sweeper? Tell your master that if he wants my daughter, he must come and take her."

So the ambassadors returned bringing the King's presents with them.

Then Dhanapati rent his royal robes and swore that he would never resume them till he had made the Elephant-worshipping Emperor acknowledge that the sweeper before Jagganath was worthy to mate with any daughter of earth he chose to ask for.

Calling for his fighting gear, he mounted his war-horse, and, putting himself at the head of his army, rode away to avenge the insult to himself and his god.

But in the middle of the battle, panic seized upon his men, and they broke and fled in all directions, leaving the Royal Standard and many prisoners in the hands of the Elephant worshipper.

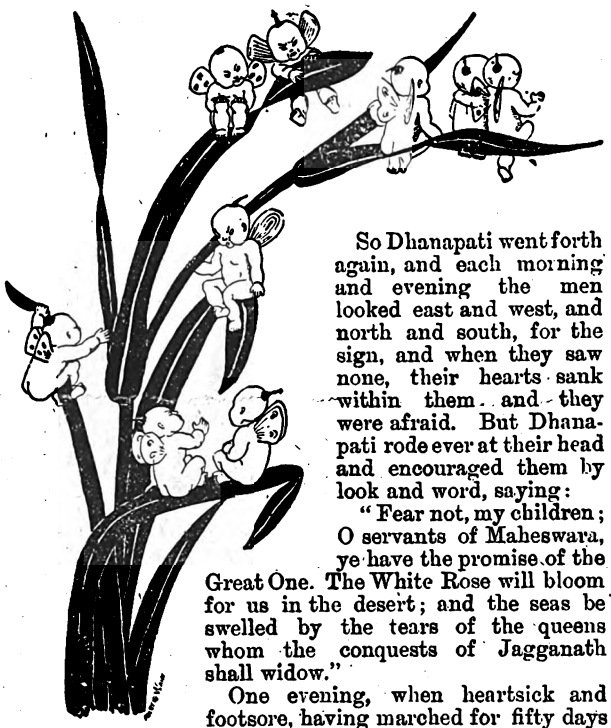
Overwhelmed with dismay, Dhanapati rode back to his capital as fast as a fleet horse could carry him, and throwing himself at the feet of his god, upbraided him with desertion in the hour of danger.

"O King," said a voice which Dhanapati at once knew to be that of the beggar-man, "O King, hear and live. Said I not to thee, 'Cherish the White Rose of Indra?' But, alas! my lord, thou hast surely forgotten it," and at the same moment the King, turning, saw the honest mendicant at his side.

Then Dhanapati remembered that in his haste to avenge himself on Srimanta he had forgotten to tend the white flower before starting, and behold it was faded and withered.

But the beggar-man spake words of comfort to the King, and bade him lead yet another army to the field, and a sure sign would be given him.

"Watch carefully," said he, "for the sign of the God Indra, and mayhap ye will see also the sign of Kama. Then tarry not, nor look back, but strike hard and strike home, for Mahadeva himself will be with you. Remember my words, for if ye ignore them defeat shall surely come upon ye."



So Dhanapati went forth again, and each morning and evening the men looked east and west, and north and south, for the sign, and when they saw none, their hearts sank within them and they were afraid. But Dhanapati rode ever at their head and encouraged them by look and word, saying:

"Fear not, my children; O servants of Maheswara, ye have the promise of the Great One. The White Rose will bloom for us in the desert; and the seas be swelled by the tears of the queens whom the conquests of Jagganath shall widow."

One evening, when heartsick and footsore, having marched for fifty days and being near to the army of the Elephant Emperor, the men were preparing their food at the door of the tents and silence was over all the camp, suddenly there appeared before the King's tent a maiden, holding in one hand a ring and in the other a rose.

The ring was of purest gold from the mountain of Meru, and fashioned by the jinns who live in the caves under the mountain. The rose was white as the marble in the quarries of Aryavatta, which is only used for the tombs of kings and emperors. Both rose and ring possessed magical virtues which time and occasion would disclose.

When King Dhanapati, running out to ascertain the cause of the commotion, beheld the visitor at the door, he would have bowed himself to the ground; but the damsel addressing him said:

"Nay, O King! for I am but a servant of my lord, even as thou. This Rose of Indra is sent thee by the Great God Jagganath, before whom the Elephant Worshipper Srimanta shall humble himself; and this ring is the gift of his good brother. Two horsemen who were riding south, one on a black steed, the other on a white, gave them to me for thee, saying: 'Thy time was come, thy duty plain, thy path straight; as he understands so will it be.'"

Then the maiden, having delivered her message, disappeared as suddenly as she came, and Dhanapati knew that the Great One himself had sent the sign which the beggar-man had promised.

At the battle, next day, Dhanapati drove the soldiers of the Emperor before him, as the wind drives the leaves along the alleys of the jungle; and chasing them to the walls, he laid siege to the city and carried off the Princess captive.

But for all this, Srimanta refused to take back the words he had cast in the teeth of the King, and calling upon Ganesha and his mother to prevent the insulting marriage, he rushed upon Dhanapati single-handed, thinking to slay him; but an asp flew out of the White Rose which Dhanapati was wearing, and bit him in the lip that he died. Then Dhanapati went home, taking the Princess with him, and no man durst ask him anything, for he was wroth in his heart; and, refusing even to look at Rahini, he swore that she should be married to a Bhungee, the elephant-headed god, and live as a slave. So he commanded his minister to wed her to the sweeper of the stables at the royal mews.

Now when the soldiers who had fought for Dhanapati heard what the King had decreed, they forgot their wounds in remembering the maiden's beauty, of which none had ever seen the like in all the countries through which they had travelled.

"Surely," said they "our lord does foolishly. Purity, goodness and beauty are jewels which should adorn a king's diadem. It is an insult to Heaven to give the damsel to a sweeper."

But Mahdoo, the old minister, seeing what a pet the King was in, said never a word, only he took the Princess to his own palace and gave her in charge of the ladies of his household.

Meanwhile King Dhanapati placed the Rose and the Ring on the altar before Jagganath, and went off to the Golden Well. He wanted some things he had left there, before starting to chastise the insolence of the Emperor.

But when he got them out, behold! they were every one and every whit as brassy as when he put them in. So he put them back and went again in a week's time; but finding them still in their original condition, without sign or symptom of gold about a single one; he began to get uneasy and asked Rahu who had been to the well. "No one," said Rahu, "but an old beggar-man who came yesterday and asked for water, and when I bade him begone, threw a handful of garden mould down the well. I would have chased him out of the garden, but when I went to look for him, he had vanished."

Then King Dhanapati went to the temple, secretly hoping that there he might meet the poor medicant; but though the King waited long the beggar came not; while the Rose on the altar faded, day by day, though tended never so carefully by the anxious monarch; and the Ring lost its brilliancy and grew dull like lead.

And all this time Mahdoo the minister spake not a word of the Princess, while Dhanapati, believing it had been done as he ordered, was afraid to venture a question.

At last the time of the Holy Festival came round, and the people were assembled in thousands and tens of thousands to see the image of the great god brought forth.

And the King, taking the sweeper's broom in his hand, walked before the car and humbly swept the dust off the road in front of the god, while the people shouted in praise of the King and in honour of the Image.

Then Mahdoo, the aged minister, brought out the maiden Rahini, attired as a bride for the bridal, and placing her side by side with the King in the face of all the people, spake and said:

"Take, O, my King, the bride whom the good lord Jagganath has sent thee. My lord swore in his wrath that I should marry the maiden to a sweeper of the street, and behold, my lord, I give her to thee."

Now when Dhanapati heard these words his heart leapt within him, and when he looked at Rahini and saw that she was beautiful as the morning and fairer than the stars, he was ready to fall upon the neck of Mahdoo to find how very wisely his ancient minister had acted. In his heart the King knew that he had behaved very badly to the Princess, who surely ought not to suffer for her father's fault; moreover he had failed in his duty to the god whose servant he professed to be, and only the wisdom of Mahdoo had prevented him from filling up the measure by committing an offence against High Heaven itself.*

The Golden Well had stopped, the White Rose had turned brown, the Ring had lost its lustre and the mendicant came no more—it needed no magic to explain the matter. So Dhanapati took the maiden by the hand before all the people, and commanded that the wedding should proceed.

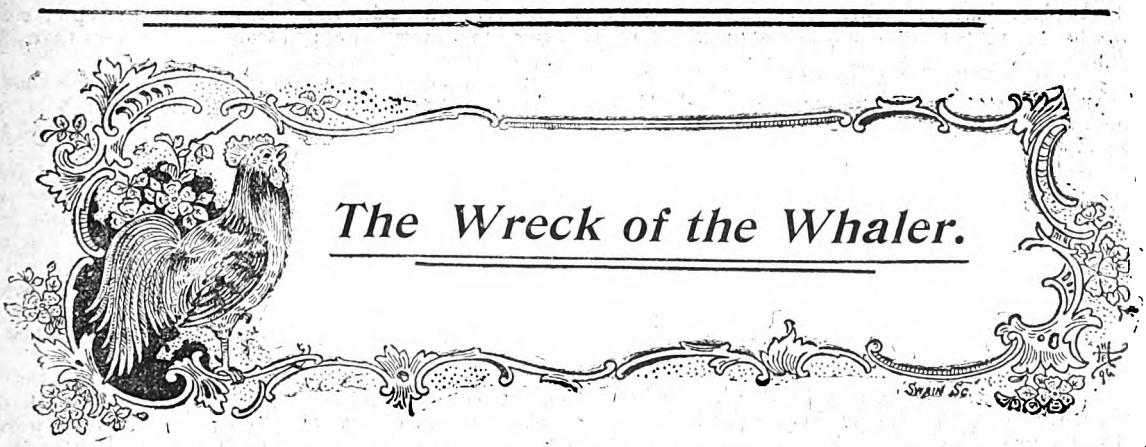
Then from the crowd there arose a cry: "Room for the holy man, room!" and the mendicant made his way to the King.

"Send, my lord," said he, "for the Ring and the Rose, and go thyself to the well, and what thou findest there let it be for a marriage portion for Rahini the lotus-eyed."

So Rahini was wedded with Kama's Ring, which fitted her delicate finger exactly, and shone there with a brightness which dazzled the beholders, almost as much as the beauty of Dhanapati's new bride. And lo! the White Rose was found to have put forth fresh blossoms and was become a bouquet fit for an empress—every flower without fleck or flaw, perfect in form and pure in colour; and their fragrance reached to the uttermost edge of the vast crowd.

Only the mendicant was seen no more. But when the King went to the well he found there far more than he had ever put into it. It took him a week to get all the things out—that handful of mould which the beggar-man had thrown in must have developed magical properties—and when he had got them, he gave them all to Rahini as the holy man directed; and he and she lived in the light of each other's countenance till Indra summoned them both to a seat in Paradise under the shade of Parigat.

* By marrying the Princess to a sweeper, she would have lost caste and thereby imperilled her salvation.



The Wreck of the Whaler.

WHEN Captain Dawson came back to Aberdeen in the winter of 1879, the strongest desire of his life was to find out what had become of his ship, the Polly Ann, which had run away from him in the North Atlantic somewhere about lat. 55, long. 53, a year and a half previously, having two people on board at the time of its disappearance.

Almost the first thing he did was to seek the assistance of Mr. Kimber, solicitor, by whose advice he had the following advertisement put into half a score of the most likely home and foreign newspapers:

£100 REWARD

For information as to the fate of the whaling brig Polly Ann, which sailed from Aberdeen May 16th, 1877.—Address HENRY KIMBER, Solicitor, Aberdeen, Scotland.

A little more than seven months had passed since the publication of this appeal, when one day a short, thick-set, smoothly-shaved, solemn-faced, swarthy man of perhaps thirty-two years of age, dressed in landsman's clothes, but with a sea sway to his body, appeared in Kimber's office.

"Your most obedient," he remarked, with a bow and a backward scrape of the foot, as he turned his hat, like a wheel, in his hands; "I'm from Melbourne—arrived last week, and have come about the Polly Ann reward."

Mr. Kimber was professionally glad to see him, and, stirred by an unprofessional curiosity in the ocean mystery, gave him hearty greeting.

"My name's Jack Wootton," said the newcomer, as he slowly seated himself, "and I was the cook on the ship until she ran away with me."

He was going to say more, when a framed portrait of a judge caught his eye. He abruptly left his seat and stood before it in an attitude of meditation.

"Barring wig and nightgown, that would be very like Captain Dawson, eh?" he said, after two or three minutes' thought.

"Quite right," assented the lawyer. "It had never occurred to me before. By the way, it looks as though that hundred pounds would be easily earned."

The man turned his gaze from the picture to Mr. Kimber, and back again.

"Is the cap'n alive?" he asked, paying no attention to the solicitor's remark.

"Oh, yes; I'll send him word that you've turned up."

"I think you'd better not," suggested the sailor, coming close to the other. "I'm sure he'll not want to see me—me above all other men just now."

"Nonsense!" said Kimber. "He's anxious to know what became of his ship."

"But not of the persons left on her, I know. I think he'd rather see anyone but see me. But what's the course to be headed, Mr. Lawyer?"

"You'll have to make your statement, Wootton. My clerk will take it down——"

"Umph! I thought so. No use; I can't talk before a clerk and know he was writing it all down, and so I wrote it out myself, ship-shape, just as if I was talking it."

He pulled a roll of paper from his pocket, and placed it upon the table. "It is true!" holding up his right hand as if taking oath to the document.

"I'll read it over, and you may call in the morning and swear to it. Then we'll begin to look into the matter and——"

"O-h! So we're just going to begin the matter. Is that it?"

Mr. Kimber nodded and smiled his answer.

"Storm's a-coming if that's the heading," said the sailor, putting on his hat with a strong downward pull, as if it were really "blowing great guns" outside. "You may look for me in the morning, then. My compliments to Cap'n Dawson, if he'll listen. But he won't. Good-day."

So great was Mr. Kimber's curiosity in the matter that the door had not fairly closed upon his visitor before he began the reading of the statement.

Wootton's Narrative.

"I've seen a notice in a paper that somebody was wanted who could tell what became of the whaler Polly Ann. I can and I'm going to from now on.

"I used to be a country schoolmaster, but when my young wife died I lost rudder, compass-bearings, everything. 'The only thing that will save you, my man,' said the doctor, 'is a long sea voyage!' That is how I came to go to sea.

"I went as cook because I was not a foremast hand, though I had once been to Rio as cabin boy. But I could cook, and that is how the Polly Ann had a berth for me.

"We sailed the middle of May, 1877. Two months later we were well up towards Baffin Bay, with over one hundred barrels of oil under the hatches, and not a man hurt or a spar cracked.

"The Polly Ann was a good one—368 tons, square rigged fore and aft, three years old, and provisioned for a two years' voyage. Captain Dawson was a long, lean, sanctimonious chap of fifty, who ought to have been a preacher, by his looks and talk when he wasn't angry. The men, eight all told, were as good as the average, excepting Maitland, the carpenter. I'll be coming to him after awhile.

"It was a beautiful afternoon in July when the ship's good luck left her. The weather was cold, though the sun had been shining up to noon, when a grey film crept up far away in the north-west, and the sea was dead calm.

"About three o'clock a whale rose about a mile away. The captain looked aloft, and then along the horizon. Nothing was set except the fore-topsail and flying jib, for we had been cleaning up from a catch of two days before.

"'I don't particularly like that sky,' he said to the mate, as he looked to the north'ard, 'but I'll chance it.'

"With that, he took to the boat in pursuit of the fish, with every man save the carpenter and myself, and rowed away like mad, over water smooth as oil. There didn't seem any risk in all this, so far as I could judge. An hour, at the longest, ought to bring the boat back, and no storm seemed likely at the time.

"Maitland minded the wheel, and I stood at the heel of the bowsprit when the fish was struck. It started straight for the ship, but when within half a mile, swerved to the northeast, and then, after a bit, ran south. It was now astern of the ship instead of ahead. I had gone from the bow, moving as the fish changed its course, and was leaning on the taffrail watching.

"Suddenly I felt a puff of ice-cold air on my cheek. At the same moment Maitland cried out, 'A gale's coming,' and gave the wheel a spin. Forward, about where the whale was struck, was a great grey wall let down from the clouds above, squeezing the air toward us.

"A glance astern showed that the whale had been abandoned, and that the men in the boat were rowing for their lives to reach the ship. Which would get to it first—the boat or the fog? The question was speedily decided, for in less than three minutes we were shivering in the icy mist, and the sea was hidden.

"The Polly Ann bobbed up and down like a cork; the masts groaned from peak to keel, and the yards seemed as if they were being tugged at by giants. The air was bitterly cold; a fine snow, as if shaken through a sieve, came over everything, and from stem to stern there fell a dull, grey twilight.

"Far away seemed the cries of the men in the boat as the storm hesitated before striking us. I don't believe they were six hundred feet distant when the roar of the tempest deafened us.

"The waters went into a passion, and pounded away at our starboard bow until the nose of the brig was battered from the course we had been holding, and with topsail and jib swollen with the breath of the storm, the ship shot away like an arrow into the froth and scum of waves and clouds, leaving the captain and his boat's crew to perish. I saw it was all up with them so far as we were concerned, and that if any life-saving were to be done, it must be for our own account.

"Our condition was a hopeless one, for all that I could see. The little brig went tearing through the great waves, her two sails frozen taut as drum heads, her yards touching the sea as she rolled. It seemed as if no race horse could travel as fast as the Polly Ann was going on that dismal track.

"'I'm afraid it's all up with us,' said Maitland, as after a dozen attempts I lighted the binnacle lamp. 'I'm nearly done for, as it is. I can't hold on much longer.'

"I saw that it was true, for every lurch and plunge of the ship lifted him off his feet, and loosened his hold on the wheel. My heart was full of pity for the poor fellow, and so I told him to go below and rest if he could. He was utterly useless in that condition, and would be better and safer out of the way.

"And here I want to have my say about this man as I knew him, or supposed I knew him, at that time. He was a passably good-looking, red-headed young fellow, of ordinary height, with a fair complexion and a smooth face. His features were delicate and regular, but the charm of his face lay in his great blue eyes. No matter how you felt towards him, if he turned those sad-looking eyes on you, you became weak at once, they were so mild and pleading. He must have been twenty-two or twenty-three years old, and so slight and delicate that I wondered what drove him to sea life, and especially to that of a whaling ship. He wasn't much of a carpenter. He made pretences of hammering and sawing, but was that slow and unskilful that somebody—many a time the captain—had to turn in and do the work.

"The crew would have nothing to do with him when they could avoid it. They disliked him for his weak, whining voice, for one thing, and more than all because the captain coddled him on the ground that he was sickly, going so far as to give him a berth in his cabin, where he stayed most of the time, reading and sleeping.

"Once in a while Maitland would help me in the galley, and from what he did and the way he did it I knew he was better than I at cooking. The captain used to talk with him a great deal, but the men, as I have said, would have nothing to do with him. In short—for I could tell many a story of his queer ways and doings—this was the bundle of uselessness left on my hands by the breaking of the storm, a human life that I felt I must save equally with my own.

"After Maitland had given me the wheel, I looked at the compass. We were flying to the south; before the gale we were heading north. I knew absolutely nothing about navigation, unless it be knowledge to take my turn at the wheel; Maitland could do that, too. Between us we might be able to hold the ship before the wind.

"Where we would bring up in the end we didn't know. When I looked about me it seemed as if we might bring up any second. One minute we were up in the air, the wind yelling like mad women through the ropes and spars; then down we slid, as if going to the bottom, until the roar of the storm seemed miles above us. Nothing was to be seen; the ship was ploughing through a whirling bank of snow. Nothing could be done except to hold on to the wheel and keep her before the wind.

"I can't tell the horrible loneliness of that night, in which I seemed to be the only human being on the face of the earth, with death jogging me at the elbows. I would fall into a doze only to be knocked out of it by a rap on my half-frozen knuckles from the wheel as the bow would begin to swing into the wind. Out of a stupor so heavy that it might have been the beginning of death, I was aroused by being pounded on the back.

"Morning had come, and Maitland, bundled up in the captain's great oilskins, was standing at my side. The wind and the snow still lashed the ship, and thundered through the rigging. I could not see a hundred feet away.

"'I've not closed my eyes since I left you,' he shrieked in my ear. 'Oh, this is terrible! Give me the spokes. I'd rather relieve you than be alone,' and he pushed away my numbed hands.

"'Then I'll go below for a bit of sleep,' I said.

"'No! no! don't! Jack, stay by me! I'm afraid.'

"'But, man, I must sleep or go mad!'

"'Then sleep here, at my feet, where I can see and touch you. There's room enough. Something dreadful will happen if you leave me. I know there will.'

"He was terribly in earnest, so I agreed, and crawled down into the cabin for blankets and more clothing, if the captain had left any. I knew he had a bottle of brandy, and rummaged until I found it hidden in a locker. Down went a full glass of the stuff. Then I gathered an armful of bedclothing and put on an old great coat that had been part of the bedding in his bunk.

"'One more swig at the bottle,' thought I, and I sat down to drink it. No sooner done than my head went over on the table, and I slept like one dead, leaving the poor lad alone on the deck in the storm. I couldn't help it, and yet I shall never forgive myself for it, for it was as cruel a deed as one man could do to another.

"As he told me later on, his fear and loneliness for hour after hour drove him mad for a time. I believe he never got over it, for often afterwards, in his sleep, he would cry out: 'Jack, Jack Wootton, come! for Heaven's sake, come! I'm afraid!' And I never heard him thus without the tears coming to my eyes.

"Well, as I've said, I went instantly to sleep, used up. The next I heard was a noise like the firing at once of half-a-dozen great cannon, and instantly I lay on my back on the floor, in the midst of a lot of glass from what I knew was the smashed-in skylight.

"Had the vessel blown up? On second thought I knew that was impossible, as she carried nothing that would cause an explosion. It must have been a minute before I realised that the Polly Ann was not in motion, save a rocking one from side to side; that there was no sign of a storm, but, instead, a solemn and unnatural stillness.

"Getting my senses together I ran up on deck, coming out from the companion-way upon a scene of destruction, dimly visible under an opal-coloured light, unlike anything which I ever saw. The air was cold and clammy; the skin felt it; the nose breathed it. What I saw made me turn giddy for a second.

"Both masts had gone down within twenty feet of the deck. The spars and top masts lay athwartship after smashing in the bulwarks where they fell. The heel of the bowsprit had been driven back to, and ripped up the cook's galley. Stays, shrouds, all sorts of top hamper was spread like a great net over the deck, pegged down, as it were, by huge pieces of ice from stem to stern. No sky was to be seen, and the only proof of a sea was the swashing of water alongside, and a sound as of distant, muffled thunder.

"Maitland was not in sight. I called without getting a reply.

"Climbing over the wreckage, I found the poor lad senseless beside the wheel, one hand upon it. He had fallen at his post of duty. Clumsy as he was in his clothing, I carried him down to the cabin, forced down his throat some of the captain's brandy, piled on his body all the bedding I could find, and then returned on deck, anxious to discover what had happened.

"All the light there was came through a wall of jagged ice on the port side, that rose with an inward curving to a height of at least a hundred feet.

"There was solid ice on the other side and at the bow, and ice above, some of it hanging from the top in pendants as big round as a ship's mast. Astern had been an opening a little wider than the ship, and perhaps forty feet high, through which the Polly Ann had entered this cathedral of the sea, but the shock of the striking hulk had brought down huge columns of ice, and they lay across this opening, piled up so that but a slit of the sky could be seen through a high-up crevice.

"Putting this and that together, and seeing the lifted-up bow and the sunken stern, I realised that we had sailed with terrific speed into the cavern of a huge iceberg, and were prisoners.

"When I had the facts of this extraordinary situation thoroughly in my head, I was in the depths of despair even while I was full of hope. There seemed no possibility of escape, for even should we be freed from this prison, there was no getting away from the berg, the boats being smashed or lost. We had provisions enough to last two men five years; there was fuel enough, with the oil and the hull of the ship, to last perhaps the same time. After that we could freeze and starve, if we had not died in any other way.

"To think of five years of under-ice existence scared me to my marrow; and yet hope kept saying, 'Something will turn up. Look alive now!'

"I went back to Maitland. He was warm and in a sound sleep. Seeing this, I went on deck again and began to plan. When my mate woke up, hours afterwards, he was in fair condition.

"'Have I talked in my sleep?' was the first question he asked. When I shook my head in answer he simply said, 'I'm glad of that,' and turned his back on me.

"I wondered for a second why he should be curious; then I forgot all about it.

"As soon as he felt strong enough to get about we began to get the wreck into some sort of neatness. Two weeks passed before we had the deck clear, and the ropes and wood cut into shape for fuel. Then came what I had dreaded—days without work.

"Maitland became silent and moped in the cabin; he had plenty of food, but he grew thin, had an unnatural brightness in his eyes, and a short, hacking cough grew upon him. I used to rouse him by getting him to run races on deck, to throw a harpoon at a mark, and sticks at the great icicles; sometimes we would climb up into the caves which ran everywhere into the huge, floating mountain.

"Out of bits of waste paper I made a pack of cards, with which we played hour after hour. I did everything possible to cheer up the poor lad; yet my work seemed useless; he grew weaker and weaker, and his great, sad eyes were seldom dry of tears.

"Weeks passed, as I knew by checking off the daylight, all the time the berg was slowly drifting, as we could tell by the little whirlpools and eddies round the Polly Ann. More light appeared to be filtered through the wall of ice on the port side; every day new rivulets trickled down its rough sides; more water flowed through the old channels, and day and night the tumbling down of pieces of the mountain roared in our ears like thunder.

"One day there came a moaning and a wailing—far away, then near, then far away again—lasting for hours. It was the fog-bell and the whistle of a steamship, sure signs of a warm latitude. Maitland heard it, and coming to me, put an arm on my shoulder, and looking at me through his tears, said:

"'Jack, there's the old cries of human life. I shall never see that life again. You may not think so, but it once was very dear to me; it is now, and I should like to live.'

"With that he leant forward and kissed me on the cheek. Then he buried his face in his hands and cried like a child.

"'Hush, lad! Don't take on like that! You'll hear the birds and see the trees and fields again, never fear. Cheer up, mate!'

"'When I die, Jack—as I shall soon—promise not to throw me overboard, but bury me somewhere on the ship. You'll not be afraid of my body, will you?'

"I promised, and when I had spoken, the poor boy tottered away and down into the cabin, catching hold of things to steady himself as he went.

"An hour later I followed him. He was in the captain's berth, buried under a pile of clothes, as if cold. He did not answer when I spoke, and when I pulled away the covering from his face there was blood on his lips and under his cheek a cloth wet with blood.

"He turned his head and smiled up at me with such a look as I've never seen on a human face.

"'It's not the first, but it's the last, I think,' he whispered, touching the red-stained cloth. 'Oh, I'm so cold, Jack! Call mother! M-o-t-h-e-r! Tell the captain I forgive him. Ah, if the good Lord will only pardon me! Bring the lamp nearer, Jack, I'm freezing.'

"I put the light closer, and, scared at seeing the poor fellow all shivering, I ran at the top of my speed up to the galley, where there was always warm water in the copper, stirred up the fire, and when the water grew hot, dipped into it a rag, and with it steaming in my hands hurried back to poor Maitland.

"He lay just as I had left him, face upwards, but with a waxen whiteness in it and a pinched look that made him seem a stranger. He opened his eyes, and a faint smile came upon his mouth as he saw me again. As I caught hold of the covering on his chest to throw it back, that I might lay on the hot cloth, he tried to push away my hands.

"'Not now,' he whispered. 'Oh, not now, when I'm dying.'

"I did not understand. How could I? With rough, coarse fingers I tore at the buttons of the woollen shirt and threw it open. One look told a sad story, and I softly pulled back the garment over the snow-white breast of a woman!

"I glanced at her face. She was staring at me with wide-open eyes—dead!

"What I might have done when I made these two discoveries, had not another misfortune come upon me at the same instant, would be hard to say. As I straightened back from bending over the figure in the berth, I saw that the cabin was glowing with a red light, so strong that even the face of the dead girl took from it a faint, rosy hue. I was on deck in half a minute, only to see what nearly drove me mad. The Polly Ann was one great fire amidships, the oil-soaked planks of the deck making a pavement for flames that leapt half way to the roof of the cavern. In my haste to warm the water and get back to my dying mate I must have scattered some of the live coals, and here was the result!

"The heat was unbearable, the smoke stifling. Water was flowing in torrents down the sides of the ice, and turning to steam as it came near the hull. Every breath was harder to draw, and foot by foot, like a red wind, came the fire.

"My promise to the dead girl to bury her in the ship was as good as kept, for her body would go with the hull, as mine was likely to go.

"From afar came a long, booming note. The iceberg shook deep under the sea, and the crash of falling weights on the roof and starboard wall followed. There was no time for thinking over the cause. The heat was as stifling as if I were inside a huge oven with the fires going under it.

"Catching up a piece of rope I jumped overboard, and swimming to the stern, lashed myself to the rudder post, holding my head under water as often and as long as possible, preferring to boil rather than roast to death.

"The end was not long in coming. A mighty puff of air, a pushing of my head under the sea, a quaking of the hulk, a parting of the waters beneath, a crash like falling walls, showed that the heated air in the chamber had blown out the partition between prison and liberty, between darkness and sunshine.

"Out of the door thus flung open rolled a cloud of jet-black smoke. With the inletting of fresh air, the flames took fiercer grip on the poor little Polly Ann, raced along the water's edge, dived into the hold and cabin, and swished like vultures round under the stern to catch me by the head.

"Not a half mile distant lay a man-of-war, her sails back, her rigging black with men watching an iceberg spout fire and smoke. Evidently I had been seen, for a boat was dropped from its davits, the dip and flicker of its oars began, and a white foam curled away from its bow, pointed to where I lay.

"Then I fell back in a dead faint. When I came to my senses I was on board the French frigate L'Espérance. From its deck, through a glass, I saw the brave little Polly Ann turn in her cradle, and sink out of sight in clouds of steam and smoke.

"If anything more than this is known about the brig it can only be by the spirit of the dead woman, whose body went down with the ship.

"To all of which I'm ready to make my affidavit.—

THE GLADIATOR.

A Tale of the Eastern Empire.

By GEORGE C. WALLIS.

SUMMARY.

The opposing factions in the public games of ancient Constantinople were known as the "Blues and Greens." The Emperor and Empress favoured the Blues, and consequently the enmity that existed between the two factions was so strong that they could not meet in the streets without coming to blows.

Rhesus, a country youth from Sicily, lands at Constantinople with his friend, Proclus, and with a fixed determination to become famous as a gladiator. He adopts the cause of the Greens, and the first contest in which he takes part is a chariot race, which he would have won had it not been for the foul play of Hermiot, his opponent of the Blues.

Rhesus falls in love with Eutasia, a pretty little waif of the circus, of twelve years, who speedily becomes warmly attached to him.

A few years pass and Eutasia is affianced to Rhesus.

One night Proclus and Rhesus chance to overhear a plot between Hypatius, a claimant to the throne, Marcen, a gladiator of the green faction, and Hermiot of the Blues, to raise the city in revolt, remove Justinian from the throne, and make Hypatius emperor in his place.

Hypatius proceeds to take them singly down to the flooded catacombs under the ground upon which they are standing, where he has vast treasures stored with which he purposes to buy the sympathies of the people. Marcen goes with him first, leaving Hermiot on the watch. Rhesus and Proclus spring out upon Hermiot, bind and gag him. Upon the return of Hypatius and Marcen, Proclus assumes the blue sash of Hermiot, personates Hermiot under the cover of the darkness, and goes down into the catacombs with Hypatius in order to discover the whereabouts of the treasure.

Meanwhile it occurs to Marcen that if he were to cut off the only means of egress from the catacombs, his fellow conspirators will be heard of no more, and he will be the sole possessor of the hidden treasure. He returns to the entrance of the catacombs, followed by Rhesus, who watches him carry out his murderous designs. Marcen discovers the presence of Rhesus and rushes at him. Rhesus eludes him, and a hot chase follows. Rhesus finally gives Marcen the slip, and, together with Pelak, a charioteer of the Greens, returns to the catacombs in order to release his friend Proclus. Upon arriving there, however, they find someone has been before them, and the place is empty.

Rhesus returns home, and is overjoyed to find Proclus awaiting him there. Proclus tells him how that Marcen himself released the prisoners from the catacombs, and how that whilst imprisoned there he, Proclus, had discovered an inscription revealing the hiding-place of the key of a secret door.

Marcen persuades the Empress to take Eutasia into her service, and thus to remove her from the influence of Rhesus. Rhesus hears of it too late to prevent her going to the palace. He pays a clandestine visit to Eutasia in the palace grounds in order to persuade her to fly with him. He is discovered by some spies in the pay of Marcen, and barely escapes with his life.

PART THE SECOND.

"In the Toils of Treachery."

CHAPTER III.

"Nika!"

The day of the games dawned rosy and clear, and from the earliest hour the hum of preparation and excitement hung over the city. Chariots and horsemen dashed hither and thither; the flags and favours of the factions bedecked the houses and palaces, and gates, and churches, and shrines, with masses of mingled blue and green; the gay ladies and lords of the Court rode abroad even in their luxurious cars, making bets on the coming events; the gladiators thronged the arena and practised their several turns for the last time; and the artisans and tradesmen persons, between their drinks at the crowded inns and their endless discussions on the points of the Christian doctrine, could talk of nothing but the games. The city was in a ferment—the ferment of a feverish suspense, of a dim foreknowledge of the days of death so near at hand—and the very slaves went about the streets without fear at the groups of savage-visaged Sythians, who, forgetting their hostility for the day, poured in at the Charsian gate.

As Rhesus and his friend threaded their way towards the busy quarter to which all the crowds tended, Proclus exchanging sundry greetings on the way in his most cynical vein, the thought of what might happen if disorder suddenly broke out and spread, seized our hero, appalling and oppressing him. There were all the elements of riot and anarchy together in the bibulous city, and the two factions needed only very slight provocation to fly at each other's throats and settle their differences once and for all in one wild saturnalia of crime. There had been some talk amongst the greens of appealing to the emperor's mercy, or of rising in open revolt against the weight of injustice under which they laboured, and Rhesus knew that Hypatius had in secret won some over to his cause. But as the two friends had not attended the inner councils of the faction for some time, having lost their hot enthusiasm for a mere colour, they put down much they heard as idle rumour, or wishes that were parents to the thought.

"I like not the aspect of things to-day, friend," said Rhesus, as they drew near to the hippodrome. "A little rent in the thin skin of this jollity would let loose a torrent of blood. But for the knowledge of the hidden treasure and the hope of relief in the future it holds out to us—and Eutasia—I would leave the city before nightfall."

"Which you will not do, and which it is therefore folly to discuss," replied Proclus. "As for the treasure, it is safe enough yet, for besides the two spies I have watching the convent, Marcen has three and Hypatius two more. It is scarcely likely, when the three parties of us are so jealous of each other, that one will have the chance of obtaining it without a struggle. I am trusting to to-day's doings to clear our way considerably. If a good opening offers, I am convinced that Hypatius will seize it; and as certainly as he does, Marcen will betray him and his friends to the Emperor. And then will be our chance. When robbers quarrel, good men take the spoil, as the philosophers say. But step back—quick!—the Imperial cariole is coming, and imperial animals are careless of life and limb. What a handsome driver Justinian employs! And what a steady one has Belisarius, behind there. That is a man, indeed!"

The jovial throng split in twain, making a broad path for the Imperial party, and in a whirlwind of dust, with a rattle and a flash, the people cheering and applauding frantically, they swept by. Justinian, a red-faced man with a firm-set figure, and Theodora, his unscrupulous, cruel, and beautiful wife, clad in robes of silk emblazoned with dragons of gold and violet, sat in the first chariot—a car of gold with white carpet and side curtains of purple, drawn by snow-white mules; behind them, in less state, but with scarcely less hauteur, came the questor and prefect, Tribonius the legislator, and John, the juggler of finance; and behind these Belisarius, the man who ought to have preceeded all, in a plain chariot drawn by his own war-horses.

As Rhesus, like the rest, gazed at the lofty form and majestic head and noble face of their greatest general, and they greeted him with thunders of acclaim, he felt that he would readily have hailed this soldier as emperor of the seven-hilled city that was so poor an imitation of old Rome. If Belisarius had a fault it was that of unfailing loyalty to his master. A man in ten thousand—ay, in a thousand times ten thousand, truly! as Rhesus said again in an after day.

Following in the wake of the whirling wheels, the friends came soon to the circus, and seeking out old Sibron, entered the sanded course in company with him. This time the first event was a race for the honour of a garland of priceless gems, given by Theodora's hand, and each faction had chosen two drivers.

"But one of ours has been foully slain since dawn," cried Sibron, drawing Rhesus towards the cars, "and we can get no redress, nor another volunteer for his place. You are our only hope. You rode well once before; you can win if you try. In with you!"

"But I am not prepared," cried Rhesus, astonished. "I am well known, and hated, and the race will not be fair. Let it go."

An arrow struck the foremost spokesman of the malcontents.

He protested in vain. Friends pressed round and forced the doubtful honour upon him, and ere he well knew where he was, he had taken the reins and was away with the rest; and when he once felt the keen excitement of the race he little cared. As they thundered round the course, to the cries of their partizans, in a close-huddled group of horses and cars, the great sweeping curve of the hippodrome, cut clear against the intense blue of the cloudless sky, the maze of many colours where the mighty throng filled the circling seats, the flushed faces, the hum of the many voices, all faded away, and Rhesus saw only the winning post, heard only the rattle of his rival's wheels.

He kept to the inside edge, gaining fast, and soon had left his comrade in green behind, as well as Hermiot, who rode for the blue, but the other of that colour, a sturdy youth, drove his grey steeds furiously, and for a time kept up the slight advantage he had obtained at the start. Over him, however, Rhesus began to gain after the first round, and hurling his thongs with a hand that had not forgotten its cunning of four years ago, he put such speed into the fast following strokes of his horses' feet, that, sweeping round on the outside, he passed in front amid a roar of excitement that shook the very ground, and tore onward to the goal, flushed, hot, and well-nigh spent, but victorious withal.

After the burst of mingled joy and anger, fell a hush over the assembly, and in the calm, Rhesus rushed on towards success. Scarcely a half-round of the amphitheatre was before him now, and his nearmost foe was a length behind. He had passed the Imperial party with a stern face, which relaxed to a smile as he drew near to the end of the fierce ride, when, glancing at the curving sea of faces at his right, he saw a man rise from his seat and throw something towards him, something that glittered and twisted in the air as it came. He gritted his teeth and held on, but the thing was well aimed, and fell over the horses' backs, and quickly as lightning was twining its sinuous folds round one of them. It was a deadly snake—one of the worst kind—and ere Rhesus could gather his startled senses he was thrown to the ground, one horse had broken loose, and the other was writhing in the death-agony that followed the bite of the venomous thing. And as Rhesus sprang to his feet, indignant, his nearest foe dashed to the front and passed over the winning line, the green driver next, and Hermiot last. The race was to the first chariot that came in, and the race had gone to the blue. So the judges decreed, despite many protests, and as Rhesus walked off, crestfallen, to where Sibron and Proclus awaited him, the masses of brilliant azure round the course rose as one man and cheered the winner and cried contempt on the loser until his blood boiled.

But the unjust decision was not allowed to pass quietly by. It was only the spark that fired the long endured discontent of the greens into open revolt. A roaring cry of rage went up from a thousand throats, a thousand daggers gleamed in the sunlight, a thousand desperate men leapt from their seats and poured into the arena, and stood before the imperial dias. The blue factionaries answered with waving of weapons and yells of derision, and the hippodrome became a scene of chaos. But the leaders of the green faction were determined men, and three forced their way to Justinian's presence and openly demanded redress for injustice, some surcease from unbearable oppression, some promise of impartiality for the future.

Their words were drowned by the howls and hooting of the blues at first, but they persisted, were joined by others, and at last obtaining a hearing, Justinian had no option but to listen. He sat in moody silence for some time, affecting indifference, but at length, weary, and prompted by his advisers, he rose irritably in his place and answered with words that came near to costing him his life.

"You appeal to me in vain," he said, "I will not listen further. The judges of the games have decreed, and I meddle not with their decision. You speak of murder and oppression and public plunder; I ask you what of the 3,000 blues you slew here—of the oppressions of your rule, and of the nightly assassinations. It is notorious that my soldiers have orders to sieze and hang all murderers of either party. So away from my presence, Jews, hypocrites, and heretics!"

He turned to his guards and bade them clear him a way out through the rabble, thinking to have done with the matter, but the sharp, stinging words roused the tamest to action, and as one body the crowd of green colour surged forward towards him. At that, the blues rose in exultant defence, conscious of their superior numbers, and in another moment the factions would have been locked in a terrible struggle. Rhesus's blade was in his hand already, and he would have rushed forward, but Proclus and Sibron held him back, dragging him towards the gate; and it was well for as he wrenched himself free in his frenzy, an arrow well aimed struck the foremost spokesman of the malcontents, and the greens broke and fled, pursued by the revengeful foe. Some were slain in the tiers of seats, some in the arena, and many more in the passages and outlets; and at every avenue of egress a mad throng surged into the streets, carrying blood and disorder into all the quarters of the city.

The weak truce of law was broken and with the watchword "Nika!" ringing in the streets, all the elements of war and discord were let loose at once. With Proclus and Sibron, Rhesus was borne towards the convent of St. Conan in a fierce rush of the partizans, and they presently found themselves fighting against overpowering odds with their backs to its buttressed wall.

"Strike only in defence!" cried Proclus, "and edge away to the right. If we can but gain the passage unseen, and the secret door of which I alone have the key, we are safe."

"Tis easier said than done!" answered Rhesus, for though he had laid low two murderous villains who beset him at once, three more had taken their places, and his friends were falling fast. A slash scored his left arm, a thrust caught him in the leg, old Sibron went down at his side, under the swinging blow of a mace, like a felled ox. The wielder of it laughed aloud and turned to Rhesus, and as its spiked head hung above him, the Roman thought his end had come.

But the kindly fates had willed it otherwise, and the blow fell not upon him. The crowd of foes surged back, and the uplifted arm shortened its stroke. There was a cry of "Sanctuary! Sanctuary!" and a procession of portly monks came towards the convent gate, bearing the bodies of two half-strangled men to its sacred shelter.

A great concourse of both factions followed them, and cries of "Down with the traitor! down with the unjust minister!" rent the air. The two friends pressed forward, asking questions, forgetting their enemies at the strange sight, and learnt that the soldiers had seized and attempted to hang seven notorious assassins of both factions—had hung five, but failed to prevent the friends of the two last from rescuing them in the final extremity. One of the murderers thus snatched from the jaws of the death they so richly deserved, wore a sash of blue, the other a badge of green, and the factions cast aside their enmity and joined in attacking the soldiers.

There is nothing so fickle as an enraged mob, and in a moment, fired by the fierce harangues of several champions of the green, who dwelt upon the weight of the taxes and the sins of the quæstor and prefect, the opposing colours united as against a common enmity, and the blood-thirsty horde surged tumultuously towards the palace, venting its erst divided rage upon such luckless soldiers and loyalists as came in their way.

Out of all the dark dens and back ways of the city, the dregs of the population poured—the slaves, the assassins, the hunted criminals, the human wolves that spring forth and prey on society at all such times—and in the midst of it all, borne forward as on the crest of a mighty wave, seeing many of the emissaries of Hypatius at their now easy work, Proclus and Rhesus found themselves fighting side by side with men whose knives, but a moment before, had been at their throats.

The city was turned into Hades. Through the riot and carnage, fighting madly, giving and receiving many hard blows, the friends found themselves at length near their own house. There, with a last struggle, they got out of the maddened mob, and wounded, and exhausted, but at least secure for a time, sought refuge within doors.

CHAPTER IV.

For Friendship's Sake.

All the rest of that day, and through the night, the slaughter and riot went on, the clash of arms sounded incessantly, the cries of the wounded and dying rang dismally in the ears of the home stayers, the glare and roar of incendiary fires lit up the darker hours. Justinian, growing fearful for his own safety, publicly appealed for some restoration of order, promising to dismiss the obnoxious ministers whose exactions had so roused the popular ire; but the enraged citizens refused to listen to him; and even when—to show his good faith—he officially bade the quæstor and prefect leave their positions, the reign of terror went on unchecked. So widespread was the tumult, so numerous were the bands of armed ruffians who held the city at their mercy, that all the wealthy and respectable citizens who could, conveyed themselves and their goods beyond the wall and camped out in the open beyond the Golden and the Charsian gates, and only a few regiments of mercenaries, the raw Heruli levies, and the British and Gothic soldiers of the Imperial Guard, remained to combat the revolutionaries.

These fought hard and well, sometimes driving back the rioters from the main streets, but they were no match in the end for the mad fury of a city let loose and ravening for blood.

As for Proclus and Rhesus, they kept to the house. It would have been madness to have risked their lives again in that horrible maelstrom of murder, and they were in hopes that by keeping quiet they would escape unmolested until the storm had spent itself. But it was fated differently.

Their slaves were well fed and well paid, and all trusty men, and sending them out at night, one at a time, they kept well acquainted with events. The fourth day passed like the rest, in alternate hope and fear, and as yet neither Hypatius nor Marcen had made any sign, but on the fifth of those days of blood one of the slaves ran in with hair streaming and garments rent, crying excitedly that the people had chosen a new emperor, the nephew of Anastasius, and that all who did not come out and enlist under him would be counted as his enemies. Even as he spoke, the sound of fighting came down the street, and going to the house-top, the friends saw that a group of the foreign soldiery was retreating slowly palacewards, pursued by a pressing crowd of the frantic citizens, led by Pompey, the brother of Hypatius.

A fresh fervour seemed to nerve the rebels. They fought like fiends, and all along the streets the women and children threw out stones and spears and braziers of blazing wood upon the heads of the luckless soldiers, and every time a gap was made in the sullenly retiring ranks, a hundred wild-eyed fanatics would hurl themselves in and fall upon the others with appalling recklessness.

"If these foreigners fought not so stubbornly, and Belisarius was not so obstinate a general, the cause of Hypatius would be at once assured," said Proclus. "As it is, I am afraid it is only a matter of time, unless Hypatius himself spoils all by hesitation. But do you not think, Rhesus, that now is our chance to get to the Hall of Waters, until one or the other wins the day? We are not safe here, now, and there we could be in hiding and be bringing some of the treasure to the bottom of the steps ready for removal. Then, even if Hypatius gains the purple, we can slip away unperceived with a fortune under our cloaks, and seek a new life elsewhere."

"It will be well," said Rhesus, "if we get out of here alive—which I doubt, for they have eyes on us already—but what of Eutasia? I go not without her."

"Leave that until later," returned the cynic shortly. "We must look to ourselves now. As you say, we are noticed—nay, we are beseiged—and we have some hot work on hand. Not so fast, my worthy marksman; not so fast."

He sprang nimbly aside as an arrow from the yelling crowd whizzed past him, and together they went down into the house and bade the slaves guard the doors. It was evident they were now discovered, and as Proclus said, having found the way to the treasure blocked and shrewdly guessing who had to do with it, Hypatius would have scant mercy on them if they fell into his clutches.

"It is fight to the last!" cried Rhesus, as a slave shouted out that the house was attacked on all sides, "no quarter, no truce! Rhesus the Roman and the ancient gods!"

And standing by the open casement near the central portico, that was now barricaded heavily, he called derisively to the savage foes to come on as he plied his arrows thick and fast. This but enraged them the more, and they assaulted furiously, besetting every outlet of the house and even, in one fierce charge, bursting down the barrier.

But as they scrambled over its ruins the defenders spitted them with their spears, and so hacked and hewed at their disorderly array that they gave back defeated. Three times the angry mob thus dashed at the door, and three times the trusty slaves beat them back; three times they broke and recoiled, shattered, spent, as a curling billow breaks upon a crag-embattled shore.

Then they drew off a space, hesitating. The twilight deepened, the reflection of a dozen fires flashed and reddened on the darkening sky from where plunder and iconoclasm were wreaking their devastating will. Then suddenly, whilst the beseiged were waiting the outcome of the delay, a forking tongue of flame shot up from the house below, on the street, another from above, and yet a third from a house in the rear; and ere they could well realise the horror of their position, they were surrounded by a curve of fire impassable by human life. And between the ends of the curve was the mob that hungered for their blood.

These attacked again, and more furiously, and once more forced the door and gained the lower hall, this time driving the defenders to the housetop. There these turned at bay, and since the stairway was but narrow, slew the wretches one by one as they came up until they were weary of the slaughter and ceased the attack.

"We are safe for a little while, at all events," said Proclus." It would needs take a slim man to pass between our weapons here, Rhesus."

"Those who have passed have been slim enough to vanish into the folds of the future," said Rhesus. "But, by the valour of Achilles, 'tis likely that we shall soon follow them there! They are firing the house itself, and we shall end our days like rats smoked out of their holes!"

As he spoke, a wreath of blue smoke curled up the stairway and the smell of burning with it, and as the wreath was followed by others, until they were enveloped in a cloud of smoke through which fiery tendrils now and then extended, a loud cry of exultation went up from the wolfish crowd.

He swung himself over the edge.

"I care not to die suffocated;" said Proclus, dashing to the edge of the parapet nearest the street, "better broken bones and a sudden death than that! Over with you all after me—they are crowded thickly here, and either this fuel or their heads will break the fall!"

The round disc of brass caught the fellow edgways under the ear.

In another moment he had thrown down his blade and shield, swung himself over the edge, and vanished. Stumbling as they went, blinded by the dense smoke, Rhesus and the six slaves who were left, followed him, dropping one by one through the grey murk.

Bracing himself for a rebound, so that the fall might be broken, Rhesus felt his feet sink into something soft and yielding, from which he rose unhurt, though shaken, to find Proclus at his side.

"It is fortunate," said the cynic, ruefully glancing at his swordless belt, "that they have made such a confounded puther with their fire. We should not have escaped else, and we have a good chance now. Down among this hay, all of you, and slip out one by one into the crowd. You, slaves, can easily get out of danger. As for you and I, Rhesus, we will keep together."

"Friends once, friends to the end! But let me lead; I have kept my sword!"

Already loud cries of exultation rose from the rioters, and through the thick clouds of smoke that enveloped them, and crept between the wisps of the hay upon which they had fallen, the friends could see their foes gradually drawing off the house. Its neighbourhood was dangerous, and the fanatics thought the fire had done their work. In the confusion the two escaped unnoticed, and by the time they had gained the opposite side of the way, and cautiously mixed with the crowd, they saw the heap of hay catch fire and send up a long roaring sheet above the crashing ruins of the falling house.

The conflagration was spreading rapidly, like the others that were reddening the sky; so the fugitives got off easily, making straight for the convent. As they went they saw that the great baths of Zeuxippus were involved in flames, which stretched out greedy fingers that curled round the sacred walls of St. Sophia; and someone running past cried exultantly that the prefect's palace was destroyed. This news but served to quicken their pace, and at last, unnoticed, they dashed down the narrow passage and sought the sacred door. With wonderful calmness the cynic touched the spring, and they went in.

"Shall we wait here, or go farther?" Rhesus asked. "I have no mind to breathe the foul air of the vault for the gods know how long."

"Nor I," answered Proclus. "It would be safer, but most unpleasant, and if we keep watch here and have our ears open, I think we shall not need."

So they composed themselves to wait until the clamour of the rioting without should subside, then intending to adventure down for as much of the treasure as they could carry and be away before dawn. The sea was not far off, and there were boats and ships in plenty on all the shores of that city of unparalleled laziness and lawlessness, debauchery and drink. The thoughts of Rhesus ran on his Eutasia's pretty face, wilfully obstinate as he had last seen it; and out of the ceaseless droning of the outside noises, and the images his fancy painted on the background of the darkness, he fashioned two visions that were each alive with motion and moved with the passing of time.

One vision was a fair one—of himself and a golden haired girl companion wandering through a lovely garden hand in hand, with never a cloud to mar the sunshine of the day nor a breath of chiller air to pale the cheeks of his health or her pink beauty; the other was a vision of evil—of two outcasts wandering in the desert, blinded by the ceaseless glare of the sun and the scorching sand, nigh unto death with thirst and hunger, and neither knowing where the other was, though in truth they were not far apart. And he thought that the pictures contended with each other, first one and now another prevailing and filling the field of his mental vision, but never to hold it long. And then the shifting scenes that Hope and Fear together wove for him in that precarious hour changed to the dreams of a troubled sleep as the dawnshine melts into the perfect day.

He was awakened by the trample of many feet, the clamour of many voices, and Proclus shouting in his ear: "The enemy have found us out; they are beating at the door! Quick! down the stairs and past the falling door beyond the water!"

Rating himself soundly for his drowsiness at such a time, Rhesus asked, as they ran hurriedly down the moss-covered steps below the stone trap-door, how long he had slept and why he had been allowed.

"You were overwrought," said Proclus simply, "and I could not fashion to rouse you. And I was awake and could watch. They came silently until they were at the door, or I would have wakened you sooner. But faster! their torches gleam behind!"

"It is Hypatius or some of his followers!" cried Rhesus, as they sprang into the boat and pushed off into the Cimmerian darkness that brooded over the water. "But I think they have run for nothing, after all!"

He turned and laughed at the group of men who came to the foot of the steps and hurled a volley of curses, with several arrows, at them; but the laugh died away on his lips when he saw that the foremost, the leader, was Marcen, that their blue-banded garments were splashed with blood, and that with wildly-reckless exultation they one and all leapt into the black flood and swam after the boat.

The friends pulled hard, but the torch-light was uncertain and the chain that guided them hard to see, and though they gained the footstone of the low arch first, they were scarcely within the sloping passage when the pursuers were upon them. They turned at bay, and Proclus with dagger drawn, Rhesus with sword, awaited the mad onset.

"Something terrible has happened," said Proclus, as they hesitated a moment before the rush, "or they would not set such value upon our worthy selves. The night has not gone so well with the green faction, I fear—And if I fall, Rhesus, and you live, take the key of the treasure and let it be your own, and Eutasia's. It is hung by a silken thread in the cloth of my left sleeve—And now for the final act in the tearful comedy of this indifferent, merry life of ours. You to the right, Rhesus; I to the left; and here a health to the ancient gods and the badge of green—in a drink that is richer and redder than wine!"

The pursuers came on them, pell-mell, all at once, and in the flickering light of the torches, in the narrow width of the slimy passage, the friends fought what they thought would be their last fight, but with the desperate energy of men who are determined to die hard. They had a little advantage owing to the darkness and the scarcity of room, and for a time kept the pursuers off, retiring slowly step by step, towards the great rock door. Marcen, a coward now that his hounds had driven the wolves to bay, kept discreetly to the rear of his gang, urging them on by threats and promises to take the two alive if it could be done, but to be quick over their work, as there was much else waiting.

In the narrow way and the uncertain light of the swaying torches, the contest was not so unequal as it seemed, and though retreating warily, Rhesus kept the assailants the length of his sword away. Few there were who passed it as it made a red-flaming arch from side to side of the tunnel; and the few who did found in the dagger of Proclus a more deadly weapon; and thus as the sword sang, and the sharp knife rose and fell, and the crowding assassins pressed on, the fight went down to where, grim, silent, impassive, the great rock door took shape from the grey gloom and barred their way.

At sight of it there came a lull in the strife, the ruffians thinking their foes in a corner, and as Marcen peered with shaded eyes at the smooth wall at their backs, Rhesus saw a sudden terror blanch his face, and knew that he suspected some secret which he could not fathom. For a moment of suspense he stood as one transfixed; then, his vagrant courage flaring up with the chagrin of his disappointed avarice, he sprang towards the friends with a fierce cry on his lips, and a heavy mace, studded with cruel spikes, uplifted in his right hand, calling upon his men to make an end of them speedily, and bring them out, alive or dead.

But in that brief moment of delay, a friend had offered his life for a friend—in vain, and yet not in vain. For seeing that one might hold the passage while the other raised the swinging stone and passed under to safety, Proclus had resolved to do so while his friend escaped, so that one of them at least might escape. At first Rhesus protested, saying that his should be the honour of keeping the way, but Proclus would have no refusal, and was so masterful, and the time for discussion was so short, that with a very bad grace the other consented.

"But of the two I have the mind least at ease!" he said, as with shaking hand he took the slender key.

"Tush!" answered Proclus, with a cynical smile—sardonic to the last—as he took the red blade in exchange and stepped forward. "Tush! I have no one to whom my life is worthy; no one for whom I care to live; and you have Eutasia and enthusiasm. Stand back, friend, and let me get at these fellows, and quick with your key there and begone! Let down the door as soon as you are past, and mind not me. I am weary of the world and would fain die flaunting a sword in its face! Away with you!"

With that grim smile still curving the corners of his mouth, he pushed Rhesus unceremoniously aside and turned to face the ghastly-visaged crew led by Marcen, who at that moment moved down upon him.

With a choking sensation in his throat that was new to him, half reluctant, yet half glad with a sheer animal love of life, Rhesus staggered down the tunnel a pace and sought the orifice. He found it and was about to place the key therein, when through the echoing passage rang a cry of mocking triumph, the rush of many feet, and the whistle of an arrow that splintered on the rock above his head; and thrusting the key into the folds of his green sash, Rhesus turned with clenched hands to meet his fate.

Proclus was down now, writhing in the death-grip, with his fingers locked on the wrists of a foe who strove to get his dagger free. He was looking towards his friend. Over the fallen twain three great ruffians, followed by Marcen, leapt. Rhesus had little time for thought and less for action, and ere he could use even his bare knuckles in defence, two swords gleamed on either side of him and a third glittered above his head. Marcen sprang forward with a cry to the man to desist and take his foe alive, but the warning came too late and the weapon curved through the swaying lights and shadows to the fatal fall. But Proclus saw the danger also, and his warning came not in vain. He loosed his hold of his foe, and freed himself with a sudden twist, and snatching up a fallen shield, hurled it full, with a last, heroic effort, at the head of the giant whose stroke impended over his friend.

The round disc of brass caught the fellow edge-ways under the ear, and sent him spinning and reeling against the slime-glistened wall. The blow fell short, and as Rhesus swayed, struggling in the grasp of the others, he saw Proclus fall back to the floor and the dagger of his foe flash down.

Marcen made his men search the two carefully, and himself went over them again and again, seeking for some clue to the secret whose existence he suspected; but the precious key must have slipped from Rhesus in the struggle, for it was not found. With black rage making his evil face the more evil in the semi-darkness, Marcen bade his men be going back. Rhesus was bound still more tightly and half carried, half dragged, between two stout villains to the front, feeling more dead than alive. Proclus they pulled to the water, and there with many a grim jest at the size of his mausoleum, two of them cast him in. Something sharp caught between the toes of his right foot and the wood of his sandal, and Rhesus could have cried aloud with the agony as he was hurried away; but in the haste and the darkness he could not distinguish its nature, and presently the pain was numbed. He was pulled out of the boat, and then up the narrow stairs, and so into the upper chamber.

Into this poured a dense volume of blue-grey smoke, through which the torches gleamed dully yellow, and as they dashed up through the blinding reek and out into the open air in the midst of a wild gust of wind and flame that swept round the crumbling walls of the doomed convent—fired by some reckless incendiary—Rhesus' head was swung sharply against a stone and he remembered no more.

The Changed Envelopes.

Carl stood gazing at the pretty head, very well executed in marble.

"Poor Rudolph," he murmured. "He is tired of the struggle for success, and I should like to see him win the competition so that he might marry his Lena. But ——"

He sighed, crossed the room and took up his chisel. The hot sun poured in through the one window which the little room, high up under the roof, contained.

Carl, and Rudolph, his friend, shared the room as a common studio. They had been friends now for six years, drawn closer together by the struggle, the disappointments, the poverty, which were the lot of both.

The door was thrown open and Rudolph entered.

"What luck, mein Freund?" asked Carl.

Rudolph tossed his cap upon the bare floor and sank wearily into a chair.

"Luck? None," he replied bitterly. "The dealer claims that he has not had even one offer for my dancing girl. The price is so high; he urges that one unknown, like myself, should not set so high a price, upon their work. He calls twenty-five too high a price, when once I would have laughed at the very idea of selling such a piece of work for less than two hundred marks. Oh, Carl, I am weary of the struggle! I had better go back to the old house and the work in the fields."

Carl crossed the room and laid his hand gently upon Rudolph's shoulder.

The two young men were strikingly dissimilar in appearance. Carl had the shoulders of a Hercules, with a face as fair as a woman's, clear blue eyes, soft and gentle in expression, and fair hair, curly and silken as a little child's. Rudolph was sinewy in build, dark and swarthy, with very black hair, and restless, passionate eyes.

"Cheer up, Rudolph," said Carl, "luck will come after awhile. Perhaps it is here even now; listen! Herr Frankinstein, our good Meister, has been here during your absence. The Count von Wardenburg invites all sculptors to submit at the end of three months the model of a statue of the Virgin. The sculptor submitting the model adjudged to be the best will receive the commission to make a life-sized statue for the Liebfrauen Kirche, for which he will be paid 20,000 marks."

"'Tis a fortune! I could then marry my dear Lena; and it would mean fame also, and fame means riches. I shall commence at once," cried Rudolph.

He rose to his feet and moved impetuously across the room. Carl smiled a pleased, gentle smile, and returned to his work.

* * * * *

Three months went by.

Rudolph was standing in the attic studio before a small plaster of Paris model of the Virgin. His arms were folded across his breast, his dark brows met in a moody frown.

"It is perfect!" he muttered. "Perfect!"

The door opened and a thin little man, with long, rough hair and twinkling black eyes, came into the room. As he caught sight of the model he tossed both hands above his head with a rapturous exclamation.

"Himmel! it is good, it is sublime!" he cried. "Rudolph, you have surpassed yourself. You will surely get the commission."

Rudolph started and his lips quivered.

"You—you are pleased with it?" he stammered.

"Pleased? I am enchanted, enraptured!" replied little Herr Frankinstein, his small body quivering with excitement.

"It is perfect! The whole figure breathes purity; you have a white soul, Rudolph, or you could never have designed that."

Rudolph turned abruptly away, crossed the room and returned with another model, which he placed beside the first.

"What do you think of this?" he asked hoarsely, while his eyes, full of passionate questioning, sought Herr Frankinstein's face.

The latter, with his head on one side, looked critically at the model.

"Ah! 'tis Carl's, I suppose," he said. "It is good, much like yours in some respects, but falling far short indeed. It has no chance to win the commission."

A swift pallor swept over Rudolph's face. His eyes rested gloomily upon the two models.

"I stepped in to tell you," continued Herr Frankinstein, "that the models must be sent to the committee not later than to-morrow. A sealed envelope must accompany each model, containing the name of the sculptor. These will not be opened till the decision is made, so you see the name or fame of the sculptor will bear no weight. You understand, my boy?"

"Yes, I understand," replied Rudolph dully.

Herr Frankinstein grasped his hand and shook it vigorously. There were tears in the little man's eyes.

"I am proud of you my dear Rudolph," he said. "Proud that you were my pupil!"

A little while later Carl returned, to find Rudolph pacing up and down the room, his face pale and drawn.

"You have come at last, Carl," he said. "I have news for you that will make you very glad. Herr Frankinstein has been here, and he went wild with delight over your model. He says it will win the commission, and he is not likely to err in his judgment."

Carl's eyes rested quietly upon Rudolph's face. His own showed no delight, no exultation.

"Really?" he said gravely. "Well, we shall see."

"I must leave you early to-morrow morning, Rudolph," said Carl, when his friend returned from a walk that evening. "I am summoned home. An uncle has died and left me a small competence. I go to see about it."

"Accept my congratulations, Carl," said Rudolph, wearily. "The Goddess of Fortune smiles upon you at last. But you will return to make the statue?"

"You seem very sure that I shall win, Rudolph," he said. "I am not so positive. If such should be the case, however, I will return to Berlin. You will let me know the result."

Early the next morning Carl took his departure. In the evening he stopped for the night in a small village. He was sitting in his room at the inn, when the door was thrown open and Rudolph entered. Carl sprang in surprise to his feet. Rudolph's face was white and his eyes were haggard. He sprang forward and caught Carl's arm. His hands were trembling with excitement and fatigue.

"Carl," he panted, "thank Heaven that I have found you!"

"What do you wish of me, Rudolph?" asked Carl gently, and that was the last time Rudolph ever heard the gentleness in Carl's voice, or saw the look of tenderness in Carl's soft blue eyes.

"Carl," he cried, "I have a confession to make to you. Listen! I—I so longed to win that commission. You know all that it meant to me, riches, fame, and Lena. I had set my heart, my soul, my very life upon it. When I realised that your model was superior to mine, I felt that I should go mad with despair. And in the night, Carl, a temptation came to me. As you know, the models were packed and ready to send in the morning. With each was a sealed envelope containing your name and mine. The tempter whispered in my ear, 'Change those envelopes.' You were going away, you would return only in case your model was the accepted one.

"I had permitted Herr Frankinstein to believe that your model was the one carved by myself. It was all very easy. Whereas I could not have conceived your model, I could accurately copy it in marble. And the tempter dulled my conscience by whispering that I stood so much more in need of the fame and the money than yourself, who were now independent.

"Carl! Carl! You were my friend, and I loved you, but both love and friendship, and honour, too, went down before that temptation, and—and I crept into the studio and changed the envelopes."

He paused, and buried his face in his hands. Carl looked at him more sorrowfully than angrily.

"And you have followed me to confess this to me—why?" he asked.

Rudolph lifted his face, its pallor stained with a red flush of excitement.

"Because," he replied, "it appears that after all Herr Frankinstein and myself were wrong in our judgment, or the committee failed to see the merit that we did, for, Carl, it was my model that was chosen! Do you understand, Carl—my model, to which I had attached your name? A messenger came to the studio for you. I told him you had gone away, and I set out to follow you. I have been half mad; but, oh, Carl, something must be done to give me back my own!"

"You will return with me—you will tell them that the model was mine—that there was a mistake."

"There was no mistake," Carl's voice, clear, cold and stern, interrupted him. "Listen to me," he continued, as Rudolph stared bewilderingly up into his face—that fair face which he had never seen so forbidding and stern before. Rudolph shrank from the look in the blue eyes bent upon him. "While you were planning treachery against me," said Carl, "I was pondering how I could turn matters for your interest and welfare. I knew that my model was superior to yours and I was sorry, for I wanted you to win the commission. I loved you better than myself. I could not sleep for thinking of it, and about daylight it occurred to me to change the envelopes. I first wrote you a letter entreating you to accept the commission should my model win—that for you to acquire fame and fortune would afford me more happiness than to have both myself. This letter I placed so that you would receive it as soon as the result of the competition was made known. After I had written the letter I went into the studio and changed the envelopes."

A low moan broke from Rudolph's lips. He sank down into a chair and hid his face in his hands.

"I have loved you well, Rudolph," continued Carl, "loved you better even than myself, and I would have forgiven anything save treachery. Even had you come and made this confession to me through remorse and repentance I might still have forgiven. But no, you confessed your treachery only that you might escape its consequences, and still reap the harvest which you imagined your guilty hand had put from you."

Rudolph lifted his face and looked helplessly up into Carl's.

"What—what will you do?" he asked.

"I shall return to Berlin," replied Carl. "I shall claim my rights. The explanation of the mistake I leave to you. I shall contradict whatever explanation you may see fit to offer. The 20,000 marks received for the statue shall be yours, the fame shall be mine."

"And then?" murmured Rudolph, and into his eyes flashed the old tenderness, wistful, infinitely sad.

But there came no softness into Carl's blue eyes.

"And then," he replied, "you and I will be strangers for ever."

And Rudolph bowed his dark head, for at that moment neither fame nor riches seemed as sweet as the friendship he had forfeited.

"Well, Nelly," said my uncle, meeting me at the porch, "do you see any changes?"

It was the morning after my arrival. I had been looking at the hills, and breathing the most delightful air, and saying over and over to my happy self:

"I'm so glad to be in the dear old place one more."

"I have noticed but one change," I made answer to Uncle Allen, "and that is in the occupants of the cottage by the spring. The Trents used to be there. Baby Mary was a great pet of mine."

"Mary's father prospered while here, and has bought a little place of his own down by the river."

"And who lives in the cottage now? I saw two young men come out of there before breakfast."

"Yes; they're working on my farm this year. They lodge there with an elderly woman, a weaver of considerable skill——"

"And a big talker," said Aunt Mary, from the doorway. "You're such a girl for stories, Nelly, you must get Mrs. Earle to tell you some. She can serve you with any kind, from a ghost story to an incident of the American Civil War—she was out there at the time."

"That woman has seen hard times, stirring times, exciting times," said Uncle Allen. "She is said to have been in many parts of the world."

"She has been the heroine of many an adventure," said my aunt. "You will enjoy her talks, Nelly."

Impetuosity had ever been one of my characteristics.

"I should like to go at once and see her weave and hear her talk!" I cried. "But how can I get her into a reminiscent train of thought?"

Aunt Mary laughed.

"No matter what you say, child, you will remind her of some interesting chapter of personal history."

So I donned my hat and ran down the hill to call upon this woman of such varied life memories.

I heard the noise of the loom long before I reached the open door. So busy was the weaver that I had to knock before she saw me. At the sound she started and gave such impetus to the fling of her shuttle, that it fell at my feet.

I hastened to restore it, at the same time begging her not to rise.

"You are Mrs. Earle?" I asked doubtfully, for I had pictured a bent and care-worn woman, bearing the marks of her changeful life. I saw instead a figure as straight as a plumb-line; an expressive face; a pair of dark eyes as bright as a baby's, and heavy black hair twisted high on a well shaped head.

"That's who I am," she answered cordially, "and I know who you are without asking. Your uncle's been expectin' you for more than a week. You look enough like him to be his daughter. Sit down in that chair and take off your hat."

"Don't let me interrupt you," I said. "I never saw anybody weave, and came down to watch you."

Having thus stated half the truth, I drew my chair beside the loom.

The weaver smiled like one humouring a child, and bent to her task without a word.

When the work had increased about two inches in length, Mrs Earle gave a sudden short laugh.

"It didn't look very friendly of me to fling the shuttle at you," she said.

"That was my fault. I knocked so abruptly that it startled you."

"I've been a weaver off and on ever since I was a girl of eighteen. That is the second time in all these years that I tossed my shuttle so hard that it went out of the door. I thought of that other time the minute it flew out of the door."

She stopped the weaving and looked past me through the open door with so thoughful an air that I scented my story.

"Tell me about it, please," I said, inwardly smiling at the remembrance of Aunt Mary's parting assurance.

"It was in December and dreadfully cold," she began. "Father was in the war, the American Civil War, I mean. He was an Englishman, but he was drawn into it. Mother was weakly, and I had to take care of her and the children. I was older than the rest by a good deal.

"The four years of the war seemed forty years to me. All the men for miles round were gone, and all the boys that were big enough to shoulder muskets.

"But at the time I was speaking of, one of our neighbours, a young man, was home on furlough; he'd been wounded in the arm. Him an' me had always known each other and liked each other the way boy and girl will, you know. For I went out there when I was a child.

"Well, one day his mother came over to our house and she says to me:

"'Rose, where's Louis gone to?'

"'I don't know I'm sure,' says I, and blushed, for I was bashful, and it worried me to have her make out that I knew more about Louis' comings and goings than she did. I'd been wondering why he hadn't come round the day before, for he'd been in the habit of dropping in every day.

"Louis was a great hunter. I've known him to go off in the mountains by himself and stay a week or two, hunting and trapping. But I knew that wasn't where he'd gone now, for his arm wasn't strong enough yet to carry a gun.

"A few days after his mother was at our house the door opened and Louis walked in. Mother had taken all the children and gone to see a neighbour a little way off, so I was alone. I was weavin' a carpet.

"Louis came over to the loom. He had a buckskin pouch in his hand. Without saying a word he took out a gold piece and laid it on the carpet right under my eyes. Then he took out another and laid it by the side of that one, and then another and another, till they stretched the full width of the carpet and part way back. There was fifty of them. Then Louis says:

"'Rose, will you share these shiners with me?'

"A little streak of sunshine came through the window and made the gold glitter till it hurt my eyes. I looked up at Louis. His face shone yellow like the gold. I don't know why, but as I looked at him I didn't like him as well as I did before he went away and came back with all his money. I was troubled in my mind.

"'How did you come by all this, Louis?'

"'I earned it.'

"'How?'

"'By saving an army.'

"'What army? And how?'

"He began to brush the gold into a pile with his hand.

"'It ain't fair for me to answer a dozen questions for you before you answer one for me,' says he, laughing strangely; 'but a girl must always have her curiosity satisfied.

"'Well, this army that I saved from being cut to pieces had got into a very awkward position. The enemy had heard it was goin' to cross the mountain, and they throwed up fortifications on top and fixed a regular trap for it. At a certain place that they'd have to pass, trees were nearly cut down so that a few picks would finish them. Men were hid waitin' for the army to go by, and then they were to topple these trees across road and shut off retreat.

"'Things were planned very well, but the army got wind of it somehow. They couldn't go back, for they were runnin' from the enemy, an' they couldn't go on, for there was another enemy waitin' for 'em in front. They didn't know how to get out of the trap.

"'Then a feller who knowed about me bein' at home goes up to the General, and says: "There's a man not far from here that knows every inch of ground on these mountains. If anybody can lead us out of here, he's the man."

"'"Fetch him here double quick," says the General.

"'So this feller——'

"'Who was it, Louis?' I asked.

"But he clinked his money against my shuttle and laughed at my curiosity again.

"'This feller and five more, armed to the teeth, came across me and says: "You're to come with us and no questions asked."

"'So they took me to the General. He tells me the fix they're in and asks if there's any escape. I says yes. He waits for no more.

"'"Lead me out and you will be richer by a good deal. Refuse, and you'll be a dead man in five minutes."

"'I thought of you, Rose, and led them down through the valley and well on towards Covington.'

"'Was it our men?' says I.

"I remember how dry my lips were and how choked I felt in the throat.

"'It was life or death to me,' says he, 'so what difference does it make to you which army I saved?'

"'If 'twas our men, it was outrageous for you to take the money. If you helped the enemy and prevented a great victory for our side, you're a traitor! And if you mean to say that thinkin' about me made you a traitor, I'll thank you to stop your thinkin'.'

"He took his hand off the gold and looked at me with a black face.

"'If it had been you, I suppose you would have told them to fire away?' he said, with a sneer. 'You're very brave, but I can tell you it don't feel so nice to be shot.'

"I knew as well as if he had told me that he had opened the trap and let the enemy out.

"I took the buckskin bag and put all the gold back into it.

"'I won't share your money, and I wish you good-bye,' says I.

"He took the bag and turned away without a word, and I began to weave again.

"I was full of temper in those days, and I was all on fire for our side, though I wasn't a born American.

"To think that Louis had helped the enemy made me so mad that I hardly knew what I was doing. I gave my shuttle a tremendous fling, and it hit Louis in the back as it went out of the door. Of course he thought I did it on purpose, but he never looked round.

"Well, all kind feelings between him and me was over. He joined the other side."

"Did you learn who the General was, and do you think that Louis would really have been shot?"

"Yes, I did hear who it was; and a man I know saw the General after the war, and asked him that very question. 'On the spot and like a dog!' says he."

"That wouldn't have saved his army. But, tell me, would you have refused to guide him out?"

"Miss Nelly," said she solemnly, "when Louis was tellin' his tale, I had no idea. That was the enthusiasm in me. But many a time since then I've lain awake at night thinkin' about it. Of course, promises nor threats wouldn't have moved me; but if I'd stood there lookin' over hundreds of men, and knowed that I could be the means of savin' 'em or destroyin' 'em, I'm not going to say I wouldn't have led 'em out. I'm a woman, and God's put soft hearts in us women."

I was strangely moved by the fire of her glance and the rugged picturesqueness of her words.

She leant over her neglected work, and tossed the shuttle through the wrap backwards and forwards a dozen times. Then she gave me a side look, and asked curiously:

"What would you have done, Miss Nelly?"

And I, too, have asked this question of myself in those rare night hours, when sleep has refused to "weigh mine eyelids down."

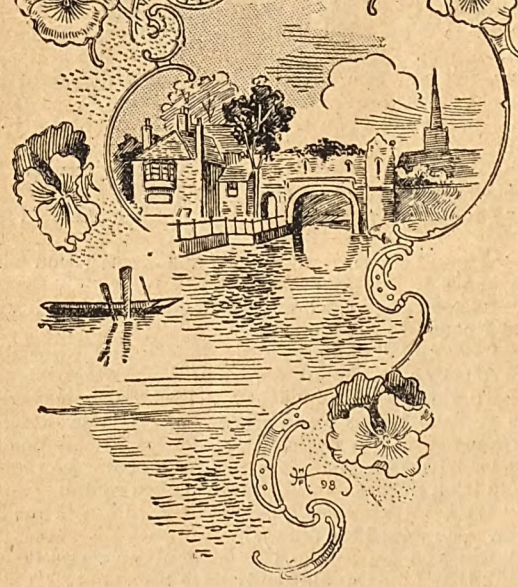
An Artistic Revenge.



"At last, Scott, we're on Homeric ground. I suppose Clytemnestra superintended the family washing for the lordly house of Agamemnon down by that brook."

Thus spoke one of the two stalwart and sun-browned young men who were seated beneath an olive tree on the hillside just north of the site of ancient Mycenæ, in the Pelopponesus. They were English gentlemen who were making a pedestrian tour through Greece, and had arrived, on a hot September afternoon, at this famous place.

Their elevated position gave them an extended view of the beautiful Argolic Gulf, with a big man-of-war riding at anchor in the offing, from the mast of which the British flag floated, brilliant in the slanting sunshine. At the foot of the hill on which they were seated, across the little fields and orchards where the peasants were busy with the harvest, they saw a group of women at the brook in the valley below.

The young man who had spoken put his field-glass to his eyes.

"By Jove, Scott!" he exclaimed, "I tell you these Greek women are the handsomest in the world. Well might one of their great-great-grandmothers have kept two nations in commotion for ten years. Do you see the tallest girl in that group? Look at her! A form like a goddess! An ideal Helen of Troy!"

Scott slowly took his pipe from his mouth.

"Come now, Lyle, you're raving again," he replied. "Your newly-discovered Helen is doubtless a goat-herd from that miserable village down there, with a soul as ignorant of sentiment as her garments are of soap."

"Well, Scott," replied Lyle, with severity, "I am thankful for one thing at least, and that is that my soul isn't yet quite dried up within me, till it has lost all power to see the beautiful, as yours has. Come, let's go down to the village and get something to eat."

There is a good hotel in the village of Kharvati, where visitors to the neighbouring ruins are entertained. Here the young Englishmen made a hearty supper on rye bread, mutton and tea.

The harvest moon rose early and flooded the country with her beams. The two men sat a long time before the open window of their room, which overlooked the whole village. They had smoked in silence for an hour, when suddenly Lyle pointed down the road, and exclaimed in an excited whisper to the dozing Scott:

"There she is again, as I live! Now look at her and take back your vile insinuation about soap."

A young man and woman were strolling up the street. He was a swarthy, dark-eyed fellow, in the uniform of a Greek soldier. The young girl at his side chanced to raise her face to the searching moonlight, and both the young fellows were struck with her remarkable beauty. Her head was uncovered, and her luxuriant hair was combed low over her brow, and fastened in a simple coil at the back of her shapely head. Her face was purely classic in outline; such a face as the old sculptors loved to cut in marble—full of intellect and of passion.

The couple walked leisurely up the street, evidently uttering, in the melodious Greek tongue, those light nothings that youth and moonlight inspire in all languages. They paused before the door of the inn, and the two strangers heard and understood their parting "Good-night, Stephano," and "Farewell, Hellene."

"There, Scott, what do you think of her now? See what a superb creature you would fain have maligned!" exclaimed Lyle.

"Well, I must say," replied Scott, "either the moonlight played us a trick, or she is a rather pretty girl."

Next morning the two tourists commenced their explorations among the famous ruins. The region is replete with interest, and as their daily intercourse with the people afforded opportunity for the study of the modern Greek—one of the chief objects of their tour—they decided to spend some time in the place.

They did not see Hellene again for some days, but Lyle did not scruple to find out what he could about her from the peasants.

He learnt that she was the grand-daughter of the rich old landlord with whom they lodged. Her parents were dead, and her education had been intrusted to an old tutor, famous for his learning, who died the year before. And soon, they said, she was to marry Stephano, the young soldier, the son of a wealthy neighbour.

One afternoon the two young men were resting in the shadow of the massive walls which form the entrance to those celebrated ruins called the "Tomb of Agamemnon." They were discussing a fragment of pottery which they had just discovered, when Lyle, looking up, saw Hellene coming slowly towards them, picking here and there the late flowers and grasses, evidently quite unconscious of their presence.

The ground over which she was advancing was strewn with blocks of brecca from the ancient walls, which made her progress difficult, and the two friends watched with admiration the ease and grace of her movements, which brought out the fine lines of her agile figure.

At length she raised her head and saw the two men with surprise and embarrassment, for she seemed on the point of flight.

Lyle stepped forward, hat in hand.

"Pardon us," he said, in her own tongue, "for startling you. We ought to have made our presence known sooner. But we have found a curious piece of pottery here, and were trying to determine its origin. Will you look at it?" He held out the fragment in his hand.

Her first fright had vanished, but the girl stood regarding them with a look of indecision, which threatened to end the interview abruptly. But gradually a more confident expression took its place, and she asked:

"Do you know Homer? You speak my tongue well."

"No," replied Lyle, "I can't say we know him very well, but we read him and have learnt to love him. You Greeks have a great advantage over the rest of the world in reading Homer in your own tongue."

"Indeed we have," replied the young girl, her embarrassment rapidly disappearing; "but very few of our countrymen appreciate it. Yet some do, for all Greeks are not like those who go abroad to get rich. There are still many who enjoy the glorious language and traditions of our people. Oh, yes," she continued, daintily taking the fragment from Lyle's outstretched hand, "there are many such specimens here; I have collected a lot of them myself."

A beginning thus made, they passed easily to other topics of common interest. The Englishmen found that this young girl was thoroughly educated in the literature of her country, as well as its history, and loved both fervently.

An hour passed in pleasant converse. At the earnest request of the two young fellows, Hellene finally consented to recite to them some of her favourite passages from the Iliad.

She seated herself on a rock which had fallen from the gigantic ruin behind her, and with the setting sun shining full on her beautiful face, glowing with the immortal words she spoke, she formed a picture against the background of those massive walls which would have won the admiration of a far less appreciative audience than the two listeners. When she had finished, the three walked back to the village together.

For a few days thereafter the Englishmen saw much of Hellene. They examined the fine collection of antiquities which she herself had made, and found her of invaluable assistance in several branches of study in which they were engaged.

But no woman could long fail to see in Lyle's every glance and tone that wondrous something which women long for and yet fear to look upon. A shyness and diffidence, quite contrary to her former frank and easy manner, gradually interposed a barrier to their intercourse, till at last the tourists rarely saw her. Scott grumbled and blamed Lyle for it all.

"It's only another case of your confounded enthusiasm spoiling everything. Here I was nearly through with my to-be celebrated thesis on 'Ancient and Modern Greek,' and you knew that the girl was my main assistance for the work, and yet, like a fool, you must go and fall in love with her, and put her to flight. Why can't you study a thing from a purely scientific standpoint?"

But Lyle's dejection at Hellene's avoidance of him at last became so great that even Scott was moved to pity. The disconsolate lover tried all in vain to have a word with the girl. She deftly thwarted his clumsy masculine plans until he became well nigh desperate.

One evening, when this condition of things had gone on for several weeks, the two men were smoking in the little front room of the inn. The village had been quiet for some time when they heard a light footstep, and caught a glimpse of Hellene as she slipped quickly out of a side door into the moonlit street.

Lyle rose with a look of grim determination on his face and followed her. In a moment he was at her side.

"Hellene," he said, "can't I walk with you? I have wanted to speak with you about something for a long time."

She made him no answer, and they walked on in silence together.

The road lead past the last scattering houses of the village, along the bank of the stream. It was bordered by gnarled old olive trees through whose branches a mosaic of light and shade flittered from the moon to the ground. A sleepy gurgle came now and then from the stream close by.

Lyle stopped, took Hellene's hand in his own, and said:

"Hellene, you must know what I want to tell you. You know that I love you better than life. Don't you see you've been killing me by inches of late? Why do you shun and avoid me so?"

The girl's eyes were downcast for a moment, and he saw her bosom heave in quick sobs. Then she raised her face to his, and there were tears of a great joy in her glorious eyes.

The lovers did not see the crouching figure of a man which glided away from the wall near by off into the placid night.

Scott was hard at work all the next day on his notes. In the early afternoon Lyle went alone to visit a distant part of the ruins, where he was to obtain certain measurements which had been forgotten. Hellene saw him pass from the inn, and an expression of suppressed anxiety took the place of the radiance in her eyes.

Lyle proceeded to a lonely spot some two miles from the village, and was bending over to examine a broken fragment of rock, when he was suddenly seized from behind by a powerful hand, and hurled backwards on the ground with such force as to render him for the moment unconscious. When he opened his eyes, his feet were tied, and his hands securely pinioned behind him. Stephano was seated on a rock near by.

The two men looked at each other for a moment in silence. Stephano was calmly rolling a cigarette in his tawny fingers, and a mocking smile played about his mouth. Lyle could not long control his wrath.

"You sneaking coward!" he cried. "Is this the way a soldier fights?"

Stephano regarded him a moment, then replied, and his voice was low and melodious:

"You English have a saying I believe, that 'all is fair in love and war.' You came and stole the heart of my Hellene, the fairest girl in Greece. Did you think you could carry her off so easily? All Greece, you know, fought ten years for one woman. You should have been wiser!

"Now I'm going to cut the artery in your arm with my dagger point here, and then I shall sit still and see you slowly bleed to death!"

Lyle's anger burnt within him as he realised his own helplessness.

"What! you infernal villain, do you mean to murder me without a chance to strike a blow? If you have a grain of manhood in you, set me free and I will fight you in any way you choose."

"Control yourself, stranger," answered Stephano with maddening deliberation. "There is no need of such excitement. You have brought this on yourself—you risked it and lost. Now take the consequence like a man."

With careful precision Stephano felt for the artery in the bared arm of his victim. A quick stroke and Lyle felt the blood trickling down over his tied hands. Stephano seated himself opposite and spoke as follows:

"Yes, this is an artistic way of dealing with an enemy—not the bungling work of a common assassin, This is the very luxury and refinement of revenge. Ah! My fine Paris, think of the Helen you are losing! Think of those eyes! How they look at one! Think of the kisses of those lips—nectar for the gods!"

At first Lyle's soul was filled with a mighty surge of passion, together with a desperate resolve not to gratify the villain by any sign of fear or suffering. As his strength failed, he gradually became calmer.

He heard distinctly the long drawn shrill of a locust in the grass near by. He imagined curious shapes in the clouds that floated high up in the blue vault. His truant thoughts recalled a particular novel which he had borrowed when a boy and hidden till he had read it through. He even smiled as he thought of the swaggering hero, bound and tortured by the Indians, yet making his escape by miraculous feats of strength and daring. He almost laughed aloud as he made a whimsic comparison of the story with his own condition.

But his strength was going fast. Great blurs of darkness came and went before his eyes. He had almost lost consciousness, when he seemed to see Hellene suddenly appear, with Scott dimly visible in the background.

The girl paused a moment, then with a bound like a tigress she sprang upon Stephano, bore him to the ground, and something in her hand flashed in the sunlight. Then Lyle felt his head raised and a handkerchief bound tightly round his arm.

Several hours later Lyle was roused from his torpor by the fresh sea breeze and the motion of the little steam launch which was rapidly making way from the harbour to the great man-of-war in the bay. He found himself bolstered up on the cushions beneath the stern awnings of the little craft, with Hellene seated at his side.

The light of a deathless love shone in her lustrous eyes. Scott stood by the hatchway, looking back toward the fast retreating shores of Greece. Lyle caught the words he was muttering to himself.

"Yes—had to do it. Girl wouldn't be left behind. Lucky thing I knew the captain—big row if they'd found him before we got off. All on account of the fool's confounded enthusiasm. Never can investigate anything like a genuine scholar; always puts his foot in it somehow."

The Lottery Ticket.

All Naples was amusing itself. The tide of gaiety rising throughout the holiday week had reached high-water mark; and to-night, four hundred thousand Neapolitans and many foreigners, including a little party of five English people, were abroad bent on the pursuit of pleasure.

Professor Roger Poppleton was one of the five; the other four were the Hon. Thomas Whipple, substantial and sedate; Mrs. Whipple, portly and self-possessed; Miss Whipple, newly "out" and impartially enthusiastic; and Miss Alice Feltham, aged twenty-three, with a record of social successes and a secret ambition to study art in the atmosphere of foreign capitals.

Professor Poppleton, usually very dignified—as became his position—seemed to have forgotten everything except that he was abroad on a holiday, that he was a bachelor of barely middle-age, and that an uncommonly attractive and companionable girl was clinging to his left arm.

And why remember anything else? The Neapolitans were having a good time, and seemed disposed to share their fun.

Crowds of laughing, chattering, gaily-dressed people of all classes and conditions surged through the streets, spread out over the open places, and choked the narrow thoroughfares. Everywhere the "bang-bang" of the tricchi tracche punctuated with exclamation points the hum of happy peasants, and above the snap of fireworks and the buzz of voices rose the strident tones of bagpipes, played by perambulating Calabrian musicians before the street shrines of the Madonna.

So contagious was the spirit of merriment that the whole party caught the infection, making it merely a subject of jest when, from time to time, the meeting of two opposing streams of humanity resulted in a temporary deadlock. And it was with much good-humoured comment on demoralised headgear and neckties that in one of these blockades they escaped into a shop whose open doors offered a convenient haven.

As it happened, it was a curio shop, and after a cursory round of the usual photographs, rosaries, and lava ornaments, the sight of certain quaint prints suddenly awakened the professor's scholarly instincts.

"Exquisite!" he murmured, bending over a quaint presentiment of a Pompeian feast. "Absolutely unique! Ah—h, Miss Feltham," impressively, "I know you will appreciate—" and turning, the professor stopped short with that embarrassment that always follows an address to empty space.

For Miss Feltham was at the other end of the shop, listening to the explanation of the sale of State lottery tickets which the shopkeeper was giving to the rest of the party. Her feminine instinct felt the professor's discomfiture and brought her at once to his side.

"You will make me happy by accepting this as a—a little souvenir of our day at Pompeii," said the professor, with that distinguished urbanity that made one forget his forty-five years.

Miss Feltham returned thanks in a charming manner for the holiday gift.

"And I have one for you, too," she said, "only I can't divide it yet, and I can give you only half. No, I won't tell you what it is; wait and see," with a certain tantalising drawing down of her eyelids.

By this time they were in the street again and carried along by the crowd through the Via Nazionale, Naples' most fashionable promenade, towards the Cathedral.

Just how it happened Professor Poppleton never knew, but within a hundred yards of their destination, where the pressure forced them into single file, a counter current in the throng engulfed him as a wave might do, sweeping him away from Miss Feltham and the rest of the party into a black, narrow courtway like a hole in the wall. Before he could catch his breath or look round, another wave seemed to carry him straight through an open doorway into the hall, and thence to a grimy, gaudily decorated little room, where he found himself the centre of a group of chattering, laughing, jubilantly enthusiastic Neapolitans.

"Evidently," the professor thought, "these fun-loving people have singled me out as a target for one of their holiday jokes because I am a foreigner."

It was annoying, but he fell back on his philosophy and determined while in Naples to do as the Neapolitans do. He therefore beamed back at them and awaited developments.

Apparently encouraged by his manner, the jokers—evidently of the peasant class, by their gay jackets and petticoats, and many-coloured silk scarfs, crowded about him, and began jabbering energetically, with frequent gestures towards their guest. Obviously, their remarks concerned his personal appearance, and, taken in connection with the accompanying laughter, they were witty; but as the professor knew no more of the Neapolitan dialect than his hosts did of Greek or Sanscrit, he could only smile in sickly fashion, and wait until their momentary exuberance should subside and he be released.

When the moments grew to ten and twenty with no change in the situation, the professor determined to resort to that dignified diplomacy that had often served to quell excitement among those other irresponsible creatures, the undergraduates, and, still smiling, but with an air of decision, he began to push his way toward the door.

In an instant his way was blocked by a swarthy woman, whose eyes shone like hard lumps of coal beneath her headdress of orange silk, and who shook a key at him with would-be playfulness, to show that the door was locked. There was evidently more of the joke to come, and with a feeling of annoyance he turned toward his captors. At once their faces lighted up and several pointed significantly to his eyes.

Now, one of the professor's eyes was of glass, and replaced an optic that he had sacrificed on the altar of chemistry. Upon that never-shifting artificial eye many would-be college wits had rung the changes, but always at a safe distance. And here were these Neapolitans laughing in his very face at his affliction! If it was merely one of their festival liberties it was an unkind one, and the professor's face flushed.

Meantime the chattering among his captors had reached that high pitch that means intense feeling, and their gestures showed that they were urging some act on one of their number. As if in answer to their motions, he presently pushed his way toward the professor, and holding his left hand within a few inches of that dignitary's face, with the forefinger of his left hand began slowly and meaningly to count the extended fingers.

A light broke upon the professor's mind; undoubtedly this was a hint that he was to buy his way to freedom.

Thrusting his hand into his pocket, he drew out a handful of coins of different denominations, which he placed triumphantly on the table; and then with a confident air, turned to the door, only to meet with another repulse. For now a second man had been pushed forward and repeated the process of pointing to the professor's eye and counting his own fingers.

By this time it had dawned upon their unwilling guest that this was no ordinary joke; indeed, that it was no joke at all. The people had ceased smiling, and were very much in earnest. Several of the men glared at him with faces that bore "villain" written all over them; and even the women looked capable of wielding the stiletto.

In another second mere annoyance gave way to fear, as it flashed upon him that he had been deliberately kidnapped in the open streets of the city by a set of little better than brigands, and that he was completely in their power.

Yet what could they want? More money? To think it was to pull his purse out and lay it on the table.

With gestures of impatience, his offering was pushed back, and the tiring pantomime repeated, but with greater impressiveness.

And suddenly a frightful thought nearly undermined the professor's self-possession. These people wanted a ransom and meant that if they did not get it they would put out his eyes. The idea seemed incredible, but it was backed up by long-forgotten stories that immediately flooded the unfortunate man's mind—stories of captured tourists subjected to horrible tortures at the hands of Italian brigands.

While the professor was by nature a peaceful, law-abiding citizen, who pooh-poohed the idea of carrying arms in a civilised city in the nineteenth century, he was not lacking in courage. In an instant he assumed an attitude calculated to show that he could not be trifled with.

"I have given you all the money that belongs to me, and I have nothing that belongs to you," he thundered, "and I insist that you release me at once! Otherwise I shall report this outrage to the British Consul."

But words and attitude alike seemed lost on this motley assembly, who simply looked at each other curiously, chattered in lower tones, and finally trooped out, the woman in the orange headdress bringing up the rear with the single candle.

Then the door closed, the key clinked unpleasantly in the lock, and for the first time in his life the professor knew the meaning of absolute, unrelieved, impenetrable darkness.

Now, years of university professorship had convinced Roger Poppleton that he knew himself and could possess himself with patience under any circumstances. He was, moreover, a lecturer on the Stoic virtues, and if confronted with such a case as this in the abstract, would have philosophised over the necessity of self-control under all circumstances.

But here was a situation undreamt of in his philosphy. Rudely separated from his friends in one of the happiest moments of his life, ridiculed, insulted, browbeaten by a crowd of vicious foreigners, he had finally been locked up in this black, stuffy hole to await he knew not what torture on the morrow. The very blackness seemed to threaten all manner of horrors; it robbed him of his self-reliance and instilled into his mind a creeping fear that found outlet in the most childish performances.

Angry, panting, he felt his way to the window and pulled frantically at the solid iron bars. He shouted until he was hoarse, he kicked desperately on the unyielding panels, then leant against the door, listening eagerly for some sign from without. But the silence was as oppressive as the blackness.

Groping carefully about the room, he finally discovered the table, and in a new access of rage and fear hurled it vainly against the door, and when the table was splintered, he used the pieces to smash the glass in the window. But without was only more blackness.

Another even more angry and childish assault on door and window, and even the walls, left him so exhausted that he finally sank limply upon a long chest near the door, and tried to compose himself to sleep, in preparation for the next day's ordeal.

He was a long time going to sleep, and it seemed to him that he had hardly closed his eyes when he was awakened by voices, to find himself once more surrounded by his captors.

At his first movement the woman with the orange headdress was at his side, offering him a glass of Chianti, which he indignantly refused. She was still urging the wine and some bread upon him, when there was a stir at the door, a ripple of excited conversation among the group of Italians, and a man, evidently of the same nationality, but a step higher in the social scale, pushed his way through the crowd to the captive, and in halting English wished him good-morning.

In an instant the professor was on the alert.

"So you speak English, do you?" he said sternly. Then as the other gave a broken affirmative, he continued: "Very well; then tell me in English what this outrage means. As for your friends, to them you may say that they have kept me here one night, they may keep me here three hundred and sixty-five nights, but never from a free-born Briton will they extract one halfpenny of ransom money."

The new-comer, with an altogether unaccountable smile, turned to his countrymen, and with many wavings of the arms, and jerks of the head, and countings of the fingers, apparently translated the Professor's message.

And—still more unaccountable—as he progressed, a buzz of delight began to issue from the group round him—a buzz that swelled with every word, bursting into a roar of joy mingled with delighted "Bravos!" as the interpreter concluded.

The next moment the crowd surrounded their prisoner, laughing, beaming, fairly dancing in such exuberance of joy and gratitude that some of the women actually attempted to kiss his hands.

But the professor's wrath had passed the point where it could be conciliated by such demonstrations, or by the new-comer's polite invitation to visit his shop and hear all about the affair over some "rich wine."

"I don't want your wine," he said. "I want you to take me to the British Consul."

And to the consul they went, where the ruffled man of learning—his real eye, usually so pacific and benevolent, glaring almost as fiercely as his glass optic—told his story.

When finally he finished his speech with an impressive demand that the brigands who kidnapped him be properly punished, the consul looked mystified, but conciliatory.

"Of course, you know, sir," he said with due deference, "we don't have brigands in Italy in this century, and you admit that you were not robbed. Besides, as you know, last night was a festive occasion, when practical jokes are in order. Still," he added hastily, as he saw an angry flush creeping over his visitor's face, "this certainly was carrying a practical joke too far, and I'll have the matter investigated, and report to you this afternoon. But who is your companion?"

In a moment the interpreter, so far standing silent in the doorway, was explaining and apologising all in a breath.

"It is ver simple," he said, with a bland smile and a shrug of the shoulders. "I tried to explain. He refuse—he refuse my wine. He asked me to take him to consul. I bring him. So.

"Dis a man have de assistito—what you call the lucky eye," pointing to the professor's artificial optic. "Da people see dat eye, get him in da house so he can say some numbers for buy de lottery ticket. He no understand, and dey keepa him until I came in da morna. No hurt; no do noddings. Just letta him sleep."

While the man spoke the consul had cast a surreptitious glance at the professor's glass eye, and when the interpreter finished his speech, turned to the professor with a smile of comprehension.

"I see now," he said, "and I don't wonder you found the situation incomprehensible. The fact is you've simply been made the victim of a peculiar Neapolitan superstition."

Then he proceeded to explain the difference between the jettatura, or evil eye, and the assistito, or lucky eye, and the firm belief of the peasants, strengthened by long inheritance, that any numbers spoken by the possessor of the latter were lucky numbers, and could be used to never-failing advantage in a lottery drawing.

"Your affliction brings you within the assistito class," he concluded, "and these people wanted you to give them some lucky numbers for the regular monthly drawings of the State lottery. It's as much a part of their life as their meals are. I suppose they couldn't get an interpreter last night, and so kept you until morning. It's too bad you couldn't have understood what they wanted, and given them the numbers before the interpreter came. Then you would have been released. But, of course, in any case," he added, "it's an outrage, and they must apologise."

"But, confound it, I gave them no numbers," said the professor, struggling hard to maintain his dignity.

"You don't suppose I would encourage such a superstition, do you?"

"How is that?" asked the consul, turning to the interpreter. "Didn't the gentleman give you the numbers?"

"Oh, yes, he do!" said the shopkeeper, with a grin of satisfaction. "He say, one night, three hundred and sixty-five. See?" exhibiting a slip of paper on which the number was written; "you play him, you win."

For a moment the professor looked sheepish, as he realised that he had been led into doing exactly what he had been expected to do. Even the consul could not suppress a smile.

"This may seem like a joke to some people," said the professor coldly, "but I want you to understand that I am going to prosecute these kidnappers of innocent Englishmen."

"I wouldn't, professor," said the consul sauvely. "I'm sorry you suffered this indignity, and I'll bring the matter before our ambassador at once. Meantime, you have the satisfaction of knowing that every one of your supposed brigands will have pawned his bedding and jewellery to back your involuntary tip."

"It's an iniquitous practice, and a disgraceful business for a Government to be in," retorted the other severely.

And though the consul protested that the people were bound to gamble, and that while a private concern would undoubtedly swindle them roundly, the Government managed things with strictest honesty, devoting its small percentage of profit to lightening the burden of taxation; the professor went away only slightly mollified, and with his mind still set on reparation.

To discover on reaching his hotel that, according to previous arrangements, the Whipples and Miss Feltham had gone to Paris, leaving word for him to follow when he had done Naples, added new fuel to the flames. And when at the Consulate that afternoon he learnt that he was offered no reparation beyond profuse apologies, his anger was so inflamed that he departed, rumbling out threats of bringing a suit against the Italian Government.

But as it happened, Professor Poppleton did no such thing. He lost some days in Rome, waiting on the Ambassador, without result. He went to Paris, vowing that he would never set foot on Italian soil again. He found that he had missed his friends, who had just left for England. Two days after he himself had returned he received the following letter:

My dear Professor,

My long-cherished visions of art study and life abroad are at last to become realities, and you are the conjuror. This may sound like nonsense, but you'll see that it's anything but nonsense when I recall to you our visit to the curio shop at Naples, when we exchanged gifts, or, rather, one gift, and the promise of another. It was those few minutes in the shop that made me acquainted with the Italian lottery ticket, half of which was to be my present to you.

The next day I put my money on a number recommended by one of the attendants of the hotel; he said it was sure to draw a prize, as it had been given to a friend of his by a man with a lucky eye—whatever that may be.

At any rate, our Consul at Naples has just informed me that I have won the chief prize; and now I'm hoping for an opportunity to redeem my promise in person.

I write to express my hope that you have returned, and will soon give me that opportunity.

Gratefully,

ALICE FELTHAM.

The professor and his wife now make their home in Rome, and one of their favourite trips is to an unenlightened place called Naples.

SAVING THE COMPANY.

MADE any money?

Well, sir, it's a business in which you can either make or lose a lot. I've made two or three small fortunes, and lost about as much as I've made. I've got a moderate provision for the time when I get too old to travel about in this way. I think that's as much as most people can say, and I ought to be satisfied.

But I tell you, time has been when I didn't know where the next meal would come from, and half a dozen players to be provided for as well as myself. I remember one of the worst times I ever had was in the Lake District. I can laugh now, to think of that girl's sharpness, but it was no matter for laughing at that time.

I was starring it through the country with a speciality troupe—musical sketches, ventriloquists, conjurers and minstrels, with a small comedy company thrown in. Mam'selle Susine Allonette was with us (she was Sue Allen off the stage) as leading lady, and she also did some daring tightrope and trapeze business.

She was a sharp little midget, and used to give us the length of her tongue when she got cross.

But she helped me out of a bad fix grandly, the time I speak of, and I felt like giving her a little liberty.

We had been having bad luck. I hadn't been able to pay my company's salaries for three weeks, hadn't a shilling to send home to my wife, and things looked pretty bad I tell you.

When we got to the next town I had hardly money enough to pay the boys who distributed my bills. I had nearly made up my mind to sell my watch (the only thing of value I had left), pay off the men and girls as far as I could and break up the company. We came on at night from the last town, and I resolved to see what the weather was in the morning before I decided what to do.

When I got up I saw the streets were covered with mud and a sharp cold wind was blowing. It would be an awful night, and we should get no house at all. My heart sank like lead, and I wished I hadn't sent the bills out.

We should have to play that night, but it would be the last time.

I thought I would speak to my leading lady, so I went to Sue Allen's room and knocked at the door. She opened the door, and I found her mending the dress she wore in her trapeze performance (we were too poor to have new costumes just then).

"Sue," said I, "I've come to bring bad news."

"Well, what is it?" she said.

"We've got to break up," I said with a sigh.

"Now I don't see that!" returned Sue, fixing her sharp eyes on me. "What is the reason?"

"Why we've made nothing for a month. Sue, I can't pay any of you, and I know you need your money."

"Well this is a fairly large town," said Sue calmly.

"Yes, but look what wretched weather! We shan't have half a house to-night, and I can't even put a puff into the papers to coax people out. It's no use, Sue we shall have to give up!"

"Not if I know it!" says Sue, striking an attitude. "Can't you get up a sensation that will draw?"

"I've tried to think of something, and I can't," I answered. "There isn't a dodge that can be gone through without money, and that I haven't got."

"Well, I've been trying to think, too," says Miss Sue, coolly as before. "And I think we shall have a crowded house to-night."

"Who's going to fill it?" I asked.

"I am," returned Miss Sue demurely.

I gave a low whistle of incredulity.

"Oh, I mean it," said Sue.

There was an air about the girl which struck me.

"Mr. Lane," she said, as I looked silently at her, "I want my salary, and I don't want this company to go down. If you'll let me do as I please, and ask no questions, I'll fill that hall full to-night, and we shall all get our money."

"Then do as you please!" I groaned. "Anything to help me just now!"

"You give me full liberty, and ask no questions?" asked Sue.

"Yes. Go ahead."

"All right. I'm going out for a walk in ten minutes. Make some of the men walk in the direction I do, but order them on no account to come near or interrupt me. Will you?"

"Yes, I will, Sue. Where are you going?"

"Never mind that. Isn't there a wooden railway bridge near here?"

"Yes. We came past it."

"I thought so. Trains run pretty often, don't they?"

I looked at my watch.

"There will be one in half an hour," said I.

"Then I've no time to lose," said Sue. "There, be off, so that I can go."

"Look here, what are you going to do first?" I asked anxiously.

"Nothing that will hurt me, I assure you," answered Sue, laughing. "And you promised to ask no questions. You stay here, and if you hear anything extraordinary, why, then come. Order the men to do as I told you, but they must not try to stop me. I can take care of myself and they shall share the reward."

I began to catch a dim idea of what Sue intended. I said:

"Sue, you shall not run into danger."

"Be off, I tell you," commanded Sue. "I'll be in no danger. Do go, or I shall miss that train."

Well, I submitted to go out, and told two of the men that when Sue walked out they must go too, and keep her in sight, but on no account disturb her. They promised, and I went out as quickly as I could. I knew that whatever Sue meant to do was connected with the railway, and I intended to see what she did, without her knowledge.

I took a look round and posted myself where I could see all that passed, without being seen.

After a while I saw a little figure come tripping down the railway as if for a walk, and I knew it was our Sue even before I could recognise her dress.

She came walking along and deliberately began to cross the bridge by stepping on the ties.

I glanced at my watch—the train was due, and even then I heard the rumble of it. I began to tremble and feel cold, but Sue walked calmly on. If I had not known her skill on the trapeze bar I should have rushed out after her. But if she could trust herself, I could trust her, so I waited.

Presently the engine-driver saw her, and whistled. "Down brakes!"

But Sue walked on as though she heard nothing.

The engine-driver blew a fearful shriek, and did his best to slacken speed, but he couldnot stop in time. And when the train was close to her. She seemed to discover her danger, threw up her arms with a wild cry, and disappeared from view.

By the time the train had passed over the bridge and stopped a crowd had collected. I was there, and my two men, and they were crying like babies as they met me saying:

"Oh, Mr. Lane, Sue's killed! Poor Sue's killed!"

"Perhaps not," I tried to answer, white as death myself.

"Oh, she is! The train went right over her as she fell!" sobbed one of them.

I feared it was indeed true.

But when we rushed down to the bank and along under the bridge, followed by the crowd, there was our plucky little Sue, clinging to the trestle-work under the bridge, a bit pale, but not even a shred of her dress torn.

We got her out quickly, and such a time as there was then, on the bank of that river, I never saw.

As for our company—well, you never saw such antics anywhere.

I didn't know whether to cry over the daring little minx or to scold her roundly.

Of course the story flew like wild-fire, and the streets were crowded with people trying to get a glimpse of the brave little actress before we got back.

In the afternoon we put reserved seats on sale at two or three places where they had not been before, and by dark every seat was sold.

Sue's ruse was a success.

That hall was crowded half an hour before the curtain rose, and when Sue came on the stage the applause was deafening.

After the show was over we had enough to pay our bills, nearly all the back salaries, and make Sue a present of ten pounds for saving us.

Our company did not break up, but was in luck for the rest of the season.

E. B. R.

How Fame Came to Jean Maret.

THERE had not been such a spring morning in Paris for years. Everything was bathed in sunshine, the sky was of the softest blue, the pavements were intensely white, and the river blazed and glistened. The dreary winter had vanished, and it seemed that there could be nothing but happiness for everybody.

Jean Maret and his wife, an elderly couple, sat in a neatly furnished room, looking at each other with vexation plainly visible on their faces. Jean held the morning paper in his left hand, while he thrummed impatiently on the table with his right hand.

"It really is too provoking," he said, the vexed expression deepening on his countenance. "Here have I been striving all my life to do something to make myself famous, but have never succeeded in making my name known beyond the circle of my friends and customers; whereas Charpentier and others, who could never hope to achieve fame by their own efforts, have had it thrust upon them."

"It is very provoking," said Elise softly. "But perhaps it is for the best. We must not forget," she added, "that we have been fortunate in business and have saved money enough to allow us to live comfortably in our old age without work, while others have not been so lucky."

"Yes," returned her husband hesitatingly. He was unwilling to acknowledge anything that made him appear in any other character than that of an ill-used man. "Still, it is annoying to see such an insignificant person as Heron—who never did anything in his life—become the talk of all France, have his name in all the newspapers, receive visits from high officials, and a message from the Preside t himself! Of course, it will be the same for him as it was for Charpentier. Why can't the Anarchists drop a bomb outside our door? They never go off," he added, as his wife shrank back at the thought. "Look at this column; it's all about the bomb found under Heron's window after dusk yesterday."

Jean tossed the paper upon his wife's lap in disgust. Elise put on her glasses and ran through the report. Yes, it was vexing; she knew how much Jean longed for fame, and she was conscious that she, too, would be pleased to receive a message from the President. She half sighed as she laid the sheet on the chair and began to clear away the breakfast things.

Jean Maret seated himself by the open window and smoked his pipe while the sunshine streamed in upon him. He was very discontented—foolish old man! Why had Fate been so unkind to them? he asked himself in bitterness of spirit. Why could he not find a bomb on his doorstep or his window-sill? It was shabby treatment after the exemplary life he had led, and he resented it. Just then he caught the words of some passers-by—they were talking about Heron. Confound Heron! Jean dragged his pipe savagely from his lips and stood up.

"I must go now, Elise," he said to her.

"Must you go out to-day, Jean? I thought that we might have had a run out into the country as it is so fine."

"I promised old Mercier I would help him either to-day or to-morrow, Elise, and I think I had better go to-day. I must have something to occupy my thoughts to-day; I should not enjoy the little trip, I feel so vexed."

She did not reply. He fetched his hat and stick, and a light overcoat to put on in the evening, and kissed her tenderly.

"You will meet me at the café this evening, Elise," he said. "I shall be there at seven o'clock sharp, and we will have our usual little treat."

"I will be there punctually, Jean dear," she returned, looking him up and down with true wifely solicitude and straightening his tie, which was awry. "Take care of yourself. These spring days are very deceiving; the wind is often keen."

He kissed her again, and left the room and the house with a step that was less brisk than usual.

"She is a good wife," murmured Jean Maret as he walked through the streets "and she deserves more than I can give her. I am more annoyed on her account than on my own."

They had spent nearly forty years of their lives together and had been all in all to each other; they had no near relatives and their only child had died in infancy. Elise had cheered and comforted him when in trouble and difficulty, and he had always felt that she had not been sufficiently rewarded; not that she had complained—oh, no; she was too good for that.

Jean Maret left his friend later than he had intended, and he hurried along in order to reach the café in time and not keep Elise waiting. This weekly dinner at the café was one of the very few enjoyments that the old couple indulged in; they had kept it up for years and it was unquestionably a treat for them. For it must be remembered that they were of the old school and had not developed the expensive tastes of the present day.

The cafe was not very far from their home, and in order to reach it Jean had to pass within a few yards of the end of his own street. He was hurrying along in the darkness, close to the houses, so as to avoid the cutting east wind, when his foot kicked against something hard. He stopped abruptly, bent down to look at the object, and almost gasped for breath. It was a bomb!

For a moment he stood bewildered; then a wild idea seized him. Here was his opportunity at last. He had found a bomb! But would he gain a full share of credit if he called the police? Would it not be better to ——? Yes, he would do it!

He stooped down and lifted the engine of destruction. It was a live bomb; there was no doubt about it, for he could hear something inside. He must be quick.

Grasping it firmly, he started off at a run for his own dwelling. He was trembling with excitement, mixed with a certain amount of fear; suppose it were to go off in his hands? He ran at full speed and arrived at his door quite out of breath. He placed it on the step, gave a hasty glance round to see that there was no one about to discover it and so rob him of the coveted fame, then he walked rapidly away.

The bomb would explode and damage his house, but what did that matter? He would be the talk of Paris, of France, of the world! He would receive a message of sympathy from the President—perhaps the Chief of the Republic would call upon him or summon him to the——. He could not finish the line of reflection; his brain was in a whirl, he seemed to be walking on air.

What would Elise say? How pleased she would be that Fame had come at last. They could forgive her tardiness now. Good Elise! She would now have the honour she so well deserved!

He had now reached the door of the restaurant. He fancied he heard a dull noise in the direction of home, and he smiled as he entered the establishment. He went straight towards the corner table at which they always sat. He was late; he had kept her waiting—for she was as punctual as the sun itself, but she would not mind when she——

He stood still suddenly, gazing at the little table. Elise was not there; the chairs were unoccupied. How strange that she should have chosen another table when that one was free.

He gazed about him in search of his faithful partner, but he could not see her. Where had she gone? He began to feel uneasy; for the first time in all these years she was late. He went to a waiter who knew them both very well, and inquired for Elise; but the man had not seen her, and was positive that she had not entered the café that evening.

A horrible thought flashed across his mind. Had she—was she——? Oh, Heaven, not that!

He reeled as though struck; then he rushed out of the place like a madman. Away he went! He dropped his stick, the wind blew his hat off and his coat open; but he heeded not these trifles. With wild, staring eyes he glared down the street as soon as he arrived at the top of it. He saw the gaping crowd, and knew that the fell apparatus had done its work. And Elise?

The crowd fell back and made way for him as he approached and was recognised. Words of commiseration became audible to him, but he pushed his way frantically to the door. The police on guard at first thought of stopping him out of pity, but they stood aside and let him enter without a word. Chaos reigned within, but he went instinctively to the bedroom. There, on the bed that had been hurriedly set straight until the ambulance should come to convey her to the hospital, lay Elise, his dear, faithful wife, terribly mutilated.

With a groan he flung himself by the side of the bed and sobbed convulsively. Oh, wretched man that he was! He had murdered his wife!

Her life was fast ebbing away. She could not see him, but she knew that he was there. With a last effort she slid her hand along and touched him. He heard her murmur some words of consolation in a feeble voice.

"Elise, Elise!" he began. He was about to tell her that he, her husband, had brought this upon her, when he heard her voice, so faint that he could only just catch the words.

"You will be famous now, Jean, and I—am not suffering—much."

Then he heard a sigh, and he knew that she was at rest.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
From Rev. J. H. BURN. NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

NOTES OF INTEREST.

N. S. W.—The temperature of the towns of New South Wales in summer is not appreciably different from that of many parts of Europe. Thus, Sydney corresponds with Toulon, and is four degrees warmer than Paris; and the Manaro Plains correspond with the English Midland Counties. But the warm weather in that colony has more "staying" properties than the specimens we get here.

W. wishes to know if I have any idea of the weight of a whale.——— Nilsson, a Norwegian zoologist, says that the weight of the Greenland whale is 100 tons or 224,000lbs. He further states that it is equal to that of eighty-eight elephants or 440 bears. The Greenland whale may be described as the "heavy weight" of the ocean.

B. V. B. writes to say that he thinks he has discovered the reason for the hitherto unaccountable dislike women have for mice. It appears that for centuries, even until quite recently, it was a common belief that the soul of an unbaptised child assumed the form of a mouse, and came back to haunt the home of its relatives. As such, the little creature inspired no little terror. "Probably," writes B. V. B., "this has become an hereditary instinct, and has outlived the cause."

J. G.—Within the last eleven years, the number of railway stations in Germany has been increased by 2,500. There are now nearly 9,000 railway stations in the Fatherland.

T. K. asks: "Where does nickel come from? The consumption of this metal must be increasing considerably."———Nickel is the principal component of the alloy known as German silver, and is now of greater importance than formerly, owing to its employment in the manufacture of nickel steel. The supply of nickel is obtained from two districts only; one is a small region in New Caledonia, the other is the Sudbury district in Ontario. If any miner were lucky enough to "strike nickel" it would be a real Klondyke for him.

K. L.—The question of the proportion of the wall surface of a room to be occupied by windows has been answered differently by various experts. One authority says one-eighth, another considers the proper proportion to be one-sixth. A high authority stated some years ago that there should be one square foot of glass to every hundred cubic feet that a room contained. Windows ought always to be placed in the longest side of the apartment.

As the result of the plebiscite which was made recently to discover the desirability of republishing "The Final War" by Mr. Louis Tracy, in Short Stories, I have now to inform readers that this stirring serial will start in the Bank Holiday Number of Short Stories. It will be profusely illustrated with stirring sketches, and these will be of additional interest to those who perused the tale while it ran as a serial through the pages of Pearson's Weekly. I should be much obliged to readers if they would incidentally mention these facts to those people who do not regularly see Short Stories, for I am sure that there are many thousands of people who would gladly read "The Final War" if they had the opportunity of knowing that it was to again appear.

Alter.—The name "agate" is derived from the name of the river Achates, in Sicily, near which these stones were found in abundance by the ancients. They are now found in Scotland, Saxony and Hungary, and are brought from China and the East Indies.

Lover asks a question which is calculated to upset the equanimity of many young people: "Has there ever been a law against kissing, and don't you think it would be a good thing if there were such a law now? I know that a man must not kiss a woman against her will, or a woman kiss a man against his will."———I like the last clause immensely. As to the second half of your question, no, I certainly do not think that it would be a good thing to have such a law in this country. Whatever would our country lanes be like if—— But the idea is too terrible for words! It may interest you to know that, in accordance with a law of the New Haven colony in 1660, Jacobeth Murline and Sarah Tuttle were prosecuted for "setting down on a cheste together, his arms about her waiste, and her arme upon his shoulder or about his neck, and continuing in that sinful posture about half-anhour, in which time he kyssed her and she kyssed him, or they kyssed one another, as ye witnesses testified."

Buz asks: "Is the buzzing of winged insects due to the exertion of flying?" —— The humming noise produced by winged insects is not a vocal sound. It is a result of the undulations imparted to the air by the vibrations of their wings, and ceases when the insects alight—which would not be the case if it were due to exertion. Insects move their wings at an almost incredible rate when flying; for instance, it has been scientifically proved that the gnat's wings vibrate 15,000 times a second.

Nut.—Large quantities of hazel nuts come from Turkey. They are shipped from Trebizond and Kerassund; during 1897 the former port shipped 137,000cwt., valued at £92,260, of which this country took £2,250, while the shipment from Kerassund was larger. The fruit gardens in the districts served by those ports are very extensive. A large trade is done in dried apricots.

C. E.—The strange custom of "whistling for bait" prevails among the fisher class of Ceylon. Some of the natives of Colombo are constantly engaged in fishing on the sea-shore, and this is the way they get their bait: A fisherman runs down some yards to meet an advancing wave, agitating the water, and probably the sand also, with the fingers of one hand; he whistles all the time. When the wave retreats he follows it, and almost invariably finds a long worm at the spot where he agitated the water. Of course the natives believe that the whistling acts as a charm, and makes the worm rise to the surface.

L. A.—The English statute acre was fixed at 4,840 square yards by an Act passed in 1824. At one time the acre was an uncertain quantity and varied in different parts of the country. It is probable that the word originally signified cultivated land, and was applied to the extent of land that could be ploughed by one person in one day. If that be so, what are we to conclude from the fact that the Cheshire acre contained 10,240 square yards and the Leicestershire acre only had 2,308?

These Carpets are splendid imitations of real Brussels Carpets, the designs having been carefully copied from the originals, both as regards colourings and patterns, so that when in use it is almost impossible, except by close scrutiny, to detect the difference. All designs are registered, and deservedly considered works of art. We can confidently recommend them for use in the dining and drawing rooms, or any rooms and landings where hard wear is a necessity.

GIVEN AWAY.

As an advertisement for the introduction of these goods to all readers of Short Stories we have decided to give away to every purchaser a very handsomely-woven Hearthrug, 6 feet long and 3 feet wide, to match carpets in colours, etc.

The Story of the Safe.

ONE morning in the spring of 1894, the attention of persons walking along the Sudbury Street was attracted to a huge iron safe that was being put out from the warehouse of a well-known safe company, which for many years had occupied premises in that street.

The pavement was blocked, while a number of men, with great effort, by the aid of blocks, rollers, and the rest of the usual "tackle," moved the huge mass of iron on to a waggon by which it was to be transported to its destination.

Of course, passers-by wondered and queried as to the purpose and possible use of a safe of such unusual form and dimensions. But the curiosity of the questioners remained unsatisfied. No one standing by knew, and the officials and employés were too busy to answer those who ventured to interrupt with their inquiries.

This much, however, was evident—the safe was not new; indeed, the style and appearance of it indicated that it had been built many years ago for some special purpose, in which it had doubtless seen long service. Altogether, the appearance of this strange object so excited my curiosity that, although I was in a hurry to reach my office, I waited until the thing was finally placed on the waggon and the latter moved slowly up the street. Then I entered the shop of the safe company, and being well acquainted with the manager, I asked if he could give me the old safe's history.

He replied that there was a strange story connected with it, known now only to himself. For certain reasons it never had been known except to two people, and they had been secretly bound, one by personal interest, and the other by a solemn vow, never to divulge the secret.

"This promise," he said, "has been faithfully kept; but now, all those in any way connected with or affected by it have passed beyond the dark river. The safe, which has stood here for many years like a spectre, reminding me of the dead past, has now, to my great relief, vanished for ever, and I know no good reason why the strange story should not be told.

"While I may withhold or change names in the recital, that which I am about to relate is true, and is capable, to some extent, of verification."

I decided that my hurry could wait for an hour. I wanted to hear that story. After inviting me to take a seat, the manager continued:

"More than fifty years ago a stranger of good appearance entered the shop of one Kershaw, a manufacturer at the corner of Green Street, inquired for the proprietor, and stated that he wanted constructed a strong, fireproof safe, giving the description and dimensions desired.

"By his conversation he appeared familiar with such work, and stated plainly how he wanted this one made and the kind of lock required. In answer to inquiries, he said that he was about to open a jewellery shop in Hanover Street, that he did not intend to do a retail business, but would have a considerable stock for wholesale trade. He added, also, that as he would be absent from his shop travelling on business from time to time, he desired a safe of large dimensions, where his stock could safely be stored during his absence, as well as at night.

"He required no shelves in the safe, and wanted it of unusual depth that he might put directly into it the cases and trunks in which he would keep or carry his stock.

"Being convinced of the stranger's respectability by a large deposit, and by the promise of full payment on completion and delivery, Mr. Kershaw accepted his order, and in due time the safe was completed and delivered.

"Soon after, a sign was put up on the shop: 'J. Williamson, Wholesale Dealer in Watches and Jewellery.' No great display was made in the window. Goods were received and shipped by the rear entrance opening on a narrow court. Apparently but little business was done at the shop, and frequently Mr. Williamson was absent visiting his customers.

"He contracted no indebtedness, paying cash for everything. He expressed a lack of confidence in banks and bankers, saying that he had once lost a large sum by the failure of a bank in which he had had an account, and for the future should be his own banker.

"Shortly after he began business, he took up his residence in a northern suburb, and regularly attended one of the churches in the neighbourhood. No subscription paper or contribution box ever passed him without a fairly liberal donation.

"In disposition he was quiet and retiring, and rarely spoke except in response to some inquiry. His earlier life he never referred to except in reply to one or two persons who ventured the question, when he briefly stated that he was the second son of a well-to-do country gentleman, that as that life was distasteful to him, he had gone to London and begun a commercial career.

"Within a year after he had ordered the safe, Mr. Williamson sought the hand of the eldest daughter of a respectable merchant, who attended the same place of worship. Having satisfied her parents as to his character and so forth, he was accepted, and with little delay married. By his quiet, correct life, liberality, and honest dealing, he secured the confidence and respect of all who knew him.

"About this time a strange epidemic of crime swept over this town. The houses of the wealthy were entered and robbed of their valuable contents. Packages of money were boldly seized within the very inclosures of the bank, the thief escaping through some passage, or by slipping into a house and fastening the door behind him; the satchels of bank messengers, filled with valuable contents, were suddenly snatched and the robber eluded pursuit. At night persons were garroted and robbed in the public thoroughfares.

"The police force was small, and, although they exercised unusual diligence, every few days some new and startling crime, committed with wonderful skill and boldness, was announced. It was thought that a gang of experienced criminals had made a descent upon the town so long exempt from crime, and every stranger was under suspicion, and carefully watched.

"One night, not long after his marriage, Mr. Williamson was found on the bridge in a dazed, exhausted condition, and assisted to his home. When sufficiently recovered, he stated that while crossing the bridge he was suddenly seized from behind, his throat grasped so that he could not cry out, and his pocketbook, containing a large sum of money, taken from him. He struggled to free himself from his unknown assailant until he gasped for breath, and fell exhausted, unconscious.

"On the following day Mr. Williamson offered a liberal reward for the arrest of the highway robber, but as he had not seen him he could give no clue to aid in the detention of the criminal. Some of the persons robbed, however, who had caught a glimpse of the thief, described a dark person with heavy black hair, wearing blue spectacles; and as it was believed that he and the assailant of Williamson were one, search was made for a person answering this description.

"One evening the whole town was startled by the news of a crime just committed, bolder than any that had preceded it. The premises of Davis and Palmer, jewellers, in Market Street, had been entered between the hours of seven and eight p.m., and the most valuable part of their stock taken, the trays containing many valuable watches, diamonds, and jewellery, having all been emptied.

"As was customary, the shop was closed at seven o'clock, and a night watchman came on duty within an hour after. On this evening when the watchman entered he found the cases stripped of their valuable contents, and immediately gave the alarm. The police were sent for, and investigation began.

"It was soon discovered that persons near the shop had seen a trap drive up, a man alight, unlock and enter the shop. Not long afterwards he came out bringing two heavily-laden bags, one after the other, which he placed in the trap and drove away.

"At the time no suspicion had been excited, as there was nothing peculiar about his manner of entering or leaving the premises. From his course of action the thief was evidently well acquainted with the fact that there was a brief period between the closing of the shop and the arrival of the watchman; and having at some time, doubtless, obtained an impress of the key, and made a duplicate, the task of entering and robbing the premises at a time when it was least expected, was an easy one.

"In those days the detective force was not what it is now, but we had an experienced man in the town, and when it was known that a large reward had been offered for the discovery and return of the goods, irrespective of the arrest and conviction of the criminal, Capper devoted himself at once to that object.

"As a first step he visited every stable in the town, but with no great result. The owner of the trap was found, but could give no information except that it had been hired in the afternoon by a dark-haired man wearing coloured glasses, and that late in the evening the cart and horse were found without any driver in Northgate Street.

"As weeks passed and the mystery seemed no nearer a solution, the strange robbery became the universal topic of conversation. Every clue and suspicion was followed up. Strangers were arrested and obliged to prove their innocence. Everybody became a detective.

"Some weeks after the robbery a stranger came to the parcel office with a trunk which he wished to send to London. Something in the manner of the man, an unnatural, half-disguised appearance, excited the suspicion of the alert, sharp-eyed clerk, who had been cautioned by Capper, and while he proceeded to make out the receipt he secretly sent a messenger to the officer.

"Upon his arrival, Capper instantly began to question the stranger, demanding to know the contents of the trunk. His inquiries were frankly answered with proper explanation, and the key produced that the officer might verify the same by examination. The innocent frankness of the stranger disarmed Capper, and, half apologising for not accepting his statements as sufficient, he stooped to unlock the trunk, when suddenly the stranger leapt by him and out through the door, barring it after him by thrusting a stout cane through the iron handle.

"Throwing himself against the door, the officer soon broke the improvised bolt and rushed off in pursuit, following the fugitive down through street after street into a narrow court, where the man had disappeared. But though there was no outlet other than that by which he had entered, a thorough search of this place a few moments after failed to discover the fugitive, or the way of his escape.

"After the houses in the court were searched without discovering any trace of the probable thief, the proprietors of the shops facing Hanover Street on each side and having rear entrances in this court were sent for. Among these was Mr. Williamson, but as it was ascertained at his residence that he was absent, travelling, his premises were forcibly opened. Here, however, as in the others, no person or sign of one was found.

"The burglar, for such an examination of the trunk proved to be, was never captured, nor was trace of him discovered, although diligent search of that neighbourhood was made by the whole police force.

"Not long after the town was again startled, this time by the announcement in the morning papers of the mysterious disappearance and probable murder of Mr. Williamson. He was known to carry large sums of money upon his person, and as there was no good explanation of his absence, it was thought most probable that he had been robbed and murdered. In fact, there were some who reported hearing at night cries for help in the vicinity of his shop, and a hat which had been found one morning in the street near his premises proved to be one worn by him on the morning when he last left his home.

"Information was sought by advertisement in the newspapers, with promise of liberal reward, but all investigation proved unavailing.

"After some weeks of inquiry and search, the general suspicion that he had been murdered and his body done away with, became a settled conviction; but his faithful, trusting wife refused to believe him dead, and her father finally proceeded to London, to see what information, if any, could be gained from those with whom his son-in-law had had dealings in the metropolis.

"What he ascertained there I do not know, but immediately on his return he came to my employer for a workman to go to the shop and open in his presence the safe containing the stock stored therein.

"After some drilling the bolt was sprung and the door swung open, disclosing a sight at which I started back affrighted and amazed, and which so horrified the troubled and anxious father that he fell like a dead man on the floor.

"There, within the safe, lay the dead body of Mr. Williamson, the trusted and respected jewellery merchant.

"On recovering consciousness the father, heart-broken, implored me, for his sake and the fair name of his daughter, never to make known the sight then revealed, and to assist him in concealing all evidence which would tend to disclose it. To both these requests I at once acceded, and that night I helped him to carry out the body privately for burial—no matter where.

"An examination of the safe disclosed a hardly discernible aperture drilled through the back near the top, from which, on the inside, hung a flexible tube by which respiration was made possible for a person inclosed, and through which a noise from without could reach the inmate.

"On the inside of the door a hole had been cut so that the key could be inserted and the bolt thrown back. The handle of this key had broken off, leaving the key in the lock. There were indications that food and water had been stored in the safe, but none remained; even the shoes bore marks of the teeth, as if gnawed for sustenance.

"A black wig and a pair of blue spectacles lay on the floor of the safe. Seeing all this, we soon conjectured for what purpose this safe was made and used—a temporary place of quick retreat.

"We wondered if the key was broken by accident in the haste to elude that last pursuit, or in attempting to re-open the door. We thought we knew now, though each was silent, the mystery of the many recent crimes; but one thing was certain, they ceased, and the author of them was never found or arrested."

A Splendid Make-Up.

SIN LOO paused again beneath a lamp-post and again examined the slip of paper held in his hand. On it was written an address.

To that address Sin Loo had been travelling for over an hour; for the contents of the twin baskets hanging from the ends of the pole across his shoulders were being impatiently awaited by the person who had penned the directions. A dozen times had Loo held the paper forth to passers-by and softly asked: "Wha-lat?" And not once had assistance been denied. Some, captivated by Loo's artless and helpless countenance, had even walked to the nearest corner and from there indicated the right direction.

Already, had he but known it, Loo had passed the house that he was seeking a half dozen times, for during the last half-hour he had been breathlessly hurrying round the same circle of streets. And now he studied the paper again with perplexed eyes.

But to him it was only a series of faint black scratches, sadly deficient in symmetry and sense, when judged by his idea of what correct writing should be.

Sin Loo sighed, shook his head despondently, and clutching the bit of paper tightly, looked about him in bewilderment and alarm.

It was very dark; the streets were practically deserted, and the scurrying cabs and carriages with the blazing lights suggested to Sin Loo the passing of so many fiery-orbed dragons of the kind impressed upon his memory by his grandmother's fairy tales, told years before under the twilight of Canton skies. Ah! would that he had never left that city to seek fortune in Australia!

Presently, as he hurried on, his eye caught sight of a figure in the distance, and in a moment he was fleeing along the pavement as though the evil one himself were upon his heels. On he fled, the basket swaying and bobbing about him as though suddenly invested with life. Then he paused and glanced fearfully back, and a long-drawn sigh of relief escaped him; the Man in Authority—the demon, as Loo regarded him—was no longer in sight.

Sin Loo, during his brief residence amongst them, had learnt to look upon policemen as the incarnation of all evil, and to fly from them as he would from the purple ogres of his grandmother's tales.

Out of all reckoning now, Sin Loo held forth his precious slip of paper and looked about for assistance. But no one was to be seen until, presently, his troubled gaze, searching the dim street, encountered a wonderful sight. At a little distance a canopy of striped cloth reached from a residence into the street, and from under it shone a radiant blaze of light. Sin Loo was but eighteen, and curiosity seized upon him. Cautiously he moved forward. A throng of people barred the way, and Sin Loo crept into the shadow of the group.

From there he could see a strip of beautiful crimson carpet running from the street across the pavement, up a flight of high, broad steps, and through a portal luminous with golden light, whence issued the subdued strains of what seemed celestial music. Surely, thought Sin Loo, here lived the blessed gods!

Wondering curiosity got the upper hand of fear, and Sin Loo began to worm his way through the crowd. But the swinging baskets seriously retarded progress, until the onlookers, becoming aware of his presence, opened up a path for him with cries of, "Here's another of 'em! Make way there for Li Hung Chang!" and Sin Loo, smiling timidly upon all, advanced until the beautiful crimson carpet lay at his feet.

He stretched out one little slipper until it rested caressingly upon the edge of the carpet, and then heaved a sigh of ecstasy. The carpet was for all the world like the soft down on the breasts of the white ducks that his grandfather raised on the Choo-Kiang.

Suddenly Loo darted back with a cry of absolute terror. There was a great noise, the people behind pressed forward, a carriage with the fiercest of eyes stopped, with a clanking of chains, before the awning; two resplendent beings in red and blue livery darted forward and swung open the door; and an angel—two angels—in white, stepped out. But it was not the carriage that had frightened Sin Loo. Nay; but there, not two steps away, terrible, demoniac, stood a huge Man in Authority, waving a huge stick toward Sin Loo.

With a yell of agony, Sin Loo strove to retreat. But no, the crowd held him. There was but one way open. His profane feet trod the carpet of the gods, and with three bounds he stood in the portal of Paradise.

Struck with the danger of his predicament, Sin Loo glanced fearfully back, only to meet the eyes of the Demon who barred the way. He was laughing loudly with the rest of the throng, but to Sin Loo he appeared to be gnashing his teeth with disappointment over the escape of his prey. To remain there was to be lost. What should he do?

Sin Loo gazed about him, and for a moment was lost in awe and admiration of his surroundings. Near at hand, lined by flowering shrubs and waving palms, rose a great staircase, winding slowly upward, to be lost in another flood of light from above. About him were blazing lights, banks of brilliant blossoms, graceful festoons; in his nostrils what seemed the scent of a thousand gardens, in his ears such music as they had never heard. A burst of laughter aroused him.

Down the great staircase, holding their brilliant draperies about them, came a group of goddesses. In desperation Sin Loo darted to a great curtain, whose folds shed a dozen hues under the light. Behind this he would hide. He lifted a corner, when, as though by magic means, the curtain was whisked from his grasp, and before him, dazzling with jewels and radiant apparel, with hand outstretched, stood—ah, yes, it could only be the queen of the goddesses, waiting to rebuke his presumption!

With quaking heart, Sin Loo turned to flee. But lo! the entrance was gone from sight. Behind him stood sentinel two huge ogres in shining armour, and clasping great glittering blades, the sight of which sent thrills of terror coursing through the marrow of Loo's trembling bones. Before him stood, sat, or walked a multitude of gods.

He closed his eyes and waited annihilation. Presently he opened them again and found himself still alive. Then he sought to escape in the throng, flattening himself and his awkward burdens against the nearest flower-screened wall, and hiding behind the great marble pillars and tall palms. But he could not avoid notice; murmured comment greeted his stealthy progress, and the eyes of gods and goddesses followed him.

Then the music began again, and in a moment the great gold and white hall was a wonderful kaleidoscope. for the inhabitants of Paradise, in their gorgeous dresses, with their flashing gems and waving plumes, were dancing together. Sin Loo, forgetting his terror for the moment, peeped from behind a tall and feathery fern, and thought that never had his most magnificent dreams pictured Paradise one thousandth part as wonderful as it was.

Before him two gods, one in a mass of pale blue silk and creamy lace, the other clad in russet leather, slashed here and there to show a lining of crimson satin, were talking together. Sin Loo listened with might and main, but the words were strange, and not to be understood.

"Magnificent sight, isn't it?" the one in blue was saying in languid tones. "Ought to be, though, since they've been over six months in preparing for it. I hear there were over a thousand invitations sent out."

"Yes," replied the other. "By-the-way, have you seen Jack Vernon and his wife?"

"Can't say; probably wouldn't have known them if I had."

"Yes you would, though. Mrs. Jack told me the other day that she had secured the finest rig out of them all. Seems that she went to a Chinese costumier or whatever you call him—dressmaker, tailor, if you like—and ordered costumes for herself and Jack. She's to be a Celestial princess or something, and Jack's to be an emperor, I believe. Can't understand what's keeping them."

"I saw a Chinaman awhile ago carrying a couple of baskets slung over his arm. Fine get-up, but didn't look much like an emperor."

"Yes, saw him myself. Everybody's speaking of him. Never saw a finer Chinaman make-up in my life. Acts his part, too. I say, if you see Jack and his wife, let me know."

Then the pair hurried away, and Sin Loo now noticed that both music and dancing had ceased, and that all Paradise was flocking to the far end of the hall. To be alone was more terrifying than to be amidst the crowd. In Loo's case safety lay in numbers, and with baskets flopping to and fro, he scuttled down the room, a ludicrous little figure, slipping and sliding on the waxed surface of the ball-room floor like a duck on ice.

The queen of the goddesses, assisted by lesser deities, was going and coming amongst the crowd, forming it couple by couple into line of march. Here Richelieu was giggling with a nineteenth-century milkmaid; there one of his Swiss guards was whispering soft nothings into the pink ear of a Highland lass; yonder, a black-garbed and black-masked executioner leant on his axe and joked with a pretty Parisian cyclienne. Soldiers and peasants, kings and queens, lords and ladies, favourites of mythology, and celebrities of nursery rhyme, were all here, waiting for the orchestra, hidden in the balcony above, to strike up the martial air. Already the hostess had raised her fan, when suddenly, her gaze sweeping about the hall, caught sight of a skulking blue-clad figure. She advanced and seized Sin Loo by the sleeve.

"This way, please!" And Loo, his knees knocking together with fright, was led to the rear of the line.

"You will take me in, please," said the hostess. Again she lifted her fan, and again lowered it without making the expected signal, for across the floor from the entrance hurried a lady in simple evening costume, while at the alcoved doorway, his entrance impeded for a moment by the two knights-at-arms, who raised gleaming blades to bar his progress, a man in conventional broadcloth and linen paused with a look of serio-comic helplessness.

"It was our costumes!" exclaimed the lady breathlessly, between her hostess' expressions of pleasure and playful reprimand. "They never came, and we couldn't miss this, so here we are at the eleventh hour, plain nobodies."

"What was the trouble?"

"I don't know. I only know they were incomparable. I ordered them specially, and they were to be delivered this evening. Ko Ha, the Chinese——"

"Gracious, what's that?"

Sin Loo, grovelling on his knees, was begging for mercy in high-pitched, terror-filled vowels. He had heard his master's name, and knew that the time of reckoning had come at last. Mrs. Jack sprang forward.

"I really believe it is Ko Ha's man! Where——"

But there was no need to ask. Sin Loo's baskets lay beside him, and from one of them flowed a dazzling stream of gold-embroidered silks and satins.

"My costume!" cried Mrs. Jack.

"And mine!" cried her husband, as, laughing, he drew the treasures from the other basket.

"You—you wretch," cried Mrs. Jack. "Where have you been? How came you here? Why——"

But Sin Loo was deaf to all questioning. In his shrill treble he was gabbling monotonously all the prayers ever taught him by his beloved grandmother.

Then the orchestra played an extra waltz, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Vernon hurried away to don their costumes, and Sin Loo, still clutching the slip of paper tightly in his hand, was conducted through the great portal, down the beautiful crimson carpet, and so forth from the presence of the outraged gods.

The throng on the pavement was gone. Only the Demon remained. With a startled cry Sin Loo looked once, and then fled into darkness. And, strange to tell, the Demon only grinned!

That Fatal Erasure

Miss Amelia Lunt was the only child of two good people who had not married until they reached the years which find most wedded pairs with their children well grown up about them. They had been happy, however, and when they died, left their daughter a little income which, by close pinching, she could manage to live upon.

Amelia was not a pretty girl, but thousands of plainer girls had married and settled, while she remained a spinster. Perhaps the fact that she was by no means a good-natured person had something to do with it.

In her youth she had scornfully rejected advances of well-disposed young men who belonged to the mechanic classes, and had declared that she would only give her hand and heart to a merchant, a physician, or a clergyman. Eligible merchants were rare. The doctors were both married. The clergymen had large families.

Amelia at last awoke to the knowledge that she was getting on in life; and that if she was not careful, people would find it out.

But for that dreadful family Bible in which the record of her birth was written, she would have felt safe in slicing off ten years of her life—a proceeding which she fancied would increase her value in the eyes of a certain Mr. Dumsday, who had recently paid her a few solemn calls. He was really an old man himself, but the older the man, the younger, generally, is his choice of a wife.

Poor Amelia! She eyed the well-thumbed Bible (which her companion and assistant, Cousin Betsy Baker, always would have upon a stand in the parlour) with absolute horror.

She sat over the fire late one night, thinking over the matter.

Who knew her exact age? Cousin Betsy. But Cousin Betsy would not wish to quarrel with her, and was too old a woman to think her anything but young. The clergyman who baptised her, and the family doctor were dead. The dear old gentleman who had lodged with them from her babyhood went to Australia years before, and was probably dead also. Good Mr. Locke! What a nice gentleman he was! But she should never hear of him again. Yes, it was safe. She would do it.

It was night—half-past twelve at least. Amelia arose. She stood before the fire with her back to it, and took the candlestick in her hand.

Anyone who had observed her would certainly have believed that she was going straight to Cousin Betsy's room to end that lady's life by a jab of the sharp little knife blade, but she paused at the candlestick, knelt down, opened the family Bible at the flyleaf, and slowly, cautiously, began to scrape, scrape, scrape at the last two figures of the record of her birth.

Then she crossed the room, took a pen and inkstand, wrote two other figures in the place of those she had erased, blew upon the leaf until it was dry, carefully touched up the rest of the record to match in brightness, and drew back to read the amended lines, which now plainly stated to all beholders that she had entered this world thirty years before instead of forty.

"Amelia!"

It seemed to come from above. She looked up, expecting to see something dreadful. It was repeated.

"Amelia, aren't you coming to bed?"

It was only Cousin Betsy speaking from the upper landing.

All in a cold perspiration, Amelia managed to reply that she would come in a moment, and then, closing the Bible and putting away the writing materials, she crept upstairs, a world of horrible unseen things close after her.

Mr. Dumsday regularly "came a-courting" now. And he was a rich widower, whose married daughter professed herself anxious that he should have someone to take care of him. Amelia had quite made up her mind that lavender should be the colour of her wedding dress.

And the two were sitting together one evening talking confidentially about rheumatism and its best liniment, when the bell rang and a tall, lean gentleman, in a suit of black, was ushered into the parlour.

"Miss Amelia Lunt, I believe," he said.

"Yes, sir," said Amelia.

The gentleman bowed, handed her a card with "C. Dodridge, Solicitor," upon it, and took the seat she offered. Mr. Dumsday didn't offer to retire, and the solicitor began.

"I understand that your respected parents are no more, madam," said the solicitor. "They would remember better than you do, probably, a period of thirty years ago, when one Mr. Locke lodged with them."

"Yes, sir," said Amelia, growing red in the face. "I've heard them speak of him."

"Ah," said the gentleman, "he was a dear friend as well as a client of mine. He died about two months ago in Sydney. He was wealthy at the time of his death, and he never forgot the extreme kindness of the friends of thirty years ago, who knew him in his days of comparative poverty. Yes, they are gone also; but the little girl who waited on him so lovingly, still lives. She was eleven years old at that time. I suppose I address her?"

"No, sir," said Miss Lunt, redder than ever, as Mr. Dumsday turned an attentive ear to this dreadful statement—and feeling that one lie begot many, and that having fibbed in the family Bible, she must stick to it or die—"No, sir. I was not born at that date."

"I have my old friend's record," said Mr. Dodridge—"the date of his arrival here—you were one month old then—and the date of his departure. Plainly you were eleven years of age. You attached yourself fondly to my old friend's heart, madam."

"No, I didn't," said Amelia tartly. "I ought to know. I never saw him. I was born just after he left, I've been told. There's the Bible on the table; look at the date."

She opened the volume at the fatal flyleaf; the lawyer perused it slowly.

"I see, I see," he said. "Well, well; and who was this little girl?"

Agony of agonies! Here was another lie needed. Mr. Dumsday's eyes opened widely. He listened more intently. He looked at the lawyer, he looked at the lady. She must fib again, and blackly this time.

"That was a little adopted child who died," said Amelia faintly. "They didn't think they should have any family of their own."

"I see," said the lawyer rising, "I see. My friend hoped she had grown to be a woman. Good-day."

"And I can't see why you should come here to add to a lady's age," said Miss Lunt. "I'm sure it's not polite."

"Madam," said Mr. Dodridge, hat in hand, "I have an excuse; Mr. Locke, good old man, left all his fortune to that little girl. Had she lived she would be an immense heiress. I paved the way—paved the way, that's all."

He departed; Miss Lunt bowed him out. After all, what did it matter? Fortune, in the person of Mr. Dumsday, was at her feet, and she had saved ten years of her age in his eyes.

But, alas! what ailed Mr. Dumsday? He had risen; his face looked pale, his countenance anxious. He shook his head slowly, went to the candlestick, looked at the fly-leaf of the family Bible, and spoke as follows:

"Amelia, from what I see you're just about thirty years of age, aren't you?"

"Yes," said Amelia wonderingly.

"This is a trial to me, Amelia," said Mr. Dumsday. "I know I've been to blame if it come to nothing, but we must part."

"Did you think I was younger?" said Amelia. "Is that it?"

"No, Amelia," said Mr. Dumsday; "but I took a little oath to my daughter never to marry a second wife under forty. People generally think you are about that age, so I picked you out. Good-bye, Amelia. I hope I haven't spoilt your prospects. Some younger man will——"

"Oh!" cried Amelia. "Oh, come back! I'll tell the truth. I am forty!"

"Records can't lie. I saw it in the Bible," said Mr. Dumsday. "Farewell. It's a disappointment, but I must bear it."

The Old Windmill.

Maitre Cormille was an old miller. He had worked his windmill for sixty years, and it was like a piece of himself.

You can imagine what the effect on him was when the steam flour-mills were introduced. For a week he ran about the village, trying to stir up the people and warning them against the folks who were coming to poison Provence with their new and dangerous devices.

"Don't have anything to do with it," he cried. "To use steam for making bread is an invention of the Evil One. I work with the Mistral and the Tramontana winds, which are the breath of the good God."

He was really quite eloquent on the subject, but the people paid no attention whatever, and went on getting their flour at the new mills.

Then the old fellow shut himself up in his mill and lived all alone like a wild animal. He would not even keep with him his grandchild Vivette, a girl of fifteen, who, since the death of her parents, had only her grandfather to look to.

The poor little thing had to go into service at the farms; and yet he seemed fond of her, and would walk a dozen miles to one of the farms where she was working. And when he got there he would sit looking at her for a long time, often with the tears in his eyes.

In the neighbourhood people thought that he had sent her away because he grudged the cost of keeping her, and that it did him no credit to let the poor child go about from one farm to another exposed to the bullying of the masters and all the dangers that beset a girl in her unprotected state.

It was also thought very queer that a respectable man like Maitre Cormille should go about such an object. He looked such a scarecrow, almost in rags as he was, with his battered old hat, that we felt quite ashamed to have him sit with us at church, and I supposed he must have guessed it, for after a bit he took to sitting in the free seats.

There was a mystery in his life. For a long time no one in the village had taken any corn to him to grind, and yet his mill was always going, and in the evening we used to meet the old man coming home, driving before him a donkey laden with great sacks of flour.

"Good evening, Maitre Cormille!" we would say. "How's business with you? I see your mill is always going."

"Yes, children, it is going still," he would answer cheerfully. "Thank God, we don't want for work!"

Then if you asked him where on earth the work came from, he would purse up his lips, and answer:

"Oh, I work for exportation!"

And there was no more to be got out of him.

As to putting one's foot inside his mill, no one ever dreamt of doing that. The door was always shut when one passed, and the great sails always turning, and a wretched-looking, uncanny black cat taking the air on the wall, and looking spitefully at you.

Well, the secret was discovered at last, and this was how it happened.

I had noticed for some time that little Vivette and my eldest boy were getting fond of one another; and I had nothing against it, because after all the name of Cormille had always been held in respect among us, and then it would be rather nice to have a bright little thing like that about the house. Only I thought the thing ought to be done in proper form, so I went up to the mill one day to talk it over with the grandfather.

Ah, the old sorcerer! You should have seen how he received me. I could not get him to open the door. I said my say as well as I could through the keyhole, and all the while there was his miserable skeleton of a black cat yelling like a demon just over my head.

The old man never gave me a chance to explain myself. He called out that I had better take myself off, and that if I were in a hurry to have my boy married I could get hold of a girl at the steam mills.

You can imagine how angry I was, but I thought I had better leave the old fellow to himself, and so I went back and told the poor children the result of my visit.

They could hardly believe it, and asked me as a favour to let them go and see what they could do. I had not the courage to refuse them, and off the couple went.

When they arrived, Maître Cormille had just gone out. The door was double-locked, but the old fellow before starting had left his ladder outside, and suddenly it occurred to them that they would get in at the window, which they did.

Strange to say, the large room was empty, not a sack of grain to be seen, nor a speck of flour on the floor or the cobweb-covered walls. Upstairs in the old man's room everything had the same look of poverty and desolation. A wretched bed, a few rags lying about, a piece of bread on the stairs, and then in the corner a sack or two from which some chalk and plaster had dropped.

This was his secret. It was this that he brought home in the evening to save the honour of the mill and to make believe that it still had work. Poor old mill! Poor Cormille? A long while ago the steam mills had taken away his last customer. The sails still went round, but there was nothing to grind.

The two poor young things came back crying, and told me what they had seen. It wrung my heart to hear them. Without losing a moment, I went to the neighbours, and told them the whole tale in half-a-dozen words.

We agreed at once to carry to the mill all the grain we could scrape together. No sooner said than done. All the village turned out, and we set off in procession with a tribe of donkeys laden with flour—real flour this time!

As we drew near we saw the door wide open, and Maître Cormille sitting before it on a sack of plaster, weeping with his face in his hands. He had just learned that his secret had been discovered.

"Now I have only to die; the mill is dishonoured!"

He was sobbing fit to break your heart, and calling the mill by all sorts of pet names, speaking of it as if it were a living thing.

The donkeys pulled up on the green before the mill, and we all called out:

"Hallo, miller! Hallo, Maître Cormille!"

Maître Cormille started, and well he might. He saw the sacks with the beautiful wheat burst out of them. He took some in his hand, and said, laughing and crying at the same time:

"It is wheat! Good heavens! it is really wheat! Let me look at it." Then turning to us: "I knew you would come back to me," he said; "all these steam mills are frauds."

We wanted to carry him through the village in triumph; but he would not have it.

"No, no, children. I must go and give my mill something to eat; it is long enough, poor thing, since she has had anything between her teeth."

It was really touching to see the poor old fellow running here and there, emptying the sacks, working the mill, while the corn was being crushed between the grindstones and the fine flour dust flew up to the ceiling.

Let me do myself and my friends the justice to say that from that time we never let the old man lack work. But when he died the sails of our last windmill ceased to turn, for no one took the place. Ah, well, they have had their day, like the periwigs and stage-coaches; it is the way of the world.

Four Letters that Were Never Written.

"GEORGE FERGUSON, what does this mean?"

The voice was that of Mrs. Ferguson—shrill, piercing and ominous.

"What does what mean?" asked George.

"This letter!"

She held it up.

"Laura, have you been——"

"No, I haven't been searching your pockets. You know I haven't. I was moving your coat from this chair, and a letter fell out. This is the letter. It is directed to you, and it's in a woman's hand. You haven't told me of any correspondence you are carrying on with——"

"Open it and read it, Laura," interrupted Mr. Ferguson. "If there was any letter in my pocket I didn't know it. Go ahead and read it. Perhaps it is a millinery bill."

Scorning to reply to this, Mrs. Ferguson took out the letter and ran her eye over it.

"Oh, you didn't know this was in your pocket!" she piped. "You didn't know it! Perhaps it's a millinery bill, is it? Listen! 'My dearest George'—so you're somebody else's dearest George, are you?—'My dearest George: When are you coming to see me again? I am very lonely'—she is very lonely, is she? Oh, you two-faced hypocrite!—'If you can't come, George, dearest, do write!'—she wants you to write if you can't come, does she?—'You can't think, dearest George, how I miss——'"

"What nonsense are you reading, Laura?" demanded George, beginning to be roused. "Do you mean to say——"

"I mean to say I am reading this letter you told me to read, Mr. Ferguson. I am reading this letter I found in your—that dropped out of your pocket. You don't know anything about it, don't you? 'You can't think, dearest George—'"

"Laura, are you silly enough to think that's genuine——"

Digitized by Google

"I am a silly, am I, Mr. Ferguson? Well, I'll just show you——"

"Let me see the letter."

"Let you see it? What do you want to see it for? Oh, no, Mr. Ferguson! I am going to keep it and show it to my mother!"

"Well, hold it so that I can look at it. I promise you solemnly I will not attempt to take it away from you."

"I'll see that you don't. Here it is. Now look at it. Stay where you are, George Ferguson! Don't you come a step nearer!"

"How can I see it ten feet away? Lay it down and then come and tie my hands behind me. If you are afraid I'll——"

"Oh, yes! Lay it down and you'll snatch it! I see through you! What's the use of pretending you never saw this before?"

"There doesn't seem to be any use in it—that's a fact. Nevertheless, I assure you, Laura, on my honour as a man——"

"On your honour! H'mph!"

"Yes, on my honour—h'mph! I have never seen that letter before. I never put it in my pocket. I didn't know it was there; I am not anybody else's dearest George, and that letter is a clumsy fake got up by somebody who wants to have a little fun with me——"

"I wish I could believe it! Oh, George! George!" (Sobs.)

"Look here, you chaps," said George Ferguson, the next day when he went into the office where he was employed, "that was a good joke some one of you played on me when you put that letter in my pocket yesterday, but it threatens to break up a happy family, and I ask as a favour that the chap who did it will just write a letter to my wife and tell her it was a bit of fun, and that I am not to blame in the slightest degree. I don't want to know who it was. All I ask is that the thing shall be straightened out."

* * * * *

It was late in the afternoon. There came a ring at the doorbell pertaining to the Ferguson dwelling, and a messenger delivered a letter addressed to Mrs. George Ferguson.

She opened it and read:

"Dear Mrs. Ferguson,—In a spirit of mischief I slipped a letter in your husband's coat pocket yesterday which I fear may have fallen into your hands, and in order to atone for any misunderstanding it may possibly have caused I wish to say that I wrote it myself and that it is purely imaginary.—With great respect I subscribe myself yours truly."

This was signed "Marcellus Hankinson."

Hardly had she finished reading this when another messenger came and left another letter. It read thus:

"My Dear Mrs. Ferguson,—I have a little confession to make. Yesterday in a thoughtless moment I wrote a letter purporting to come from some woman and dropped it into your husband's pocket. For fear you may have seen it I take occasion to assume the responsibility for the clumsy joke and to apologise for it.—With great respect, yours sincerely."

The signature was "Oliver Peduncle."

Then there came another letter—also by special messenger. It was as follows:

"My Dear Madam,—Pardon me for addressing you, but I wish to plead guilty to the perpetration of a foolish joke on your husband yesterday. I wrote a love letter (signed 'Dollie,' if I remember rightly) and slipped it into Mr. Ferguson's coat pocket. Fearing it may have met your eye I wrote this to exonerate your husband and to take upon myself the entire blame for the silly performance.—Respectfully yours."

It was signed "A. Spoonamore."

The bewildered woman had hardly perused this note and laid it on the table with the others when a fourth came. It was to this effect:

"Permit me, my dear Mrs. Ferguson, to atone for an act of thoughtlessness committed yesterday. Yielding to a hasty impulse, I wrote a letter to your husband purporting to come from some feminine admirer. This I placed in one of the pockets of his coat, unknown to him. As it may possibly have fallen into your hands, I take the liberty of assuring you that I alone am to blame for the stupid joke, and to express my hearty contrition."

The signature to this was "Wesley Higintop."

About two hours later Mr. Ferguson came home. He was whistling, with apparent unconsciousness of any domestic trouble, past, present or to come.

"George," exclaimed Mrs. Ferguson, in a high-pitched voice, as she met him at the door, "where are those other letters?"

SUMMARY.

THE opposing factions in the public games of ancient Constantinople were known as the "Blues and Greens." The Emperor and Empress favoured the Blues, and consequently the enmity that existed between the two factions was so strong that they could not meet in the streets without coming to blows.

Rhesus, a country youth from Sicily, lands at Constantinople with his friend, Proclus, and with a fixed determination to become famous as a gladiator. He adopts the cause of the Greens, and the first contest in which he takes part is a chariot race, which he would have won had it not been for the foul play of Hermiot, his opponent of the Blues.

Rhesus falls in love with Eutasia, a pretty little waif of the circus, of twelve years, who speedily becomes warmly attached to him.

A few years pass and Eutasia is affianced to Rhesus.

One night Proclus and Rhesus chance to overhear a plot between Hypatius, a claimant to the throne, Marcen, a gladiator of the green faction, and Hermiot of the Blues, to raise the city in revolt, remove Justinian from the throne, and make Hypatius emperor in his place.

Hypatius proceeds to take them singly down to the flooded catacombs under the ground upon which they are standing, where he has vast treasures stored with which he purposes to buy the sympathies of the people. Marcen goes with him first, leaving Hermiot on the watch. Rhesus and Proclus spring out upon Hermiot, bind and gag him. Upon the return of Hypatius and Marcen, Proclus assumes the blue sash of Hermiot, personates Hermiot under the cover of the darkness, and goes down into the catacombs with Hypatius in order to discover the whereabouts of the treasure.

Meanwhile it occurs to Marcen that if he were to cut off the only means of egress from the catacombs, his fellow conspirators will be heard of no more, and he will be the sole possessor of the hidden treasure. He returns to the entrance of the catacombs, followed by Rhesus, who watches him carry out his murderous designs. Marcen discovers the presence of Rhesus and rushes at him. Rhesus eludes him, and a hot chase follows. Rhesus finally gives Marcen the slip, and, together with Pelak, a charioteer of the Greens, returns to the catacombs in order to release his friend Proclus. Upon arriving there, however, they find someone has been before them, and the place is empty.

Rhesus returns home, and is overjoyed to find Proclus awaiting him there. Proclus tells him how that Marcen himself released the prisoners from the catacombs, and how that whilst imprisoned there he, Proclus, had discovered an inscription revealing the hiding-place of the key of a secret door.

Marcen persuades the Empress to take Eutasia into her service, and thus to remove her from the influence of Rhesus. Rhesus hears of it too late to prevent her going to the palace. He pays a clandestine visit to Eutasia in the palace grounds in order to persuade her to fly with him. He is discovered by some spies in the pay of Marcen, and barely escapes with his life.

Another great chariot race takes place. The palm of victory is unjustly awarded to the Blues, and the Greens break out in open rebellion. General dissatisfaction is felt against the Emperor Justinian, and Hypatius seizes the opportunity to urge his claims to the throne. He wins the populace over to his side, and fearful riot and slaughter ensues.

Rhesus and Proclus seek refuge in the flooded Catacombs, pursued by Marcen and a band of Hypatius' followers. After a fierce struggle, Proclus is wounded and thrown into the water for dead, and Rhesus is taken prisoner.

PART II.

CHAPTER V.

THE CLAWS OF THE TIGRESS.

THE feline ferocity that fights the more fiercely when driven to bay and bereft of all semblance of hope, is ever the most dangerous sort of valour to arouse. And the Empress Theodora, now her favourite faction had been led astray, and the hated Greens were in the ascendant, and herself and her husband kept close prisoners in the palace by the virulence of the passion-storm that raged in the riotous city, was possessed of just that kind of animal courage.

In vain had the ministers and generals endeavoured to restore or enforce order; in vain had Justinian—whose lordly mandate but a few years before had put down the Platonist schools of Athens and so extinguished the last faint star of Pagan philosophy that had twinkled in the deepening dusk of superstition—striven to allay the bloodthirsty fever of the drunken mobs of his Christian capital; in vain had Theodora's wild appeals and reckless promises been squandered; in vain the questor and prefect deposed and the taxes reduced to put an end to the reign of terror; and now, when the palace itself was surrounded by frantic partisans of Hypatius, and their very lives were in hourly, deadly peril, and ships lay ready laden at the foot of the garden stairs, and all counselled safety in flight, even the studious Justinian himself, the true temper of the Empress flashed out, and she declared with magnificent scorn, that come what might, she would not flee before a howling mob of ignorant slaves and commoners.

The courtiers implored her, reasoned with her, and Belisarius urged the necessity of caution before bravado; but the imperial tigress, all her cunning and cruelty flaming up in one splendid burst of fury, vowed that not only would she refuse to escape, but that the rebels should be brought to their knees and punished so severely that her revenge would be remembered through the ages.

Visions of a holocaust of victims floated—with cruel clearness—before her mental gaze, and, awed by her impetuous invective and really admirable bravery, the Emperor and those around him gave way and became instruments and accomplices in the realising of those horrific visions. And of all those who listened to her finely-pointed satire on men's faintheartedness, none thought her more queenly than did surface-skimming Eutasia; none felt so satisfied that he had chosen the wiser and safer course in staying in the palace instead of joining the rebels, than did Marcen. He fell in at once with Theodora's plans and prepared to carry out his share of the work with more than his customary zest.

It was his duty, with several others, to steal forth into the city unobserved and seek out individually the leaders of the blue faction, and by cajoling and promising, by reprimands and instilling envy of the triumphant Greens, to revive the partisan enmity and so divide the foe. On the evening of the fifth day he crept out and did his work well, leaving loyal Belisarius to complete the red annals of Nika; and then, having other and pressing business of his own in hand, summoned a gang of sturdy ruffians whom he had often employed before, and brought them off the rich harvest they were gathering in the hapless city by promises more extravagant than ever his fertile brain had before conceived, and so made his way to the convent.

As Proclus had shrewdly observed, he guessed that the two friends had some secret knowledge regarding the treasure, but as his spies had reported that neither of them, nor any emissaries of Hypatius, had since visited the Hall of Waters, he had been content to wait a suitable time for action. That time, he now thought, had come. But until he reached the underground chamber and actually discovered that Hypatius had not rifled the hoard, he was in an agony of dread lest the latter should have suspected his duplicity.

How he found his friends; how Proclus was cast into the inky waters of that subterranean flood and Rhesus was brought up, bound; how he was unable to find a key or clue to the secret of the sliding door of stone; and how the convent was blazing when the grumbling assassins emerged therefrom, the reader already knows. How he once more played double traitor and yet came through the ordeal with success and renown, remains to be told.

Boldly marching to the hippodrome, where the bright sunlight of the new morning was breaking throught the pall of fire-streaked smoke that hung over Byzantium, and where Hypatius had established his temporary headquarters, Marcen took his miserable prisoner and cast him into one of the untenanted bear dens. Then he mingled with the throng of flattering courtiers who already surrounded the new Emperor, and later in the day, found chance to speak with him alone.

Hypatius, flushed with success, and yet uneasy for the future, and casting about in his mind whether to attack the palace that day or the next, was at first inclined to grant scant hearing to one whose fidelity he had begun to doubt; but Marcen was so persistent, and reiterated his assurances of friendship so earnestly, that both the pretender and his brother were deceived. They listened eagerly to his account of how helpless was the Royal party, how easy their capture at any time, and how he had caught Rhesus and Proclus in the treasure vault. And whilst he talked, Marcen ever and anon glanced at the sun and at the notches on the water-clock that stood by the starting-place of the races. The wearers of blue, he noticed, were now few and far between, and even these one by one stole away. At the hour agreed upon, if all went well and Hypatius could be kept from the offensive, Belisarius would appear upon the scene and the last act of the grim drama of a foiled revolution would be played out with an unflinching adherence to the historic traditions of such stupendous tragedies.

"Yes, the treasure is ours now, beyond doubt," he said, "and if you need one more thing before you venture to make an end of Justinian it is that. The twentieth part of that hoard, scattered broadcast amongst the armed ruffians who are yet indifferent to either side, would win them to yours, and your position would be assured. Why not come with me—one or both of you—with a picked band of trusty men—if you have any—and secure and bring it away?"

Pompey was of hotter blood and for immediate action, but the glitter of gold and jewels was in the mind's eye of Hypatius, and he hesitated. And if ever a man who wavered was lost, the upstart Emperor of the green faction was lost in that moment of indecision. Life, wealth, power, the throne of an empire, lay in the balance against passing greed; the scale of greed weighed down and all was lost.

Even whilst they talked a commotion had arisen in the circus, and ere Hypatius had decided, some of his officers burst into his presence with the news that many of the blue faction were deserting them and that the foreign soldiers were massing in the neighbourhood of the palace and returning to something of their old discipline. The water in the clock sank slowly towards the level that Marcen's eyes rested on, and he cried, when the officers had finished their disquieting intelligence:

"All the more need, Majesty, for the wealth under the convent yonder, to turn the last pulse of the tide in your favour!"

The irresolute man fell into the trap set for him by a cunning hand, and sending out orders that the attack was to be deferred until his return, committed himself and a choice troop to the guidance of Marcen. Pompey was left behind, protesting.

The journey was shorter than even the most hasty fortune-seeker could have wished; indeed, it was ended before it was well begun. As the troop passed through a frequented doorway into the street, a sea of blue-clad figures surged up close round them, swallowing them as the rising flood of a swollen river submerges the rushes on its brink. After a brief, sharp struggle, Hypatius found himself bound hand and foot, carried to the dark den where Rhesus already lay, thrown therein, and there left to his own thoughts; whilst upon his ears was borne the sound of fighting, the clash of arms, the trample of many feet, the roar of many voices, the fierce shouts of victorious soldiery. The slaughter had begun; the claws of the imperial tigress were already wetted in the blood of her victims.

As the grated door of the den closed upon the ill-fated aspirant to the crown, 3,000 veterans, seasoned in the Persian and Illyrian wars, marched into the hippodrome in two divisions, one led by Belisarius and one by Mundus; and while these fell upon the astonished and densely-packed crowd of rebels within, the wearers of the blue, armed with daggers, maces, and short spears, flocked round the building like vultures to a field of carnage, and wreaked their wild, new-born fury upon all who escaped the swords of the soldiers.

Under the leadership of Pompey and others, the doomed Greens made a desperate effort to escape from the death-trap of those circling walls, but their assailants were tireless and innumerable, thirsting for vengeance, for wrongs long remembered and feuds unforgotten, and those who were saved from that seething maelstrom of murder, were saved in the spirit only, not in the flesh.

The horror of the long days of riot, the incredible fury of the blood-fever that had seized hold of all who were in the wretched city in those awful days, and the quenchless flame of the faction enmity had culminated in a climax of crime, a saturnalia of slaughter, a night of "Nika!" such as makes the brain reel and the soul sicken to contemplate, and which the pen refuses to dwell upon in many words. Suffice it to say that no fewer than 30,000 of the rebels were slain in the hippodrome and thousands more in the streets as the circle of death spread outwards; that when the next day dawned the green faction was nearly exterminated, the city was half in ruins, Hypatius and Pompey, with Rhesus and many others, were lodged in the dungeons of the palace, Justinian sat Emperor without a rival, and Theodora's face was wreathed in smiles. But enough of these chronicles of crime; we will follow the less discreditable fortunes of Rhesus the Roman, over whose head now hangs the implacable vengeance of a woman clothed in purple and dignified in history by the title of "Great"—a woman whose tender mercies were incredibly cruel and whose heart was the heart of a beast of prey.

CHAPTER VI.

"To the Galleys!"

Order is once more restored in Constantinople, the wealthy have returned to their homes, the shipping has once more crowded the Golden Horn, and Anthenius, the architect, has been commanded to rebuild the Church of St. Sophia. The hippodrome has been closed by an imperial order, the questor and prefect reinstated in their positions, and the pretender and his co-prisoners are brought to trial—or to the mockery called such. Small justice is there in the eyes of Theodora; little equity in the impatience of Justinian—irritated even then at being called away from his self-imposed task of codifying and revising the laws of the Roman world, of compiling those Institutes and Pandects which alone have rescued his memory from the dull level of his peers.

Some of the prisoners met their judges and the foregone conclusion with a callous indifference; most of them deserved the worst; but to Rhesus, with the blood of honest youth in his veins, and an unbounded enthusiasm, and a loved one to live for and guard from the clutching arms of the worlds' sin, the agony of the impending sentence seemed greater than a man could bear. He was innocent, too, of the treason with which he was charged—though innocence was poor enough plea in that court—and his soul cried out against such an end, a traitor's end, to all his dreams of fortune and renown and years of happy love.

Surely it was more than the gods would allow, this monstrous injustice? His gaze travelled round the crowded room of audience, seeking, and for long in vain, for a single pitying face, a single glance of regret. But at last, all unexpectedly, a face framed itself out of the sea of people—a sweet and merry face with a halo of golden hair—and his heart leapt with a spasm of hope. The Empress was fond of his Eutasia, and she would intercede for him, at least get the sentence mitigated. And if life be granted at all, of a surety he would find some way to come into his own again, to recover what he had lost, to win from the grasp of the flying years some of that happiness that once he thought was his without fail.

So he plucked up some courage and looked the judges in the face. But that gleam of relief was a passing gleam only, and dark and dull as the shadow of heavy-laden storm clouds came the words of fate from the lips of the pronouncer of the sentences. To some few of the prisoners, mistakenly arrested, was granted release; many were condemned to the mines or the galleys; and with Hypatius and his brother Pompey and eighteen of their most noted partisans, Rhesus was condemned to death.

The light went out of the sunny sky for him as the dread words fell upon his ears, the warmth out of the summer air, the pleasure out of even the little span of life that yet remained. He glanced swiftly round the crowded hall, but met no friendly eyes save those he loved. The bishops and priests, clad in their gorgeous robes of ceremonial—in all the pomp and pageantry of Christian fashion—nodded their heads in acquiescence of his doom; the soldiers stared stonily; the people moved with idle interest; Justinian fidgeted in his royal seat; Theodora tossed her shapely head and jested with the nearest man who had nerve to bandy words with her; and over Marcen's face stole a grim, lurking smile of satisfaction as he stood beside Eutasia and strove to allay her frantic despair.

The guards moved forward to lead the doomed away, and as the glittering shields closed round him, he already seemed to hear the earth falling on his hasty grave. But ere the words of command had left the officer's lips a wild, piercing cry—a girl's cry—rang through the startled throng. A lithe, light form came flying across the central space and between the soldiers, and in a moment soft arms were about his neck, and Eutasia's tearful face pressed close to his, and hot words of love, regret and supplication to him and defiance to the judges, were poured into his dazed ears.

"They shall not slay you, my Rhesus!" she cried, "they dare not, for the Empress will forbid! And oh, Rhesus my love, my dear one, forgive me now, this instant, for sending you away with anger. Say that you cherish no ill for it, love!"

He essayed to unlock her arms and look the man before the eyes of the curious crowd. He assured her that he had naught to pardon, and bade her not to risk her life in his service. It was in vain; and her fragrant caresses were showered upon him until the guards, recovered from their surprise, advanced and tore them apart. Two brawny Sythians held her, panting with passion, in their iron grasp.

"Take her away!" cried the ushers, pompous in their drunken rotundity, "the Emperor declares the trial over and the matter dismissed. Take her to the Empress and the prisoners to their fate."

But the little fury tore herself free again and broke through the ring of steel once more, calling on Theodora and Marcen to aid her; and when they were parted once again—and more roughly than before—the latter had spoken secretly with Theodora. He then came forward and led the girl away, whispering Rhesus knew not what in her pretty ear, while the doomed man raged as one possessed, and shouted aloud that Marcen was the vilest traitor in the city and false to all saving himself. He saw the two look at him as they conversed with the Empress. He saw a strange wild, agonised glance pass over his darling's face—a shade, a moment of hesitation—and then, averting her head she gave her finger-tips to the traitor and suffered him to lead her away. Yet often she looked back ere she vanished from his sight, tearful, regretful, her girlhood changed to womanhood in that one indescribable gaze.

And Rhesus, seeing the Empress bend and speak to the judge, could but guess how she had sacrificed herself for his sake, had surrendered to Marcen to save his life—worthless to him now, at such a cost. The knell of the reprieve rang through the room; and Rhesus the Roman was sentenced to serve with bare back and manacled feet amongst the vilest criminals who pulled the oars of the galleys.

Two brawny Sythians held her, panting with passion, in their iron grasp.

And as they led him straightway with the rest of the doomed down to the busy wharf, and apportioned them amongst the many ships that lay there ready for sea, and riveted the heavy chains upon his ankles and stripped the green sash and tunic from his back and chained him to an oar in the hold of a grey-painted transport ship, he made a vow by all the gods of his dear pagan heaven. He vowed that come what might, captive or free, when next he cast eyes on Marcen—the consummate villain and traitor whose cunning had stolen his love and slain his friend, and kept his own wretched carcase whole through all the riot and ruin that had brought so many better men to violent ends—he would pay the heavy reckoning in full.

"The gods may spare you, the suspicion of courts and the frenzy of popular rage may pass you by, but I will not, Titan of iniquity!" cried Rhesus, in the bitterness of his soul.

And that night of black despair, when the anchor was raised and the vessel began her voyage with a breeze that dispensed with the services of the fifty rowers, there rang in his hearing, high above the oaths and maledictions of his wretched companions in toil as they took such ease as came to them, the passionate cry of Eutasia's entreaty for his life; and before his mental view, in the glare of the silver moonlight that poured in a dazzling ray through the small square of the rowlock-hole and cast dense shadows where the rats squeaked and ran, there floated the last glimpse he had of his love, led away by a traitor's hand.

Awhile the mocking vision floated there before him, until his eyes grew strained, and burned as orbs of fire, and it merged to a mist of blood. Then weariness overcame him. He fell in a heap upon his chains, and slept.

MY SHADY VISITOR.

I AM not an imaginative man, let it be known at the outset; I am not a man at all likely to be the prey of hallucinations. I do not tremble at a shadow, nor am I one of those poor spectre-smitten imbeciles who turn a branch into a warning finger.

Strictly speaking, there is nothing horrible about my experience. At the same time, as I write it down, I am conscious of a tingling of the nerves and a tendency to look over my shoulder.

The situation is this: An unimaginative man of thirty, whose time is largely occupied by an untaxing business; a pleasant suburb, the big houses of which were supplied with electric light; a bright, sunshiny country; neighbours on all sides; and no predisposition whatever about the man, the place, or the neighbourhood, to ghosts. To this house and to this man the ghost came. And in this wise:

It was towards the close of summer when the days begin to close in early.

I was sitting, after dinner, trying to get sentimental over my approaching happiness—I was soon to be married—and picturing to myself Venus in the easy chair opposite me. It was a feeble attempt at experiencing the pleasures of imagination, because I could not picture anyone at all.

Then I took a book and opened it, with a yawn. The light was fading, but as my eyes followed the lines mechanically, and my thoughts were elsewhere, that mattered little. Outside, there was extraordinary stillness.

A curious feeling came over me; I suddenly realised the fact that life may go on in invisible, intangible forms. I looked about with a shudder; I expected something—what, I knew not.

All at once the room, without the slightest warning, became distinctly darker. Suddenly the outer door opened with a terrific bang, as if some strong wind had forced it open, instantly causing me to jump from my chair.

Up to this moment, remember, there was no reason whatever for alarm; yet I became unaccountably afraid. The darkness was intense. I struck a match; it went out. I struck another; that also went out. Then I hastily turned on the incandescent light. The glow, instead of being the usual white, was of a peculiar bluish tint.

The door was still open. The air grew chilly. I felt cold perspiration upon my forehead. I tried to close the door, but something held it fast, though the air outside was perfectly still. All at once the door slipped out of my hand and slammed back to its place with a louder noise than that which it made at its opening.

I was frightened. It was all exceedingly uncanny, and I felt nervous. I then happened to look in the direction of my chair. It was fully five feet from where I had left it but a moment before!

Then the incandescent light, still of a bluish tint, began moving, apparently of itself, toward the chair, and in an instant, for the first time, I saw—IT quietly sitting in the chair holding in its bony hands the electric light bulb, still glowing, with the most horrible grin on its face.

It was clearly outlined, a peculiar shadow, in the dusk of the evening; colourless, and yet its draperies were like white grave clothes; shapeless, and yet a form akin to human, but most awfully unlike it. It seemed the gaunt spirit of a skeleton, whose intangible fingers of wavering bones plucked at a wisp of spectral hair that drooped from a ghastly, eyeless skull—which, though eyeless, seemed none the less to behold me!

For a moment I was paralysed with fear, but, as the apparition evinced no signs of evil intention, I gathered courage to gasp:

"Who are you, and what do you want?"

He answered by throwing the electric light bulb at me, which whizzed past my ear, and with a pistol-like report broke into a thousand pieces at the other end of the room.

Though we were in absolute darkness, yet, by his now phosphorescent eye sockets, the THING was easily discernible, and simultaneously with the crash of the bulb he burst out in awful, diabolical laughter which lasted for some seconds. Quickly, with that singular movement remarked by all who have had the special privilege, if it be that, to witness such things—a movement in which the shape neither glides nor walks, but merely changes place—the spectre stood chuckling beside me.

"How do you like my fun?" said he, grinning more horribly than before. "Oh, you needn't try to get away"—grasping me by the arm (oh, his touch!) as I hastily stepped back. "I have found you at last, you cannot escape this time! But now that I have found you, what shall I do with you?"

I could only look hopeless.

Suddenly he stretched out one arm and I saw a bony fist shaking excitedly in my face, and two awful luminous eyes above it glaring fiercely at me.

He then rushed, puffing, round the room. I could feel his hot breath on my cheeks, but could see only the luminous eyes and the shaking fist—it seemed as if they floated about of their own accord. The air, I also noticed, was not stirred by the THING'S movements, and it was odd, too, that I recovered my courage the moment he began to threaten.

"Now that I have found you," he repeated over and over again, as if he could say nothing more, "what shall I do with you?"

"Come," I cried at last, "this is fooling. What do you mean by coming to my house like a burglar and carrying on like a madman? Leave off asking what you will do with me. If you are a ghost out of his senses, say so; if not, vary the monotony by saying something else."

"I can't," he answered, groaning. "It's not allowed. I wish I could. Oh, what shall I do with you?"

"You've asked me that a hundred times already. But I say, you may be able to stand this darkness, but I can't."

I struck a match; he did not blow it out, as I presume he did the others. I tried another bulb on the electric light socket, but the current was off. Let me state here that I learnt afterwards that at the central station, some distance away, a strange shock was felt about the time of the arrival of my ghost, half indicating that I was not subject to some hallucination.

Not to be in darkness, I lighted an oil lamp. The THING was still there—a faint, almost invisible shape now.

"You say," I resumed, carelessly drawing a sword from its case hanging on the wall, "that you are restricted in your movements. Well, look here."

I quickly passed the sword through him. I cut him down like a guardsman at Waterloo. I sliced him in two like a soldier at an assault-at-arms. And at each pass of the weapon he ducked, recoiled, and cried aloud.

"See, you cannot resist. I do what I like with you. What can you do in return?"

He struck me in the face. It was as if a cold wind blew upon my cheeks.

"Is that all!" I said. "Do that as often as you like."

"You are not afraid of me, then?"—as if such a thing as a man daring to stand up to a ghost was unheard of.

"Positively not afraid of me?"

"Certainly not; why should I be?"

"Not afraid of me! Man! I am from the grave. See my grave clothes. I am the spirit of a dead man."

I could not repress a shudder; the shiver came across me. He saw it at once, and sprang at my throat, blowing the light out as he did so.

To my surprise, what was before as a breath of cold air became tangible. I felt his cold grasp with his long, bony fingers at my throat. His face, close to mine, was filled with an eager longing for revenge; his lurid eyes glared in mine; his teeth glimmered in the moonlight coming in through the window. It was but for a moment that I was afraid.

I rallied my courage, sprang upright, and looked my spectral enemy unswervingly in the face. As I looked, the tangibility of his fingers weakened, the tightness of his grasp relaxed, and his look changed from one of triumph to that of baffled rage. He fell back sullenly, and threw himself, clearly outlined in the moonlight, into my easy chair, glaring round the room.

"That's mine," I said. "Please take another. I never allow anyone but myself to occupy it."

He immediately obeyed.

"Will this do?"

It was next to mine. I begged him to take one on the other side of the room, which he did at once.

Just then Sarah, my general servant, entered the room, but hardly had she stepped in when she ran away shrieking as I had never heard a woman shriek before, while as for my dog, which came into the room, he ran out with his tail between his legs, and I've never seen him since. They must have seen the ghost.

"Pray tell me what it means," I said, after a momentary silence.

"It means that if you were afraid of me I would throttle you like a dog. It means that I am waiting for the moment when you will realise who and what I am; the injuries you have done me, the wickedness of your life. Ha! ha! I see it coming! Your nerves won't stand me much longer, then I shall seize you by the throat, and squeeze, squeeze, squeeze the life out of you!"

But I was not at all afraid now.

"By the way," I said, "where do you come from—our cemetery?"

"No; you know where. Need I tell you from West Australia?"

"You have come a long way, my friend," I answered, smiling.

"Ah, villain! traitor! murderer!"

"Those are hard names, my friend."

"When," he said at length, "I was in Australia region hunting for gold—there, what's the use of raking up the old story?"

"None," I answered, thinking that he certainly must be a lunatic ghost, and making a mental note of the fact as one likely to throw great light on the spirit world. "None at all, unless you like."

"To think that you—you, of all men in the world—never mind!"

"Certainly not."

"When I saw you last, over there, you were with her."

I smiled.

"No use talking. What's the good of talk? Come to think, I might remind you what went on, you know, at the 'diggings.' Eh? What do you say to that?"

"Nothing whatever."

"What about the Dyer business? Who promised what—tell me that—if some one was robbed of his three years' labour, and he was put out of the way because of that and her? Eh?"

Here was a very serious question. I only shook my head.

"Robbed, murdered, you villain! out of jealousy! Why was my drink poisoned? Why was my food poisoned? Why? why? why?"

"Can't say, I'm sure. Shall we say good-night?"

"If you're going to bed, I will go with you. But it isn't bed-time yet."

This was pleasant.

"What had I done to him? How was I to get rid of this lunatic ghost? Why should I be made the victim of a ghost? And I expected Venus every minute!"

She came. But she had not been with me two minutes before she saw IT, and fainted.

"What was it, John?" she asked when she came to. "What was it? I am afraid. Take me home."

I took Venus home. I implored her to keep silent as to what she had seen. I soothed, I pacified her. I assured her that it was fancy—a trick of the imagination—some schoolboy joke—anything to keep her quiet. And thus I left her, and returned, miserable and maddened, to have it out with this demon who had fastened himself upon me.

"I allowed you to go away with the girl," he explained on my return, "because I do not wish to do her any harm. But she shall never marry you, remember that. Wretch!"—he approached me with threatening gestures—"wretch! Was it not enough to interfere between me and her? You try to murder the happiness of another innocent girl! Can you ruthlessly ——"

"Good heavens!" I cried, almost beside myself with rage. "What have I done to you, that you should persecute me in this way?"

"He asks me what he has done! Think of Australia! Think of Logan's gold claim, and think of Maggie Baker. Joe Wiggins, you were always as brazen a liar as ever stepped, but I did not think you would brazen it out to me."

A thought struck me. "You call me Joe Wiggins. I am not Joe Wiggins at all. I have never heard of any Joe Wiggins."

He laughed.

"If you are not Joe Wiggins," he said, "I'll eat my hat. I mean, of course——"

"Come, this is trifling. I say that you mistake me for someone else. What did he look like?"

"The same as you—sanctimonious look, slim as a poker, small head, large sticking-out ears, big mouth—just like yourself."

This was flattering.

"Only Joe didn't wear a beard."

"Had this Joe Wiggins any marks?"

"Yes, tattoo marks on the right arm; I did them. Why?"

I drew up my sleeve and showed him my arms, white and free from any tatoo mark at all.

He was stupefied.

"Well—I'm—no—I'm blowed! And you ain't Joe at all? What a fool you must have taken me for."

"I did."

"And me to go and let out all the little secrets. You hold your tongue, man, about that gold business."

"I never thought much of ghosts," I responded; "now I shall think still less of them."

"Go on, go on," he said; "let me have it."

"Why couldn't you ask before you came blundering into my house with your mysterious self? Why couldn't you have put the question before you began?"

"Why, indeed!" he echoed. "Look here, sir, I'm very sorry for this mistake—I am, indeed. And frightening the young lady, and all! I am an idiot of a ghost! What shall I do to square things?"

"Do? Leave me at once."

"Shall I," he said plaintively, "shall I appear to the young lady to-night after she goes to bed? I can easily do it, and then explain it all."

"Certainly not; on no account. You are not to disturb her at all, understand?"

"Well, then, I suppose I'd better go."

"Indeed you had, and have the goodness never to return."

He began to disappear; I breathed more freely. Then the shape, which had almost disappeared, started into sight again with a suddenness which brought back the horror which first seized me.

"One word, sir," spoke he. "I'm afraid I haven't come well out of this affair. Now s'pose—I only say s'pose—I can put you on to a good thing. It may be a wreck of some kind; it may be buried treasure; it may be only a pot of money; it may be coins, or it may be statues; but if I should hear of it, and was to come and tell you, it might go some way to getting into your good opinion again."

"No," I replied; "I want nothing, except an assurance that I shall never see you again."

He sighed.

"Well, sir, I feel that I can't go against your wishes; I promise. No malice, eh? When we meet again, which we may, there will be no malice, I hope."

He disappeared finally, and I have seen no more of him, but have often wondered who Joe Wiggins is, where he lives, what he has done, how he managed to offend my ghost, and what that gold-mining business was all about.

A BLOTTED CLUE.

"WHAT I consider my most interesting case," said Detective Allison, "I took up with no apparent prospect of ever receiving one penny for my services. Now, the thought of this case and a few others in which I became interested out of pure love of justice, a desire to assist one who was being wronged, give me more satisfaction in these rheumatic days of inactivity than all else I ever did.

"What brings it to my mind now, and what often recalls it, is the gold watch you just saw me glance at. Why it does so I will proceed to tell you.

"Some twenty or more years ago the good people of Ashington, a town of twelve thousand inhabitants, were startled by the announcement that Mr. Morton Dean, a man of wealth and good social standing, although somewhat eccentric, had been murdered. He was alone in the house at the time, a sister, his housekeeper, being temporarily away,

"Startling as was this information, it was probably not so much so as the arrest of Robert Clark, also a resident at Ashington.

"I was away at the time, but the newspapers sent to me daily kept me well posted about the affair.

"A few words now about Robert Clark.

"He was twenty-five years of age. Had always lived in Ashington. Was considered an exemplary young man. While known to most of the inhabitants, he had few intimate friends, being rather reserved in his ways. His countenance indicated intelligence, but its paleness and a sad expression gave the impression that he had rather a frail constitution. This, it seems, was the case, and undoubtedly accounted for his always being on the look-out for light work.

"Some called him shiftless, but while that term could have been properly applied to his father, it did not, I believed, suit him.

"When arrested, Clark was acting as hall porter of the local Young Men's Christian Association, and bore an excellent character.

"When the news of his arrest reached me, I instinctively felt he was innocent.

"At the preliminary hearing, P.C. Anderson testified that on the night of the murder a boy told him someone at Dean's was calling for help. He hastened there and seized a man who was getting out of a window. It proved to be young Clark, who made a strenuous effort to escape, but was held and handcuffed.

"In view of the prisoner's violence, the constable had taken him to the police station, without waiting for any investigation; had then returned to the house with another officer, passed in through the window and went to the room where Mr. Dean was found dead; after certain proceedings there, returned to the police station and carefully examined the prisoner. A dozen blood-stains were found upon his clothing, and in his inside coat pocket was a pocket-book, containing fifty pounds in notes and a number of valuable documents, which plainly belonged to Mr. Dean.

"This was the substance of his testimony.

"Clark then told his story substantially as follows:

"At about twelve o'clock that night he was returning home, his duties having kept him later than usual. Strangely enough, he had never been out so late before. When in front of Mr. Dean's house he heard the cry, 'Help! help! murder!' Although of a somewhat timid nature, he admitted, he rushed to the front door, feeling it his duty to render assistance. The door proved to be ajar and a key was in the lock on the outside.

"He went in and, guided by a noise as of someone moving about, passed upstairs and opened a door. Instantly a man rushed past him, nearly knocking him down. Clark caught a glimpse of the man by the light from his dark lantern, but did not see him distinctly enough to recognise or describe him.

"I will now give the prisoner's own words as near as I can remember them, as published in a newspaper sent me at the time.

"'I then,' said he, 'struck a match and went into the room where Mr. Dean lay groaning, lighted the gas and threw some water into his face, which was covered with blood. This seemed to revive him, and opening his eyes he scanned my face and apparently recognised me. Reaching down into the bed he faintly said:

"'"Thank Heaven he did not get this," and handed me the pocket-book which was found upon me. He then said with difficulty: "My time is short; promise me you will give the pocket-book to no one but my brother Phillip, and I shall feel ready to go."

"'There was a spasm of pain, his eyes became fixed and glassy, he gave a gasp, and the end had come.

"'Then, hardly knowing what I was doing, the affair had so shocked me, I put the pocket-book into my coat pocket and entirely forgot about it (until it was discovered). Then I started to tell the neighbours and police of the tragedy.

"'On reaching the front door, to my surprise I found it locked. Then I went to a window, unfastened it, and was getting out when I was roughly seized. Thinking it was the murderer, I struggled to free myself until I found it was a policeman.'

"Clark was up before the magistrate several times and finally committed for trial.

"When I returned home, I found it the prevailing opinion that Clark was guilty.

"My own view, that he was a victim of circumstances, was strengthened after an interview with him at the county gaol.

"I determined to do everything in my power to prove his innocence. I examined the premises where the murder was committed and interviewed everyone in any way connected with the affair.

"Not a clue did I obtain, except that a worthless fellow known as Dicey, a notorious liar whom no one in the place would believe, came to me and stoutly affirmed that he, at about eleven o'clock on the night of the murder, and in the vicinity where it occurred, met right under the gaslight at the street corner, a rough-looking stranger.

"He especially noticed a scar on his face, and could, he claimed, pick him out in a crowd.

"No one else, however, had seen him, and I felt that the information, coming from the source it did, would prove of little value.

"Well, even after the assizes had begun, a month later, all I had learnt would not have had a feather's weight with the jury.

"There was absolutely nothing in Clark's favour except his previous good character and his own statement.

"The latter of course, unsupported by any corroborative evidence, would have little weight.

"On the morning of the trial, our postmaster handed me a letter addressed to him, which read as follows:

"Postmaster, Ashington.

"Sir,—The man charged with the murder of Mr. Morton Dean is innocent. The guilty man confessed to me while under the influence of liquor. Don't dare write more for fear of my life.

"A WOMAN.

"I took the letter to my office to consider. The more I studied it the more I concluded it was of no value.

"There was apparently nothing by which the writer's identity could be discovered. Had it been from some small place, I should have had some hope, but as it bore the London postmark I had none.

"Only one thing about it was noticeable, and that, at first, seemed hardly worth a thought.

"The word 'postmaster' on the envelope was blotted. Looked as though the point of the pen had caught and spattered ink all over the word. This, however, indicated nothing, and I threw the letter on to my desk in despair, concluding that I would hand it to Clark's solicitor.

"Although I was satisfied the letter contained a true statement, I knew, if read to the jury, they would not so regard it. They would say some friend of the prisoner wrote it and got it posted.

"Picking up the letter again, I examined the blots with a magnifying glass. At the same time I was standing at a high writing-desk, on which, directly in front of me, was a small looking-glass. Lost in thought, I stood with my elbows resting on the desk. The ends of the envelope were between my thumbs and fingers, and I was unconciously twirling it round.

"Happening to glance at the mirror, to my surprise one of the blots developed into what looked like a capital letter H. On a more critical examination I was sure of it, and other letters began to show up out of the apparent ink spots until I made out the following: Ha; then there was a little space without any blot: then I made out the letter r; then came another blank space; then the letter w; then another space; and then the letters ll.

"All the letters were indistinct and imperfect.

"On that account, and the letters being wrong side up, as well as mixed with the word 'postmaster,' had failed to observe them. The mirror, however, showed them right side up, and the spots began to give out intelligence.

"My hopes brightened.

"Could that intelligence be the name of some village or town? It was; but I must relate the rest briefly.

"By the aid of a gazetteer, I soon became satisfied that 'Harrowell' was the name intermingled with the 'postmaster' on the envelope in which the anonymous letter came.

"I immediately took the train for that place, on the following theory, which proved a correct one. I concluded the letter was written in Harrowell, put into an envelope and addressed:

"Postmaster, Ashington.

"Then the same person had written and posted another letter to a friend in London inclosing therein the Ashington letter, with a request that the letter be posted in the metropolis. In folding the letter to the friend round the Ashington letter, the name of the village 'Harrowell' at the head of the sheet, covered the word 'postmaster' on the envelope. The ink not being dry made the ink spots which proved of so much importance in the case.

"On arriving at Harrowell, a very small place, I rapidly made my way to the post office, stated the case to the postmaster and showed him the letter.

"On reading it he said: 'I believe I can tell you where to find your man. We have a man in our village who has spent one term in prison. He was away at the time of the murder, but came home soon after. The letter, I believe, was written by his sister-in-law.'

"It was then three. The man, I learnt, would be home at six. That gave me time to make arrangements for his arrest and have an interview with the woman.

"On showing her the letter she admitted writing it and its truth. She had no affection, she stated, for her brother-in-law, but feared him. His actions had caused the death of her sister, and she privately confessed that she would be pleased to see him behind the prison bars.

"An examination of his room was made, and beneath the carpet, behind a chest of drawers, I found five bank notes.

"When the villain came home at six he was arrested, and we were soon speeding towards Ashington. The woman also came as a witness.

"Nothing could be done that night; it was too late. But in the morning I saw solicitor and counsel and told my story. On the opening of the court, the trial was adjourned.

"Well, I needn't prolong the story. The evidence was considered sufficient to secure Clark's acquittal, and in time the real culprit received his reward.

"Clark was very grateful to me, and with tears in his eyes expressed sorrow because he could not recompense me for what I had done.

"He soon left Ashington and I heard nothing from him until five years ago, when at Christmas I received from him this gold watch. With it was a note, saying that if some of his ventures proved successful I should hear from him again.

"I never have, but from his case I learnt to be a little shy of circumstantial evidence."

Trans-Saharan Station 15—M.

"CLINK-CLANK! clink-clank!"

Three men crouched in the shelter of a hut made of sheets of corrugated iron. They did not stir. They scarcely breathed. The thermometer indicated a temperature of one hundred and thirty-five degrees.

Before the door of the hut rose a skeleton tower of iron beams.

Over a wheel at the top of the structure ran a wire rope which, descending perpendicularly, disappeared within a well-like cavity some twenty inches in diameter. The other end was coiled round a drum operated by an electric motor which automatically started—stopped—reversed—stopped—started, and so on. Up and down, up and down, moved the rope with monotonous regularity.

"Clink-clank! clink-clank!"

It was the only sound that disturbed the intense, suffocating stillness.

Outside, the horizon line receded to the utmost limit of vision in all directions. A level waste of sand met the eye wherever it turned, reflecting the almost vertical rays of the sun with an indescribable fierceness. The atmosphere swam in shimmering streaks.

The enormous palpitating disc of the desert was bisected by a single line of rails which dwindled to vanishing points to the north and to the south. The rails rested on the broad basis of metal like huge, inverted soup plates, which enabled the road to lie firmly upon the treacherous sand. Between the rails was placed the insulated cable which brought the electric current to the motor.

A semaphore signal, planted upright in the sand like a contorted skeleton, a few scattered tools, some bits of piping and abandoned pieces of machinery, completed the catalogue of objects of definite outline. The motor buzzed drowsily.

"Clink-clank! clink-clank!"

This particularly undesirable spot upon the world's surface was marked on the map of the new Trans-Saharan Railway as Station 15—M. The railway was the latest audacious engineering exploit of the French. It connected Algiers in a mathematically straight line with Timbuctoo, and was expected to bring the riches of the eastern Soudan to the Mediterranean shores. Station 15—M was full four hundred miles north of the southern terminus, in the hottest part of the great Sahara, just under the line of the tropic.

The three men in the hut were drilling an artesian well, that, when pierced, would create an artificial oasis. The drilling apparatus was perfectly made and almost human in its intelligence. It would work for hours without Belleau, the chief, touching a lever.

Belleau was an old man, wedded to one idea, the success of the Trans-Saharan. Littlefield, his assistant, was an Englishman, young and enthusiastic. Colet was a student of the French Technological school, who acted as helper and general utility man.

"Ah, how awfully hot this is!" muttered Colet at last, as he tried vainly to find a place where it was a degree or two cooler. "What wouldn't I give for a good swim now!"

"Keep still, there's a good fellow," expostulated Littlefield. "You are kicking up this dry sand, and it won't settle again for an age. Don't knock all our grub over, either. The Tauregs may stop the supply train, and vegetables don't grow in this country. There! you've gone and done it!"

For Colet had given another roll and dislodged a pile of boxes of provisions, which, with the miscellaneous clothing and instruments, came crashing down in a heap.

When they had been restored to their places, Belleau awoke from a troubled slumber. He glanced at his watch, and then, pulling his coat collar up to shield his neck from the solar heat, crossed the space between the hut and the tower.

"Four thousand feet," he murmured. "In forty-eight hours, we ought to reach the water-bearing strata."

By turning a lever he reversed the electric apparatus rapidly, and the drum began to wind the wire rope. When it was full, another was deftly substituted, and after that a third. Then the machinery stopped, and the heavy metal drill emerged from the black depths of the well, bringing with it a volume of dark earth, which, tumbling down a trough prepared for its reception, poured over the tawny desert sand. It was a curious contrast of hues.

The engineer fingered the soil. It was loose and friable. He smelled and even tasted it.

"We have not yet reached the belt of clay which confines the subterranean reservoirs," he said.

Once more with a humming sound, the drill vanished into the depths, the wire rope rattled furiously as it unwound, and then the apparatus resumed its work.

"Clink-clank! clink-clank!"

When the sun declined it was obscured by a curious mouse-coloured cloud rising from the west.

"Can it be a thunderstorm?" asked Littlefield.

"Worse," answered the chief; "it is a sandstorm, the terrible simoon. I fear we are in great danger."

With incredible swiftness the "Devil of the Sahara" advanced. Where the three men stood, a deathlike stillness prevailed. The outlines of the tower seemed drawn in sepia on a background of fiery orange. Long, snaky fingers of smoke came reaching out over the sky, wriggling fantastically.

Then a wall of grey mist came sweeping over the desert, and the awe-stricken beholders saw the sand caught up in vast whirling columns. A dull booming sound, like that of breakers on hidden reefs, smote upon their ears.

"Inside and close the door!" shouted Belleau.

The engineers hastened into the hut and secured the door.

In a moment, it seemed, the storm was upon them.

The atmosphere became black as midnight. A sonorous hum, like the diapason of some mighty cathedral organ, filled all the dome of the heavens. There were sounds of titanic buffetings and demoniac yells.

It was as if all the ancient fiends of the Sahara had gathered to overwhelm its presumptuous invaders.

Had not the hut been strongly bolted together it would have been torn to pieces. The fiery particles hissed against its iron sides like a discharge of shot.

Sand sifted through the cracks until the three men, their heads wrapped in cloths, were almost stifled.

For a moment it seemed as though they were to be buried deep in a living grave. Then, as quickly as it came, the simoon fled away, and the sun, now red as blood, threw his level beams across the plain.

The drilling apparatus was not injured. Its delicate machinery was so protected that the sand could not reach it.

Then a terrible discovery was made. Colet, his throat burning with thirst, approached the tank which contained their supply of water. He found the tap open and the tank empty!

The lad gave a cry. His companions rushed to the spot.

"All gone—wasted!" he moaned.

It was true. Not a drop remained. When the pile of supplies had fallen over, the tap had been knocked open, and the thirsty sand had drunk the precious liquid.

"If a train doesn't get here to-morrow, we shall be in a fix," observed the assistant engineer.

Belleau shook his head.

"The sand-storm has blocked the rails," he said. "No engine can pass until the ploughs have made a path for it. That will take many hours, and a man cannot live many hours in the Sahara without water."

"Let us walk to the next station," suggested Colet.

"It is two hundred miles. If one of us tried he would perish before he had accomplished a quarter of the distance," replied the old chief. His eyes turned toward the drill.

"There is one hope, then," cried the Englishman, following the direction of his gaze. "If the drill reaches the water-bearing levels in time we shall be saved."

The old engineer bowed his head silently.

"Clink-clank! clink-clank!"

The long night had dragged away and the garish sun shot into view once more. The three men, haggard, gasping, with parched throats, avoided meeting one another's gaze. The drill had gnawed its way deeper into the bowels of the earth, but there were no signs of water.

The frightful agonies of prolonged thirst had set in. The victims neglected to note the passage of time, but lay in a sort of stupor. At intervals the chief tested the borings.

"It will soon be over, one way or the other," he whispered to his assistant.

Towards the middle of the afternoon Colet collapsed with all the symptoms of violent sunstroke. His face became almost black. His pulses beat furiously.

"Water!" he muttered, with cracked lips.

His companions turned away. Then followed delirium. He murmured of running streams and splashing fountains. Death comes quickly when the thermometer marks one hundred and thirty-five degrees on the Sahara. The poor lad suddenly sprang to his feet, and, staggering from the hut, he put his palms together above his head and dived, as one dives from a river bank, headlong into the black shadow of the tower, streaming across the sand. When Littlefield reached him he was dead.

The sun completed its circuit and sank like a plummet towards the western horizon. Belleau and his assistant feebly tried the boring again. The drill was withdrawn with some difficulty. When it came to the surface it was coated with stiff clay, cool to the touch. The old engineer pointed to it. He could not speak. It was a question of a few hours now.

Belleau, completely exhausted, threw himself down on the sand at the door of the hut and seemed to sleep.

Littlefield, lying flat on his back, tried to gaze through the grey depths of the zenith. Suddenly, far above, he perceived a black spot that hovered and circled in a wide orbit. It seemed to be watching intently. A sickness of utter horror and despair came upon the young man.

He approached his chief and touched the shoulder of the still form. There was no response.

"Belleau!" he exclaimed with hoarse emphasis.

No answer. He passed his hand over the temple fringed with grey locks. The flesh was still and harsh. The heart had ceased to beat. The old engineer had passed away as peacefully as a baby goes to sleep within its mother's circling arms.

The drill never stopped.

"Clink-clank! Clink-clank!"

When Littlefield opened his eyes again the lids seemed to grate heavily upon the balls. He looked up. The grey sky was gone and the odious black spot with it. It was night, and over the velvet depths of space the tropic stars were passing in a majestic procession. They shone with wonderful brilliancy.

The young engineer gazed drowsily at them. He felt strangely comfortable as he lay there upon the sand. The tormenting thirst had ceased. He did not even feel surprised when he found that his limbs had lost the power of motion. Life seemed concentrated in a small area of the brain just behind the eyes. He perceived nothing but the glorious wheeling stars, some red, some blue, some of a yellow lustre.

Then came visions of a far distant landscape; great elm trees over-arching, and the continual gurgle of the brook, flowing underneath a plank bridge. He was walking up the path.

A girl stood at the gate and stretched out her hands to him, smiling angelically with brown eyes that looked clearly into his own.

"Harry," she said, and her voice sounded like a far away tinkle of silver bells, "you have come at last."

Then the light went out like a glowing coal, and only the great calm, desert stars, looked down pityingly.

"Clink-clank! Clink-clank!"

But when the day came again the great drill had ceased its clanking.

In those hours of darkness the waters under the earth, liberated from their prison, had burst with impetuous force through the vent, tossed the machine aside, and the first rays of the sun were reflected on the ebullient flood that bubbled up from the well, gushed in rainbow spray round the iron post of the tall derrick, filled the hollows behind the track with crystal pools, and then hastened by the three dark, silent forms that heeded it not, before plunging once more into the sands that gave it birth.

The Woman Who Jilted a Man.

THE news of the young man's death affected Miss Darrow disagreeably. The close friendship existing between the two families would call for some display of concern on her part, if only for form's sake. Being a girl of strong convictions and unalterable opinion, she regretted this necessity. She considered it incompatible with true honesty to simulate grief for a person she could not respect.

Moreover, there was the Captain. Women can be very rigid in their censorship of the conduct of a lover to whom they have grown indifferent. When to that indifference is added the power of the spell wielded by the Other Man, this rigidity is intensified. The Captain was tall, bronzed, athletic, handsome—all, in fact, that the late Arthur Herrick had not been. Miss Darrow had found him strangely fascinating. Now that young Herrick was dead she felt saddened, perplexed. Remorseful also? Possibly.

Nowhere in all this world is the sky so blue as at Dharjeeling. It is a pale, turquoise blue—a burnt-out blue, for the sun is fierce enough there to burn red-hot iron white. Miss Darrow's eyes were strong, as well as very large and very black, and the brilliant blue of the sky this morning failed to cause her so much as a blink. She was sitting in the indifferent shade of a scraggly tree in the gorgeous garden of the most gorgeous hotel in the land. She was dressed in white, and was good to look at. All girls with royal black eyes who dress in white are beautiful, at least in northern India.

It was the hour for morning parade, and the hotel piazzas were free of military gentlemen with glove-fitting uniforms and glittering swords. There were women up there, plenty of them—some quite as beautiful as she—but in these Miss Darrow was not in the least interested.

High overhead a great buzzard balanced himself, motionless, except for the occasional jerky tilting of his wings. Near by a fountain plashed monotonously—drip, drip, drip.

It was in these very gardens, then flooded, most romantically and most beautifully, with moonlight, that Miss Darrow had last seen Arthur Herrick, to whom she had been engaged for three years.

There had been a dance at the hotel—your army-loving girl will dance at any hour and in any temperature, however hideous—and Miss Darrow even now could remember the white imperial silver of the moon flooding the palm trees, and the wailing of the violins from within, as she walked in these gardens with the fiancé she had decided should never be her husband. The laughter of young newly-arrived officers, feverish with the rapture of their first campaign could be heard from the piazzas as the little life tragedy was played, out here on the grass beside the fretfully-splashing fountain. The conversation was not difficult to remember; every phrase was simplicity itself.

"Your decision is quite irrevocable."

"Quite."

"You have decided you will not marry me. It would at least be courteous in you to tell me why."

"It is a woman's privilege to change her mind. I choose to exercise it."

"I have been very faithful to you—Elizabeth."

"Yes." The insolence of the monosyllable was merciless and infinite.

"I have the right to demand a better reason."

"I have a better reason."

"And it is——"

"All the men I know are brave. They are thinking of sterner things than marriage. They have entered the army. You have not. Arthur, I will not marry a coward."

She had watched him walk away proudly, and in silence. The moonlight accentuated the pallor of his face, but his civilian's evening dress became him. She had had no chance to regret her severity, for the next dance was Captain Hough's, and his footsteps fell heavily on the walk as he came to claim it.

And now the young man was dead. If her conduct had occasioned him suffering, it was ended now—and she was tolerably sure that he had suffered—else his lips would hardly have grown so white. Still, she did not regret, even now. She was a soldier's grand-daughter, and her conscience told her that she had done rightly. She rather harboured toward the young man a certain feeling of resentment. He had chosen an inopportune time to die.

She reclined in the garden chair with her eyes half shut, her attitude one of utter grace. Above, the buzzard still circled and sailed in the heat-waves, and near by the fountain went drip, drip, drip.

Captain Clayton Hough was coming slowly up the walk. The Captain's regular army training was evidenced by his masterful tread, the superb rigidity of his figure and the piercing glance of his eye. It was a bright blue eye, kindly and gentle in expression ordinarily, but capable of emitting sparks in a fight. As it rested on Miss Darrow, the kindness was unmistakable.

From beneath drooping and delicately-veined lids, the young lady in white watched him approach. She had only known the Captain since the arrival of his regiment two weeks before, but as he came near, her full lips parted slightly, and the bodice of the white dress rose and fell. Had it lain within the power of the late Arthur Herrick to awaken such manifestations, the condemnation of his cowardice might have been less harshly expressed.

The Captain was as shy as he was big. Red as his face was with the exercion of drill and with the heat, it reddened still more fiercely as he diffidently saluted the white figure and subsided into a very uncomfortable three-cornered rustic seat, opposite. Miss Darrow smiled upon him with exceeding sweetness, as she remarked placidly: "Another boiling day, Captain."

"Yes," acquiesced the Captain, stabbing at the grass with his sheathed sword. He was studying the artistic little tendrils of brown hair at the base of the lady's neck, and wondering how any human being could look so exasperatingly cool on such a day.

"It is a shame," she averred sympathetically, "to make you parade on such a day."

Digitized by Google

"It will be hotter," said the Captain simply, "in Poongar."

Miss Darrow shot an oblique glance at the soldier from beneath the veiled lids. The softness of his voice indicated the gentleman—the flashing of his eye, the soldier. The very ideal, this, of a man.

So regarding him, Miss Elizabeth Darrow knew why she had been merciless to Arthur Herrick.

On the lawns officers in mufti and women in light frocks were beginning to move about languidly. The prospect of an interruption to their tête-à-tête did not suit Miss Darrow. The Captain's eye had flashed adoration as well as patriotism as it had rested upon her. She had realised vaguely in the last twenty-four hours that she was approaching the passion of her life. The cowardice of her fiancé had afforded her excuse for giving it rein. The experience of the last three minutes had convinced her of the sweetness of its possible reward. And the orders to leave for the front might come at any hour!

The Captain was still stabbing at the turf with his scabbard. "I feel wretchedly blue," he confessed suddenly.

"Oh," cooed the lady, wreathing the back of her head with a perfect forearm, "why, I wonder?"

"I was with that young chap Herrick last night, when he died. He and I were together at Winchester. You knew him, did you not?"

Miss Darrow turned a shade whiter. "Er—slightly," she murmured. He did not know, then. She felt immeasurably relieved.

"I don't know when I've been so broken up," went on the soldier, rather shamefacedly, "he was half delirious, you know, but rational enough at times to make out a pretty clear story. And it's the saddest I ever listened to."

"Tell me about it," urged the young woman bravely. She wished to learn how much he knew. Was it possible Arthur had betrayed her?

"There wasn't much of it," admitted the Captain clumsily. "He'd been engaged for three years, it appears, to a girl he loved very dearly. He worshipped her, he idolised her—you ought to have heard the poor chap rave! And he would not tell her of his condition because he feared it would cause her suffering."

"Of his condition," echoed Miss Darrow faintly, "what condition?"

"He'd been suffering for a year with the complaint that carried him off—some sort of heart trouble, you know—and the doctors gave him hope that he would get over it. Then it seems the girl threw him over, squarely and flatly, because he didn't enter the army. She taxed him to his face with cowardice. That broke his heart."

The listener's face was very pale, indeed, now. "Go on," she requested, with praiseworthy calmness.

"And the pathetic part of it is," concluded the Captain, with a final, vindictive stab at the turf, "that the boy was as brave as a lion in spirit, though physically as weak as a cat. He had applied for enlistment in eight regiments, and had been rejected by the examining surgeons in every case. The last words he said to me were: 'I was afraid to tell her the truth, Hough. I didn't want her to know what a wreck I was. But I should die happier if I thought some day she'd know I wasn't a coward.'"

As he finished his recital, the Captain arose and shook himself like a large dog. He had never looked handsomer or more desirable in his life.

Miss Darrow stood up and faced him timidly. "It is very sad," she said softly. "What do you think of it all, Captain Hough?"

The Captain bowed gallantly and answered with great gentleness: "I am so nearly in love myself that my sympathies are all with the young man. If I had that girl before me I think I should be tempted to wring her beautiful neck."

The soldier had lost his diffidence, and was staring boldly into his companion's velvety eyes.

Miss Darrow was both courageous and impulsive. There came upon her now the impulse to be honest. Perhaps it was the plucky gambler's impulse—added to the knowledge that discovery, in any event, must come sooner or later—that prompted her now to declare calmly:

"Captain Hough, I was the girl."

The Captain drew back a pace and paled a trifle through his bronze. He looked first incredulous, then indignant. Watching his expression, the lady felt her hopes slowly congealing in her breast. As they stood there together, uncertainly, beneath the scraggly palm tree, there came suddenly from the interior of the hotel a hurricane of cheers, followed by a prodigious scampering along the piazzas, and a waving of flags from all the windows.

The Captain drew himself erect, clicked his heels together and gave a military salute.

"As I live, Miss Darrow," he said, in tones of relief, "the order has come to move to the front.'

He turned and strode up the pathway.

Miss Darrow stood beneath the scraggly palm for some time—meditating. Overhead, the great buzzard still sailed, and the fountain chanted its monotonous—drip, drip, drip.

ARCHIE BALDE.

ONE OF TWO THINGS MUST HAPPEN.

Either you do get the Double Summer Number of Pearson's Weekly on Friday, July 29th, or you don't. If you don't, that, we may safely say, will be your loss; if you do, you will hold in your hand the most scrumptious twopennyworth this world has ever seen.

Two of the special features are: A fifteen-thousand-words story, entitled:

"HELLVILLE, U.S.A." By George Griffith, and a Prize Competition run on absolutely fresh lines.

The Editor has selected ten names from the London and Provincial directories all over the Kingdom, and has addressed ten envelopes to these people. In each envelope is a £5 note. On receiving an application from the ten persons, the envelopes will be stamped and posted.

It does not necessarily follow that the persons selected are readers of Pearson's Weekly. One of them may be yourself. Anyway, get a copy of and see the conditions for addressing your post-card, as no application will be considered unless made in proper fashion.

This is the biggest prize scheme devised for a long time, and as it costs you but a halfpenny postcard, you should go in for it at once.

A FORCED LOAN.

Two of the best friends that were ever on earth were Fred Bentley and Tom Stockton. They had been chums at school, the same at college, and partners in business on their first entry into the outside world.

The singular unanimity of their tastes had also prompted them to fall in love with the same girl, and, strange to say, their friendship for each other proved too strong even for the green-eyed monster, and the only quarrel which they ever had over the girl was which of them should have her, or, to put it more correctly, which should have the privilege of sacrificing his love on the altar of Friendship, and retiring in favour of his friend.

Under such circumstances it was, of course, only to be expected that a third party should step in and decide the difficulty for them by stealing away the young lady's affections while they were disputing about her.

This duly happened, and the only reproaches that passed between the two friends were based upon their mutual obstinacy in insisting each upon giving her up to the other. If this had not been the case one of them might have married her and invited the other to dinner, and so all three might have lived happily ever afterwards.

As a matter of fact, however, it was a very good thing for the young lady that she married neither of them, for, although they were both excellent fellows in their way, their business capacity was of the smallest, and the few hundreds that they started on in business as joint proprietors of a society paper rapidly melted away, and before a year was out they found themselves unable to meet their printing and paper bills, and the journal, of which such great things were hoped at its birth, died quietly and ingloriously before the first anniversary of its birthday came round.

After this they went into journalism as journeymen scribes, and in the pursuance of their avocation were brought into contact with the theatrical profession to a considerable extent. Then a maternal aunt of Stockton's died and left him a few more hundreds, which he, of course, paid into the firm's common fund, replying to his friend's protest by telling him that he would have done just the same thing, and the firm, being thus rehabilitated, proceeded to get rid of their second capital by taking a select theatrical company on tour with a play of which they were the joint authors.

It would be almost superfluous to state that this venture ended even more disastrously than the first.

They struggled along for a few months, unlike some managers who take companies on tour, paying the salaries as long as the treasury held out, and at last found themselves stranded in a provincial town in the far north, whence, after selling the properties at a ruinous sacrifice, they were just able to pay their fares back to London, and live meagrely for a few weeks while they were looking for something to turn up.

The something did not turn up. As usual in such cases, they found it a great deal easier to get out of collar than to get into it again, and at last they found themselves practically penniless, a fortnight behind in the rent of the single room that they shared, and quite naturally, on the verge of desperation.

Now, although, as I have said, they were good fellows as the world goes, and though they had started out in life with an average stock of moral principles, I regret to say that rubbing shoulders with adversity had not had that purifying effect upon them which one reads about in story-books appointed for Sunday afternoon perusal.

On the contrary. In their brief but intimate experience of the world they had seen that where money and personal convenience were concerned, the majority of men were honest only as far as the fear of the policeman obliged them to keep straight. Now that they were face to face with poverty in its most unpleasant, that is to say its genteel form, they neither of them felt that they would kick at any considerations of abstract morality to get out of such a desperately unpleasant position.

At length a crisis came. About eleven one night—the eve, in fact, of the rent-day which would see them turned into the street—they met in their room after several hours of the weary tramping about in the unsuccessful search for employment to which they had become so miserably well accustomed. Bentley was gloomy and taciturn with settled despair; Stockton was excited, restless, almost feverish, and looked as though he had something serious upon his mind.

Bentley noticed this, and said to his friend, after waiting in vain for him to speak:

"Well, old man, what's the matter? You look rather queer. You've not been drinking, I suppose, for it would hardly run to a drunk unless you've had a good deal better luck than I have."

"Luck!" said Stockton, pulling a chair up to the other side of the little table at which Bentley was sitting. "I don't know whether you'll call it luck or something else, but you've got to know the facts, and if I can't trust you I don't suppose it's any use trusting myself."

"Look here, now," he continued, putting his elbows on the table and staring straight across into his friend's eyes, "when I started out this morning on this everlasting ghastly search for honest work that's not to be found, I went with my mind made up to end this horrible state of affairs one way or the other. I resolved either to get hold of some money, honestly if I could, but anyhow to get hold of it before twelve o'clock to-night, or else to go out of the world for good over one of the bridges.

"Well, I wandered about all day with nothing to eat, and, of course, without any success, until at last I got so hungry that I actually offered to carry a hand-bag for a middle-aged lady, apparently very much from the country, who happened to ask me the way to London Bridge Station. She looked a bit surprised when I told her point blank that I'd be glad of the job of carrying the thing, but she gave it me willingly enough, for it was fairly heavy, and she was hot and tired, and when we got to the station she gave me a shilling.

"At first I thought I'd go and get something to eat, but meanwhile this wretched tooth of mine had begun to ache furiously, and put all thoughts of eating out of my head. I'd been headachy and neuralgic all day with fatigue and want of food, and when the tooth started it drove me pretty nearly out of my mind.

"I went into a chemist's and got an ounce of laudanum and some cotton-wool. Then to a public, got threepennyworth of brandy, put twenty or thirty drops of the laudanum into it, and drank it straight off. In five minutes I was a new man; pain, hunger, and all vanished like magic. I got a pennyworth of tobacco at the bar, sat down, and enjoyed a thorough good smoke.

"It was rather a low sort of public down Southwark way, and, while I was sitting smoking and thinking, I heard a conversation going on in the next compartment which very soon convinced me that a couple of sharps had evidently got hold of a greenhorn, and were trying to work the confidence trick on him. Of course, I pricked up my ears at once, and listened all I could.

"The voice of one of the men seemed familiar to me, and I soon identified it as that of a fellow who had got six months for pocket-picking in a case which I wrote up for the Comet, when you and I were doing lineage before that last spec. of ours in the provinces.

"Just as the worthies were getting the greenhorn up to the scratch, I pushed the door of the compartment open, went in, accosted this fellow by name, and told him that the game was up.

"They looked ugly, and they talked ugly, but they found it convenient to clear out, and so they did, leaving me alone with Mr. Greenhorn. He was a young fellow of five-and-twenty or so, with less horse-sense than a fourth standard Board-school boy, and when I explained the swindle to him he became very grateful and very communicative. Of course he insisted on standing drinks, and wouldn't hear of my paying for any, which was convenient in the state of my finances.

"He had had a good deal to drink already, and he had a good deal more with me, and by the time I got him out of the place he was pretty well drunk. Outside he was fool enough to tell me that I'd saved him a loss of at least £50. It seems that he had just come into a small legacy, and had drawn £50 of it in gold on the lawyers' cheque. The money was in two little bank bags containing £25 each, and here they are."

As he said this, Stockton put his hand into his trousers pocket, pulled out the two bags, and let them drop on the table with a dull but musical clink.

"Good Heavens, Stockton!" exclaimed Bentley jumping up from his chair. "You don't mean to say that you robbed the man?"

"Yes, you can call it that if you like. Now don't get excited; sit down and I'll tell you how I did it, and then you can go and tell the police if you like."

"I'll not do that anyhow, old man, so go on," said Bentley mechanically sitting down again. And then Stockton continued:

"When the idiot showed me these two bags I remembered my resolve, and in them I saw rescue and, perhaps, another chance in life. The liquor that I consumed had not made me drunk, for the laudanum stopped that, but it had got away with any scruples that I might have had left, and I made up my mind to have those bags at any price. To make matters worse he took out a sovereign and insisted on my accepting it. I took it, and then suggested that we should have just one more drink and say good-night.

"I found another shady-looking public and took him in. I sat him down in a corner of the coffee-room in which there didn't happen to be anybody else, and fetched a couple of glasses of hot brandy-and-water from the bar. He was half asleep, and I managed, without him seeing me, to slip a good stiff dose of the laudanum that I had left into one of them.

"He drank it down at a gulp, and then I roused him up and got him out, and steered him up towards the river. Just as he was getting helplessly stupified I got him into a deserted by-street leading to a wharf, and half filled with carts, laid by for the night. He wanted to sit down here, and I let him; in fact, I stowed him away in one of the carts, took his two bags of gold, and left him to sleep it off at his leisure.

"That happened about an hour ago; he won't be found until the morning, and by that time I mean to be in Liverpool, that is, if you don't mean to give me up on my own confession."

"I told you before I'm not going to do that. What's done's done, and there's an end of it. You get out of the way as soon as you can, and never fear any danger from me. I daresay I should have done the same myself if I had been in your place, after all; I'm just as sick of this infernal poverty and starvation as you are."

"That's like business," replied Stockton, tossing a bag across the table. "Now, you take that, and I'll take this, and we will say good-bye till better times come."

Bentley made some show of protest; but the temptation of the gold was too strong, and he took it. Then without more ado the two friends shook hands, Stockton packed his few remaining effects into a shabby portmanteau, ran down into the street, called a cab, and drove to Euston. He just caught the midnight express, and by noon the next day he was on board a liner bound for New York.

* * * * *

Five years passed, and the two friends heard nothing of each other. Bentley found that the wheel of fortune had taken its lowest turn, for a few days later he got work on one of the dailies in place of an acquaintance who was taken ill. The man died and the post became a permanent one.

Taught prudence at last by adversity he stuck to his work, won promotion, and found himself in possession of a decent income. As he never heard anything of Stockton he concluded that luck had not changed for the better for him, and that he had probably sunk out of sight in the undercurrents of New York life.

This, however, was by no means the case. Luck had turned for Stockton as well. On the passage out he made the acquaintance of an Australian gold-digger who was going out to try his luck in California. The two struck up a friendship, and the Australian advanced Stockton enough money to enable him to cross the continent and get a miner's outfit.

Then the two went into partnership, and after a couple of years of hard and fairly successful work they had a lucky hit and struck a rich vein that yielded them a couple of thousand apiece before it gave out.

With this capital they went to work on a more extended scale, and in three years more they sold out for £50,000 apiece and dissolved partnership, Stockton refusing all his partner's entreaties to go with him back to Australia and try his luck again there.

The fact of it was that Stockton had made up his mind to go back to England, and if possible find out the man from whom he had taken the £50 that had formed the foundation of his fortune, and secretly repay him with handsome interest, which, of course, was a sufficiently honourable resolve under the peculiar circumstances.

Arrived in England, he found himself in a very different position to that in which he was when he left. Then he had wanted money so badly that he stooped to crime to get it; now he had plenty of money and didn't know what to do with it.

His spendthrift habits had vanished during his spell of hard work, and he was a cool, hard-headed, thrifty man of business, not content with the income that his £50,000 would yield him at interest, and therefore determined to go to work with it, and double, or treble, or quadruple it as speedily as the Fates would allow him.

Of course he looked out for Bentley as soon as he got back, but he absolutely failed to find any trace of him. The reason for this was chiefly that Bentley, detesting his old name and its sombre associations, had dropped it as soon as he found himself on the road to respectability again, giving as an excuse to the few who knew him that he had come into a little property, to which was attached the condition that he should take the name of the imaginary uncle from whom he had inherited it.

After he had been casting about for a month or two for some means of employing his money, Stockton made the acquaintance of a gentleman who was running a small but fairly prosperous bucket-shop. He had experience, but wanted capital. Stockton had money and some knowledge of the mysteries of stock and share dealing, which he had picked up in America.

An examination of the business satisfied him that it was a money-making concern, and only needed a few thousands spent in profuse advertising and handsome offices to make a big concern of it: and so it came to pass that he became a partner, disguising his identity under the style of Swappem and Co.

The business flourished apace, for it was profusely advertised, and many fish came into the alluring net that was spread in the columns of the most respectable newspapers of the day.

That was the time when financial journalism was beginning to be a specific enterprise, and one day there came to the office of Swappem and Co., the advertising manager of a newly-founded paper, entitled The Pactolian: A Weekly Journal of Politics and Finance. After some little difficulty an advertisement order was obtained—half a page, at the very moderate price of £10 per insertion.

Before the contract had expired The Pactolian made a very lucky shot in financial prophesy, by which, as it happened, Swappem and Co. profited very considerably. The order was increased to a page at £30, with a laudatory article thrown in. Then came two or three more lucky shots, and the circulation of The Pactolian went up, to use the current phrase, "by leaps and bounds."

Instead of soliciting advertisement orders it was soon in a position to select them, and, of course, the prices went up accordingly. Swappem and Co. stood the rise for their page until it reached £100 a week, and then they kicked.

There was a dispute over the contract to begin with. Swappem and Co. claimed the space for three months, while The Pactolian people insisted that the order was terminable in a month. Of course there was a law-suit, and The Pactolian won. Swappem and Co. paid up, and the advertisement was taken out. Then one or two other firms in the same line took theirs out, and finally a new financial paper was started by a syndicate in which Swappem and Co. had a considerable interest.

After this it was war to the knife. The Pactolian suddenly became intensely curious as to the identity and antecedents of Swappem and Co. Stockton had kept himself carefully behind the scenes while his partner, whose real name was Mr. Emanuel Moss, ran the business in the name of the firm.

Unhappily, this gentleman had been engaged in one or two doubtful transactions a year or two before he had started the business in which Stockton had become a partner, and these The Pactolian managed by some means to ferret out. A week later it came out with a scathing article, casting the most serious reflections upon the commercial reputation of Swappem and Co.

So serious indeed were they that there was nothing for it but an action for libel to clear the reputation of the firm by proving that the matters alluded to by The Pactolian had not the slightest connection with it as Swappem and Co., and that its hands were as clean as the nature of its business permitted it to be—that is to say, as clean as those of any other highly respectable firm in the same line.

It was a battle of money against money. Both sides had plenty, eminent counsel, silks and juniors were engaged to do battle for the veracity and public spirit of the defendants and the reputation and bona fides of the plaintiffs. Several weeks were occupied in the usual interlocutory proceedings which are so deftly contrived to swell the expenses of a law-suit, and at last the day of trial arrived.

It had been decided by the legal wisdom enlisted on their side that, for the purposes of the lawsuit, Swappem and Co. should be represented in court by Mr. Stockton, whose financial record was absolutely irreproachable, and that Mr. Emanuel Moss should be considered merely as the manager employed by him, the capitalist who had found the money to develop the business.

It was in accordance with this astute arrangement that Stockton found himself seated in the well of Court No. 3 of the Queen's Bench Division on the morning of the trial beside his solicitor, listening to the eloquent opening speech of Mr. Jiggers, Q.C., his leading counsel. The speech was not over when the Court rose for luncheon, and as he got up from his seat to go out, Stockton took a look round the crowded court, and to his horror, saw his old friend Bentley on the opposite side engaged in earnest conversation with the solicitor for the defence. He recovered himself in a moment sufficiently to ask his own solicitor:

"Who is the man talking to the solicitor on the other side?"

"That? Oh, don't you know him. That's Mr. Frederick Matthews, the editor of The Pactolian, the man who wrote the article containing the libels. He's here to give evidence in justification."

The strange name puzzled Stockton not a little, but there was no doubt in his mind as to the identity of the man who bore it. Like a flash it crossed his mind that this man could give him penal servitude if he liked.

True, in the old days he had promised never to open his mouth on the subject of that dark deed in the bye-street in Southwark; but five years had gone by since then, and men change with time. What reason, therefore, had he for believing that Bentley, or Matthews, would now keep the promise that he had made under such very different circumstances?

He slipped out of court by the other door and went out into the Strand to think the situation over. He had grown a beard and had otherwise considerably altered in personal appearance, but when he was put into the witness-box, as he would be that afternoon, with all eyes upon him, Bentley's included, the dangers of recognition would still be very great. He turned the problem over and over again in his mind, and at last determined to take the bull by the horns. If his former chum meant mischief it would be bound to come sooner or later, and it might as well come sooner.

Thus thinking, he retreated his steps and turned into the Law Courts again. In the entrance hall who should he meet but Bentley, face to face. Acting on the impulse of the moment, he went up to him, held out his hand, and said:

"Well, Bentley, old man, and so we are to meet as enemies after all these years. How did you come to change your name?"

Bentley stared blankly at him for a few seconds, and then a smile of recognition broke over his face as he clasped Stockton's hand heartily and said:

"Why, Stockton, you don't mean to say it's you! So you're Swappem and Co.—are you?—and I'm the editor of The Pactolian. Well, I'll be hanged! Come and crack a bottle with me, old man, before the fight begins again."

They adjourned to an adjoining restaurant and cracked a bottle, but the fight did not begin again. When Mr. Jiggers rose after luncheon, it was to ask for an adjournment pending a proposed settlement between the parties. Of course, the adjournment was granted, and the case was settled out of court.

That night the head of the firm of Swappem and Co. dined tête-à-tête with the editor and proprietor of The Pactolian, and, as a result of certain information conveyed by the latter to the former, a certain Mr. Alfred Johnson, of Wickham Market, Suffolk, received on the day but one following, to his intense astonishment, a registered envelope containing five £100 notes, round which was wrapped a half sheet of note-paper on which was typewritten the single line:

"In grateful repayment of a forced loan."

A PRIZE OF £10 OFFERED.

P.W. offers the substantial prize of £10 to the inventor of what we consider to be, after a fair trial, the best all-round, inexpensive pipe.

We shall not undertake to put the winning pipe upon the market or to finance it in any way.

All models must reach this office, together with clear instructions as to the method of using, not later than Tuesday, August 2nd.

If sufficient postage accompanies each attempt, the models will be returned at the discretion of the editor who, however, does not hold himself responsible for loss or damage.

What do Dreams Mean?

We recently made the acquaintance of a lady who has made the laws of Oneirology a life study, and her explanations we have found to be singularly true in cases upon which we have consulted her. She has the reputation of being the most expert person in the world in this science. Accordingly we have made arrangements with her to give the fullest information to any reader of this paper who cares to send asking her advice. Readers should be very careful to explain in the fullest manner the whole extent of their dream. MADAME GEORGES will reply, giving a full explanation.

Readers should address their letters to "DREAMS," Short Stories Offices, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C., and inclose six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope for reply.

The Marble Statue.

Science had been the sustenance of his early years; and so well had he thrived on it, and so completely had it become absorbed into his system, that by the time he reached man's estate it was not only a part of his life—it was all of it. His wife, his home, his child, were mere incidents, and entirely subservient.

It was characteristic of the Professor that if he took up a subject, he became absolutely engrossed in it. He was not one to study superficially. So, when hypnotism attracted his attention, he not only devoured all obtainable lore upon the subject, but he went to India and to Egypt, and delved to the uttermost depths of its mysteries.

About the time he completed his investigations in the Orient, his unassuming little wife passed quietly into a state of higher intelligence than even her scientific spouse had attained—that is, she died. Her legacy to the Professor was Winifred, dearly beloved and only child.

In his lucid intervals the Professor loved his daughter to the verge of adoration; in his scientific moments she was something not quite so dear as his books, his antiquities, and his instruments. Still, even then, Winifred was a useful adjunct, and thus escaped being an encumbrance.

She tried hard to be a companion to him, to be interested in the dry tomes over which he was for ever poring; she endeavoured to store her mind with their abstruse contents that she might discourse intelligently in their evenings together; and if her success as a scientific conversationalist was not remarkable, at least she was a good listener.

She would sit at his feet, to all appearances in rapt attention; but whether or not the thoughts behind that earnest, interested expression were always exactly relevant, is a question between Winifred's conscience and herself. Sometimes it would occur to the learned man that he was taking that feminine mind far beyond its depth; and he would pause and sigh. He often told her she had no potentiality for great things. He would say, and shake his head dolefully:

"I suppose you are a beautiful woman, Winifred; but what has beauty ever done to solve the great problems of the world, and the mystery of life? I would much rather you had been gifted with a high order of intelligence."

It was shortly after they had settled down together that the masterpiece was conceived and executed. It had been formulating in his mind for months, and his laboratory had been the scene of extensive experiments. At last, one evening, the preparations were completed, and all was in readiness for the final test.

He waited until the servants had retired, then called his daughter; and when she had entered the room wondering, he carefully closed and locked the door.

"My daughter," he began solemnly, "I am on the eve of a great discovery—the greatest discovery of all the ages. Its full scope is incomprehensible, its possibilities are unbounded. It will seem a miracle to you when I tell you it means the perpetuation of life, the annihilation of death. Now the time has come when I must weigh my belief in the balance of practical experiment, and in this I need your assistance."

Winifred assured him she was only too glad to be of any use.

"Listen carefully, then. I want to hypnotise you into a state of syncope, in which case your muscles will be dormant but your senses alert. The vital forces, while retaining their full vitality, will suspend activity during the period for which I hold you under the influence, and you will remain in any fixed position until I remove the influence.

"Do you see the possibilities? Its usefulness is manifold. If a man became mentally depressed, for instance, instead of committing suicide he would simply put himself away for a time until matters brightened. Then look at it from a standpoint of domestic economy; when a man is out of work and cannot provide for his family, he will 'put them away' till business revives. It can also be used for recuperation, and thus save millions of money in summer resort bills. Its uses are infinite."

"Wonderful!" exclaimed his listener.

"But," continued the Professor, "that is only one step of my discovery. The second is what I may call its artistic development. You can, of course, understand that unless places were especially provided for these dormant bodies, it might be somewhat gruesome to have them about the house. So I have thought of making them artistic, of posing them as statuary; and to that end I have invented a marble enamel, in which the body, after being hypnotised, is submerged. The enamel hardens in a few hours, and the person is encased, to all appearance, in a coating of the finest Carrara marble."

"A living statue!" cried Winifred, clasping her hands. "What a glorious idea!"

"Yes," he went on, pleased at her enthusiasm, "and now the question is, have you the courage to undertake your part for the cause of science, and be 'put away' until to-morrow, say, when I will bring you back to life?"

"I will get ready at once," cried the girl, jumping up with alacrity. "I have a Grecian costume that I used once in tableaux vivants at college when I posed as the blind girl. I am not in the least afraid, but I would like to know how I look when I am hypnotised and marbleised. Will you take a photograph of me, so that I may see myself afterwards?"

He said he would, called her a brave girl, and watched her with loving eyes as she tripped from the room.

* * * * *

The Professor stood trembling with excitement before his masterpiece. Success, perfect and complete, had rewarded his efforts. The silence of midnight was over the outside world, and within the laboratory his own heavy breathing was the only sound. He stood before his statue panting with the exhilaration of his joy.

If art had carved that statue, with what strides would its creator have ascended to the pinnacle of fame! He was overcome, and with his face in his shaking hands murmured brokenly:

"I am frightened at my success, Winifred. My brain is in a whirl. Perhaps you are but a phantasm, after all." He rose and walked about the room, and finally sank upon a couch in a distant corner.

"I will lie here and watch till morning," he thought; "then I will waken her."

But his nerves were under too high tension to be quieted. He tossed from side to side. He grew feverish.

"I will take a sedative," he said at last. "This excitability is unlike me; I cannot stand it."

Ten minutes later the Professor was stretched upon his back; the sedative had responded quickly—the Professor was asleep. And the statue stood guard with outstretched hand, while the small hours grew larger and the quiet in the street grew more intense.

Did she hear stealthy footsteps outside the door? Did she feel its cautious opening? Did she see an evil face appear at the aperture? No, she was blind, she could not see.

"Hist! Bill," said a voice, "look alive now. Take whatever ye can get ahold of in a hurry. Oh! That statue made me jump. We'll take it along; it looks valible. Lively, now! Look out ye don't break it,—won't be no good if ye do. Go easy; don't wake the old duffer."

* * * * *

The apartment was luxurious, and its owner, stretched at ease to the full of his six-foot length among multi-coloured pillows, was pleasing to look upon. He was one who could take his ease gracefully; indolence was a part of his inheritance.

In straight line with the direction of his vision, in a niche, between parted curtains, bathed in prismatic colours from the cut-glass globe of an incandescent lamp, stood a life-sized marble figure of a Greek girl, with outstretched hand and tender, drooping eyelids.

The man among the pillows looked at the figure before him. It had been there only a few days, but he had got into the habit of talking to it as he smoked his pipe after dinner.

"Ah, Nydia," he said softly, "I believe I would have given all my fortune, if the villain had asked it, to possess you. How you got into that wretched little curiosity shop I don't know. I don't want to know. I asked him no questions. I paid what he wanted, and had you brought here at once before anyone could claim you; and now I wonder how I lived without you so long.

"I will not think of you as marble. I know there is a soul within that stone. I know it because I feel it. It draws me to you. It is like the magnetism of a living person.

"I don't understand it, but it is so. And now, you shall be my confidante. I am lonely; there is no living soul to whom I would tell my thoughts, but I will to you.

"I will tell you first, little blind girl, that I am not happy. I ought to be? Yes, I suppose so. I am a strong able-bodied fellow with a good digestion, no nerves, and plenty of money.

"I think I might be happy if I were not so useless—so superfluous. I am tired of doing things for myself. What does it amount to? No one else is pleased because I happen to be. Life is nothing without incentive, Nydia, I am convinced of it.

"I will draw your curtain now, for I am due at a great lady's. We will talk again to-morrow."

* * * * * *

"I am going to hold your hand, Nydia, while I talk. I am glad it is marble; you would not let me if it were not. When I hold it close for a few minutes it grows warm; I feel it throb. Don't tell me it is the throb of my own veins; I know better. I will warm you into life yet, you will see.

"I am going to tell you about Maisie to-night. I am thinking of marrying Maisie. Do you know, little girl, I am getting so maudlin about you that I actually imagined I saw your eyelids quiver when I said that. Oh, about Maisie! She is a charming girl—everyone says so—and we are very companionable; no doubt we should be the most congenial of couples. I have not asked her yet. I never seem to be in the mood, somehow—the proper degree of warmth seems to be lacking; but I shall, for I despair of ever having the proper degree of warmth for anyone, and I want to belong to someone and I want someone to belong to me.

"I am out of sorts to-night. You irritate me, Nydia. You are tantalising. I know quite well that you are only cold, hard stone; yet as I sit here and look at you I can hardly master the longing to take you in my arms. I would start out and hunt for the model who posed for you, but I know I should never find her. Your face haunts me continually. I am losing interest in everything else in the world. Some day you will tantalise me beyond endurance and I shall arise and crush you into dust—marble dust—and then I will sweep you up in a dust-pan and throw you out, and perhaps then I shall have peace.

"I have decided to speak to Maisie to-morrow. I must settle this; my mind is losing its balance. I can fancy myself in a padded cell, and those who come and look at me through the grating will say: 'Poor fellow, he loved a marble statue.' Nydia, Nydia, what is your power? I never thought my reason was weak—there were never any unbalanced minds in our race."

He paused in his soliloquy, for there seemed to be a commotion in the hall outside his rooms, and footsteps rushing up the stairs in frantic haste. Suddenly the door was flung open, and a man, dishevelled and wild, rushed in. The intruder stopped and looked eagerly about.

"Thank Heaven!" he ejaculated.

Tears in a torrent poured from his eyes. He started in the direction of Nydia, but the tall, athletic young man stepped between them.

"Be careful, man," he said quietly.

"Stand aside; she is mine."

"She is mine; dare lay one profane finger upon her and I will not hesitate to strike you down in an instant."

"Yours! She is mine; my daughter. Fool! Imbecile! Stand aside, I say!"

The two men grappled. The Professor was something of an athlete himself. Their bodies swayed from right to left as each struggled for the advantage. Furniture fell, the glass globes rattled. Once the younger man was down, but recovered immediately, and with all the concentrated power of his sinewy muscles he grasped the other and threw him prostrate.

The Professor gasped for breath.

"Let me up," he roared, when he could speak.

"I'll let you up when I have you in a straight waistcoat."

The Professor groaned in anguish of spirit.

"Fool!" he muttered.

Then, with one desperate effort, he lifted himself on his elbow, turned his face to the statue, and shrieked:

"Winifred, I command you, AWAKEN!!!"

There was a cracking, as of glass or porcelain breaking. The young man turned and staggered back against the wall. His Nydia was emerging from her chrysalis.

The warm tints of flesh and blood supplanted the dead white of the marble surface as it fell away. She stepped down from her pedestal, gave her draperies a truly feminine shake, and fell into the arms of her father—who, in the excitement, had been permitted to regain his feet.

"My child, can you forgive me?" he cried.

She looked over his shoulder archly at the figure against the wall.

"Fully and freely, my dear papa, absolutely and irrevocably, now and for ever."

She took a step in the direction of the other, and held out timidly a little hand, to which still clung a fragment of the marble enamel—but he made no move to take it. He stood spellbound, and simply stared.

"I used to wonder what you looked like," she said wistfully.

Still he remained motionless.

"Then you did not mean it?"

She turned back toward her father. There was a little catch in her voice; it seemed to break the spell which held him. The blood rushed back to his face, the life came back to his eyes; he took a step and caught the floating drapery before it was quite out of reach.

"Only give me a lifetime to prove it," he said.

IN FRIENDLY CONVERSE.

Gardener. — Your raspberry canes should be placed in a rich and heavy soil, where no drought can reach them.

S. T.—Fusiliers were formerly soldiers armed with a lighter fusil or musket than the rest of the army, but at present all foot regiments carry the same pattern of rifle.

Holiday Maker asks: "Does the air at a seaside place contain salt?" ————Only when it is windy. The salt of sea-water cannot evaporate into the atmosphere, and it is only when the wind carries off salt spray held in suspension and derived from the wave crests that the air becomes impregnated.

W. A. L. wishes to know which is the largest fossil land animal of which we have any trace.————The Camarasaurus. (You had better practise a little before you attempt to pronounce it in public). The thigh bone of a specimen found about a year ago is six feet in length, and takes four men to lift it. The tail is about twenty-seven feet long and composed of gigantic vertebræ. It is estimated that this creature stood sixteen feet high.

S. I.—The general notion that Siberia is a deadly dull place—that there is no pleasure, no civilisation, nothing except a plentiful supply of misery—is erroneous. There are fashions and fashionable people in Siberia, and the traveller meets women as well dressed as in any European city.

Cautious wants to know if St. Paul's Cathedral is insured, and for what sum.————St. Paul's Cathedral is insured for about £95,000.

Canal.—The oldest British canal is the Foss Dyke, in Lincolnshire. This is admittedly of Roman origin. It has been deepened and widened on two occasions; its length is about eleven miles. There was another Roman canal—the Caer Dyke—in the same county, but only the name remains.

S. C. N. puts the following question: "Why does severe and continued pain cause thirst?"————Pain, especially when accompanied by shock, not only stops the secretion of saliva, but weakens the heart's action, and this assists in causing thirst. When recovering from a fainting fit, people generally complain of thirst. Loss of blood has a similar effect.

Sorrow.—The "sorrowful tree" is a singular plant, found on the Island of Goa, near Bombay. It flowers in the night only. At sunset there is not a flower to be seen, but within an hour the tree is full of them. As soon as the sun rises some fall off, and the others close up, and thus it goes on all the year round.

Cyclist.—You cannot do better than choose France for the tour you are meditating. The roads there are really excellent. The Government keeps up a perfect system of care and inspection, and wherever you go you will be sure to find the roads in excellent order. They are often bordered with trees for miles, and are in a perfect state for cycling.

Edel. — Yes, there is considerable danger of the extirpation of the much-prized Alpine plant, edelweiss, about which so much romance and poetry has been woven. Not only do tourists play havoc with it, but large quantities of roots are pulled up and exported. The Provincial Diets of Styria and Carniolia have passed laws forbidding the uprooting of the plant, the sale to tourists, and the exportation in large quantities by anyone.

S. S.—A lifeboat costs twenty-seven shillings a week to maintain.

C. K. J.—Perhaps the nearest approach to exact similarity between the dresses of both sexes is to be found among the Chunchas, who live in the Montana district of Peru. Men and women both wear a single garment similar to the poncha, which is a shawl with a slit in the middle. The only difference is not in the garment itself, but in the wearing of it. The men wear it with the slit from shoulder to shoulder, and the women with it the other way, down the breast and the back.

H. R. S. T. writes to ask if the state of the weather has any effect upon the number of crimes committed.————Undoubtedly it has. November is, on the whole, the busiest month, for not only are the plain clothes policemen near the bridges obliged to keep a sharper look-out for would-be suicides, but also the dark, murky days are a great assistance to housebreakers and pickpockets. As a rule the rainy weather protects the public, for very few burglaries take place on a soaking wet night.

T. E.—The horn of the male narwhal is a specially developed upper tooth; it is sometimes nine or ten feet long. The tooth on the opposite side of the head, in the male, is a rudimentary affair, about ten inches in length, which is embedded in the jaw.

Precious.—In ancient times Tyre was the market for precious stones; later, Alexandria, Rome, and Constantinople had their turn. Venice was the chief market for a time in the middle ages. Of recent times Amsterdam and Antwerp have been prime centres—especially for diamonds—but London and Paris have taken their places now. As to your inquiry, "Where do most of the precious stones go?" the answer is that somewhere between one-third and one-half of the total production of the world go to the United States.

W. W. asks if it is true that the Pope never preaches.————Quite. Only once during three hundred years has this rule been broken. This was when Pius IX. was Pope.

Myrtle wants to know what it costs to be presented to the Queen, and if there any privileges attached?———— To be presented at Buckingham Palace costs at least fifty pounds, and the return for the outlay is nothing more substantial than having one's name in print. It gives the presentee, whether male or female, no right to again appear at Court, and it does not entail a single invitation to a function of royal or even semi-royal state. There may be a certain amount of satisfaction in being able to say that one was presented at Court, but I fail to appreciate it.

P. P. asks: "Is any animal mute under normal circumstances?" ———— There are several examples among the mammalia. For instance, the giraffe, the armadillo, and the porcupine, are all unprovided with vocal cords, the whales can only produce a snorting sound.

Recruit is anxious to know whether it is more painful to die from a sword-thrust or a bullet wound.———— Although I cannot speak from experience, I am told the latter causes the greatest agony. This conclusion is arrived at from the fact that amongst the dead on the battlefield after an engagement, the expression on the faces of the men who have died from a sword thrust is generally of peaceful repose, while those who owe their death to a bullet wound show traces of agony and suffering.

BICYCLE PRIZES.

Ladies' or Gents' £23 A.B. Cycles.

WHAT TO DO.—Make up the best sentence you can of eighteen words. The first letter of each word commencing with a letter of "NOVEL ADVERTISEMENT," in any order. Thus: "*O*ur *V*aluable *L*ight *R*oadsters *E*arn *E*very *E*xcellent *T*estimonial *T*hat *N*umerous *D*elighted *V*otaries *S*end; *N*ot *M*entioning *I*ncreasing *E*arnest *A*dmirers." It will be seen that the initials of each word, when transposed, form the phrase "NOVEL ADVERTISEMENT." The above sentence is only given as an example of what we mean, and must not be sent in.

AN ABSOLUTELY FREE COMPETITION.

We ask you to buy nothing before allowing you to participate in the Prizes. Neither after you have won a prize (if you are fortunate enough to do so) do we compel you to purchase any accessories. You pay nothing to enter, and even if you receive one of our regret notices—and we make no secret of the fact that hundreds are unsuccessful—you are only out of pocket for the cost of two penny stamps, which the Post Office get the benefit of. Thus we can honestly and truthfully assert of this thoroughly genuine Competition that it is ABSOLUTELY FREE TO ALL.

Winners of prizes must clear them within a week or ten days, otherwise machines unclaimed will be passed on to the next in rotation. Prizes may be considerably increased in all or any one class. Unless stamp is enclosed for postage of Catalogue and Result of Competition, the Company will not guarantee to inform competitors of their success. Prize-winners need not purchase any accessories with their machines, unless they so desire. As the majority of competitors may not be able to call and inspect the machines, we guarantee to refund the full amount paid for a Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, or for a Consolation Prize (less carriage), if the owner is not perfectly satisfied with it on arrival. We cannot give any money or other prizes in lieu of cycles, and consequently cannot enter into any discussion relating thereto. We have no agents. All Machines Guaranteed for Twelve Months.

We offer this Reward to any lady or gentleman able to prove that we have ever in the whole course of our existence sold our cheapest machines under £15 cash either to an ordinary customer, agent, dealer or shipper. We do not allow a shilling extra discount beyond the 34 per cent. off the catalogue price. A machine possessing all those sterling qualities which make a really first-class machine of the highest grade cannot be purchased anywhere in the United Kingdom under £15 cash. Every experienced cyclist knows that.

BANK HOLIDAY NUMBER. "THE FINAL WAR" BEGINS

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 501. FOR WEEK ENDING AUGUST 6TH, 1898. [ONE PENNY.

SUMMER LANGUOR

In the warm summer weather, when appetite fails and languor and indolence creep over us, there is nothing more likely to destroy health and render the body liable to the attacks of disease, than the pernicious habit of taking into the system excessive food. Very great care, in fact, is needed to prevent this being done.

One source for the demand of food is the continual loss of heat to which the body is exposed by contact with the air and other surrounding objects. In summer the loss is greatly reduced.

People who will persist in devouring as much food as they do in the winter clog the system, and food which has been utilised by the tissues for the production of energy is cast back into the blood in a state of partial decomposition, and cannot be got rid of without overheating the body.

And yet, in face of these scientific facts, how many people sit down to breakfast and drink tea and coffee—an utterly unscientific practice in itself—and follow this up by partaking of a more or less quantity of flesh food?

Just think for a moment.

The injurious effects of frequent indulgence in tea are well known; and coffee, usually used as a means of keeping people awake, is commonly seen on the breakfast table at an hour when people certainly require no waking up! It is simply compelling the stomach to digest food which the system does not require, and which it cannot get rid of.

Drugs and medicines are worse than useless in such circumstances; they simply assist in the clogging process.

What is wanted is not so much food as nourishment, and a partially digested food beverage as Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa would, if universally used during the summer months, as its merits deserve, do much towards relieving the distress caused by carelessness in choice of food. It is at this season, too, that families on pleasure bent are more liable to overlook such facts as the above, with the result that what should have been a holiday and release from business worries is simply made an excuse for overfilling the body with unsuitable food, the severe effects of which make themselves felt at a time when health and vigour should, if the natural laws of health had been studied a little, have been firmly established. Every portmanteau and hamper should, therefore, contain a supply of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, it ought to be on every breakfast table.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, 6d., 9d., and 1s. 6d., can be obtained from all Chemists, Grocers, and Stores, or from 60, 61, and 62 Bunhill Row, London, E.C. As a test of its merit, a dainty sample tin of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa will be sent free on application to any address, if, when writing (a post-card will do), the reader will name Short Stories.

PETROLINE, the NEW HAIR PRESERVATIVE,

Promotes profuse Locks. Is directly uninjurious to the Hair, and its good qualities are particularly remarkable to all who use it. It is doubtlessly inirritative and perfectly indispensable to everybody. Is free from Odour, and invaluable for Dandruff, Scurff, etc.

THIS IS A GENUINE COMPETITION.

PERFECTLY FREE. NO ENTRANCE FEE.

What you have to do is, when you have found what you think are the missing letters, write the words out on a sheet of paper, numbering them 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, as above, and send same to us with a P.O. (not stamps) for 1s. 6d. and stamped addressed envelope for results, and we will forward to you post free a bottle of PETROLINE, the New Hair Preserver. (Foreign orders, 3s., payable in London.) We offer the above prizes to purchasers of our PETROLINE, in order to make this remarkable invention known to the public.

Remember, EACH ONE who correctly fills in the missing letters will receive a Beautiful Brand New £25 Gent's or £26 Lady's A.B. Cycle, fitted with the celebrated A.B. Unpuncturable Tyres. These machines are the very best sold by the A.B. Cycle Co. Ltd., of Birmingham and Coventry, and cannot be bought for less than £17 10s. and £18 cash respectively. All we ask you to do when you get the machine is that you pay the carriage on it. These elegant Cycles can be viewed at the Company's London Showrooms, 59 and 60 Chancery Lane W.C. As a guarantee, we have deposited a sum of £300 with the A.B. Cycle Co. Ltd., on account of the Cycles we anticipate giving away, and print below a copy of their receipt. We are quite prepared to spend several thousand pounds on this scheme, as we believe it will do more to advertise our new Hair Preservative PETROLINE than if we were to spend this amount in newspaper advertising.

Do not delay but send AT ONCE for a bottle of PETROLINE, and grasp this opportunity to win one of these beautiful Cycles. Write your name and full address very distinctly, and put the name of this paper on the top of your letter. Keep the number of your Postal Order in case it goes astray. This Competition will close on September 30th, 1898. Prizes will be awarded and results posted during the following week.

YOU CAN HAVE THE BICYCLE AT ONCE before the Competition closes; full particulars regarding this will be sent you when you receive the bottle of PETROLINE.

No. 501.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending August 6th, 1898.

UNTOLD TALES OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.

By H. HUNTER.

I.—THE BATTERED RUPEE.

"Deen! Deen! Allah, illa hu!"

The cry rose fierce and exultant. It came from the cavalry lines, whence also issued the sounds of jingling bridle, clashing sabre, and clinking spur.

The squadron of the Fifth Irregular Cavalry which had been stationed at Goojapore was riding off to join the mutineers at Delhi. Unlike their comrades in the infantry lines, they were going with clean hands. No murder had been done by the sowars. They had deserted their colours, but they had respected the lives of their officers.

Charlie Hammond jumped from his charpoy, and running to the window of the bungalow, peeped out between the slats of the double venetians.

The stars were still in the sky, but the dawn was fast coming. In a few minutes the sun would leap up flaming hot, from behind yonder wall of inky blackness, and the long Indian day would have begun. How many of the handful of Europeans, who, including the doctor and two civilians, numbered no more than ten, all told, would see the fiery orb go down at the end of it? Hammond hurried on some clothes and ran out.

"Deen, Deen!" shouted the troopers, as turning in their saddles to cheer, they swept past the sepoy cantonments at the gallop; while from two hundred yelling throats uprose the terrible war-cry of the Hindoo: "Jai! Jai! Kali mah!"

Three companies of the Thirty-first Native Infantry were quartered at Goojapore; and the 'slogan' of the Brahmin answered the watchword of the Mussulman.

Hammond had stumbled against something in the verandah—a bundle of shawls and muslins which lay close against the door. The bundle had risen up and caught him by the knees, while a girl's voice had whispered in tones that were shaking with terror:

"They are killing them, sahib! They are killing them down there—the four white sahibs of Oomree's regiment. They will come here next and kill you!"

At that moment, sharp and clear, came a sound which Hammond had heard too often not to recognise instantly. It was the "ping-ping" of a bullet. It came from the infantry lines. Before Lieutenant Hammond could realise what had happened, a dozen balls were cleaving the air, and a figure, bareheaded, and minus jacket or tunic was seen running through the shrubbery at the back of the compound.

"Wilson, sahib," said the girl, holding Hammond tightly by the arm.

Captain Wilson was the senior officer in command of the three sepoy companies stationed at Goojapore. He ran on towards the cavalry stables, where English voices could be heard calling one to another.

Suddenly a great blaze filled the sky. The air was rent with shouts, yells, and execrations. The cry of "Kali ki jai!" rose loud and triumphant, mingled with the noise of breaking glass and the sputter of fiendish laughter. The mutineers had fired the cantonments, and were looting the officers' quarters.

"Quick, sahib—quick!" said the girl, trying to pull Hammond along. "They're coming! This way, sahib, this way—quick! If the shameless ones see you, it will be too late!"

She muttered a few words under her breath. It was an invocation to Ram, most widely popular of the many incarnations of Vishnu. She besought him to aid her in saving the white sahib, who had been good to her father and kind to herself. If only the white sahib might be saved, it mattered nothing what happened to her—Narisha.

Lieutenant Hammond, of the Fifth Irregular Cavalry, paused irresolute.

At the mess overnight, the trouble in the air, about which everybody had been talking, but in which so few, it seemed, had really believed, had been discussed seriously for the first time, and in the event of a rising at Goojapore—"a contingency which I think very remote," said Major Murray, who commanded the station—it was decided that the Commissioner's bungalow, which was well placed at the distance of a furlong from the parade ground, should be the rallying point for Europeans.

"I can answer for my men," the major had said to Captain Wilson when the latter had expressed doubts about the stability of his sepoys. "The troopers of the Fifth will never be false to the salt they have eaten."

But again it was the unexpected which happened, as happen it did, times beyond counting in the early days of the Mutiny. In the morning the troopers had ridden off, their faces towards Delhi, and the sepoys in the cantonments were looting and murdering. Of the four English officers with the Native Infantry, three had been bayonetted while endeavouring to leave their houses.

The choice that was offered to Lieutenant Hammond was both cruel and humiliating; but he must decide swiftly, for the voices of the mutineers could now be distinguished on the other side of the shrubbery, and already the broad light of the glaring Indian day was upon them.

To go with Narisha looked to Hammond very like deserting his comrades; but, with three men killed out of ten, and two hundred blood-thirsty and evil-minded sepoys to reckon with, what were the chances for the rest? How many, indeed, would manage to reach the Commissioner's bungalow; and how long would they be able to hold it against the rebels? The murders already committed would urge the fellows on to further excesses, and still more desperate crimes. To refuse the help which the girl had risked her life to offer, would probably be not only to lose his own, but to condemn her to suffer also, since if the mutineers found him gone, and Narisha here, they would conclude at once that she had warned him. They would not know that he had gone up to help garrison Commissioner Ewer's bungalow; and Narisha's life would be sacrificed in vain. It was a painful position for Lieutenant Hammond. The girl's hand was still upon his arm, when Roop Singh, Hammond's servant, came into the verandah. "Go, sahib," he said, speaking hurriedly, "Go with Narisha."

Till that moment the man had not moved hand or foot to warn his master of the peril which threatened. It would be as God willed, and nothing that he, Roop Singh, might do could alter it. But now, in the presence of quick-coming danger, the human heart in the man triumphed over the prejudice of race and the fatalism of creed.

"Go," he said, pushing Hammond before him. "They are in the garden. Roop Singh will keep them in talk till Hammond Sahib gets through the bushes. They'll search the house first. But there's no time to linger, sahib. You must run—run hard for your life."

But woman's wit was a better councillor than man's advice. Hastily divesting herself of a heavy shawl which she wore, Narisha threw it over Hammond. It enveloped him from head to foot. Deftly she wrapped it about him, draping it after the fashion in which it was worn by native women, and putting his hand in hers he suffered her to lead him away.

At the back of the compound, dark faces were peering into the dense foliage of the shrubbery, and a dozen pair of arms were making savage thrusts with the bayonet into the middle of every clump of bush and cluster of tamarisk. From the cavalry parade ground Hammond could hear the mutineers shouting the cries of faith and race.

He wondered if Wilson had succeeded in getting up to the bungalow. When they found that he (Hammond) wasn't amongst them, what would they think? That he had met the fate of Hubbard and the other poor fellows of the N.I.? His conscience smote him for leaving them; for a moment his steps halted. Narisha hurried him along. Not a word was spoken till they reached the edge of the jungle.

"Where are you taking me, Narisha?" asked Hammond, as she plunged into the thick of the gloom.

"Is my lord, then, afraid to go with his servant?" said the girl wistfully.

"Not so, Narisha," replied Hammond, "but the sahib-logues will all be at the Commissioner sahib's; and, truly, that is where I ought to be too. They will look for me and not find me; and what shall I answer when they ask me 'Whither wentest thou? Was it thee who stole away like a thief, disguised in the garb of a woman? Let us not wander far, Narisha. The sepoys mayhap will go after the sowars when they've burnt and plundered the quarter, and I don't want to hear men call me 'namurd' coward."

"Thy own people surely will not call thee by that name, my lord," answered the girl softly, "and what son of a dog is there in Goojapore who shall compete with Hammond Sahib in courage and daring? Yet though friends be few, and enemies many, if but my lord will put his hand in that of his servant," she murmured, "I will save him alive from those that seek to destroy him. Protection of God!" she burst out. "By my soul! I will not live if the evil thing should come nigh him. The sahib-logues! Why should my lord go to them? Can they save him? They cannot save themselves. The haramzadras will kill them, every one.

"I have told Oomree—may his soul perish in Nurruk if he deceives me. He is my brother, but I will surely kill him if any evil befalls my lord at his hands—Oomree loves not the English sahibs; but last night, under the neem tree, I made him promise thy life, Hammond sahib, to me. Then we arranged it together. But for Roop Singh, who stayed in the village with his people, till the morning star grew faint in the sky, I had warned my lord before ever the sowars came on parade."

"In which case, Narisha, I'm afraid you would have had only your labour for your pains; since I should have been bound to go up to the Major-sahibs to make my report."

To this the girl answered nothing, but, taking Hammond by the hand, led him further into the depths of the forest.

A great silence had fallen suddenly upon them. The heart of each was perhaps too heavy for speech, as the thoughts of each were too full for utterance.

From the direction of the cantonments came the long dull roll of volley firing.

How long they continued to thread the tangle of cane, and bush and tree, before Narisha stopped, Hammond had not the faintest conception. It might have been only minutes; but it might have been hours. The sense of time and place only came back to him with the cessation of motion. He was standing before a low thatched hut, and Narisha was saying: "'Tis a poor lodging, sahib; but you may sleep in peace. None will disturb you in the dwelling of Krishna. See, here is food and water. On the morrow I will return, please God; and my lord shall have news of his people."

"What have you got there, Reynolds?"

She threw herself at his feet and embraced his knees. Hammond lifted her up. Her features worked convulsively under the effects of suppressed emotion. He would have spoken, but the light in her large, soft eyes struck him dumb. The next moment she had broken from him, and, like a startled fawn, was rushing swiftly from the hut.

Hammond sat down feeling utterly miserable.

"The sahib-logues are all dead, my lord; and the wardi-major and the two sergeants who were with them. They shut themselves in the bungalow and fired from the windows. Mootee's men begin soon to drop. One—two—three—many! Then Mootee calls for lighted sticks. They throw them on the thatch. They keep on throwing them. By-and-bye, the flames burst through, and the sahibs come out. Then Mootee's men shoot them."

It was a pitiful tale, and Hammond listened in silence.

"The sahib will leave here at sundown for Ranipur," said Narisha suddenly, observing the absorption in which her story had plunged the Englishman. She spoke in a hard, dry voice, very unlike that in which she had related the siege of the bungalow.

Hammond looked at her. Ranipur was a head-quarter station. At Ranipur he would find friends. There was always a battalion of the line and half a battery of artillery at Ranipur.

"Everything is ready," she went on hurriedly, dropping her eyes. "The dooly and bearers will arrive this afternoon. Oomree has sworn to me by Holy Mother Gunga that no harm shall happen to thee. He will see thee even to the gates, and thou wilt give the chief bearer a token to bring back to me. Then shall I know that my lord has found safety with his own people."

"Narisha," he began—but she interrupted the words he would have spoken.

"See!" she cried, displaying a muslin scarf and silken saree, "see what I have brought to deck my lord withal. Ah! but he will make a handsome girl when the woman's veil hides the moustache of the soldier."

She laughed, but the laugh gave Hammond a pain at the heart to hear.

"My lord is to be Oomree's wife. Will he pardon his servant for putting such shame upon him as to make a woman of him? Oomree will take thee away, my lord, in the dooly as his own precious one; and if any male eye should behold thee he will but see the saree and scarf and veil of Oomree's wife. But by what token shall thy servant know if it be well with her lord?"

She held up her head proudly as she spoke. She was a beautiful girl, and Hammond thought he had never seen her look so superbly beautiful as she did at that moment.

He fumbled in his pockets. His things had been thrown on in a hurry—money, ring, nicknacks, all had been left on his dressing table. He had nothing; nothing but a battered rupee—a battered rupee with a hole drilled through it.

"Would you know it again, Narisha?" he inquired, offering her the coin.

"When I see it again, my lord, I will go to Benares and pay my vow to Krishna. Oomree will go to Delhi when he has discharged his pledge to Mother Gunga; but Narisha will stay in her house at Goojapore till my lord's token is brought back to her."

In the dusk of the day a dooly in charge of a havildar and two sepoys was met on the Ranipur road by the peasants returning from their work in the paddy fields.

* * * * *

"What have you got there, Reynolds?" It was in the narrow lane leading from the Lahore Gate at Delhi—the lane where, only a few days before, John Nicholson had got his death. The speaker was Lieutenant Hammond, late of the Fifth Irregular Cavalry.

"It's a woman, sir," answered Corporal Reynolds.

"Dead?"

"Yes, sir."

"I hope none of you men killed her. There have been several women found killed in the city. Of course, if they're mixed up with the men, you can't always say where a hand will fall when blows are going."

"This one's been shot, sir. What could she been doin' here now? Good-lookin' gal, too."

Hammond was turning away, when an exclamation from the corporal arrested him.

"She's got a sort of a charm round her neck, sir. Blest if it ain't an old battered rupee slung on one o' them cords what the old Brawmin's call holy threads."

Hammond bent over the body and recognised the features of Narisha. She had followed Oomree then to Delhi.

"Cover her up, men," he said, removing his cap, "and take her outside the city. I will attend the ceremony. Of ten Englishmen stationed at Goojapore I only am left; and, but for her who lies there, I should have shared the fate of the nine. It was she saved my life. The battered rupee was a token I sent her—the only thing I had then about me—that she might know that the agent she trusted had placed me in safety. Let it be buried with her."

Hammond felt a strange thrill as he stood by the shallow grave and thought of Narisha as he had last seen her, in the full flush of youth and beauty; and now, lying cold and stark in her narrow bed, with the battered rupee above her heart.

The Search for Emeralds

"We haven't half tried yet," said my friend John Harlow. "If there had been no difficulty about finding where the emeralds came from, they would have been hunted up long ago."

"I have it!" he exclaimed, after a moment's thought. "There's some timber growing at the upper end of the flat; let us make a stout raft of logs, trust to luck, and float down the stream. That's the way to find both the limestone and a place to get at it."

I did not reply, and was still hesitating as to whether I ought to consent to so wild a scheme, when a great uprooted tree stranded on the point where we were standing. Directly my eyes rested on two great branches which had grown so closely together that at twenty feet from their junction with the trunk they were only a few feet apart, I felt here was a means of making our journey without the danger attending an ordinary raft—of having it torn to pieces against some obstacle in the stream.

A similar thought had crossed my partner's mind. We set to work to chop the trunk into shape for our purpose. And here I may explain how we came to be in that Central American cañon.

John Harlow and I had been rolling about South and Central America, trying to make our fortunes in various ways. While in San Salvador, I was able to render assistance to a man—an old miner—who had met with an accident. He died, however; and on his death-bed he gave me a packet.

That packet contained a description of a gorge in a large cañon in a wild part of Central America, together with a piece of limestone with emeralds imbedded in it.

That was all, but it was sufficient to start us off. After much trouble, we had found the spot; but had got no nearer the treasure. But to continue.

The next morning we carried our provisions on board, secured them firmly, and with long poles we had cut for such purposes, pushed off in the stream. Our craft was a success, for although the bow dipped a little when the current ran swiftly, the platform remained perfectly dry. About an hour after we had started, our speed became so great, and the shocks our craft received so violent, that we were very much alarmed.

"Listen; what does that mean?" said John Harlow as a heavy roaring broke upon our ears, and when we were swept round a bend, he shouted: "Hold on for your life, we are coming to a waterfall."

I slipped my arms and legs through some of the loops.

During the next few moments I thought that nothing could save us from destruction. We crashed against the side of the cliff, rebounded, whirled round and round, struck rock after rock with the force of a battering ram, then rushed straight forward at racehorse speed. A cry of terror escaped me as the stern of our craft was lifted in the air. Half-blinded by spray, down we plunged into the foaming mass below.

When the waters closed over me, and the daylight was gone, a giant seemed trying to tear me from the raft. I believed my time had come; but just as I thought that I could no longer hold my breath, our brave little craft lifted her bow above the foam, and the danger was past.

"Why, the fall can't be more than eight feet high," I shouted, as I looked back.

"Eight feet or eighty, it nearly did for me," replied John Harlow, holding on with one hand, and wringing the water from his beard with the other.

We now entered a part of the cañon where even John's cheerful spirits became depressed. Peaks, cliffs, and rocks, were stained vermilion; the same colour was reflected on to everything; and once when I withdrew from the river a dripping pole with which I had been steering, I instinctively wiped my hands, for the clefts and caves appeared like horrible wounds, and the water dripping from them, human blood.

A few minutes more and we were out of the blinding glare of the awful place. Then we came to a long stretch of the kind of formation for which we were looking, and all at once John Harlow pointed to an opening or flat of semi-circular shape, and shouted:

"There's our landing place!"

Then he plied his pole so vigorously that our craft came close enough to the land for him to leap ashore. We made fast to a rock with a strong rope, and our boat, swinging out of the current, lay along the bank. After landing some provisions, our rifles, and a few other things, we looked about us.

No sunlight could penetrate the dismal place; for high above our heads, a great mass of rock covered it in and reached so far over the river itself, that we were unable to see the top of the opposite precipice. Huge fungi—white, yellow, brown and red—clung along the base of the surrounding cliffs; while a grey, woolly-looking substance of the same family, depended like drapery from the jutting crags, and waved about with every breath of air.

We dried ourselves at a fire of driftwood, and, as the ground was damp, we began to look for some cave in which to pass the night. I had taken one side of the flat and John Harlow the other, and I was standing somewhat despondent at my want of success, when my partner called to me and pointed to a narrow cleft in the wall.

"Look there," he said; "that is the entrance to a cave. A large one, too, it seems, and the floor slopes upwards, so we are sure to find a dry spot to sleep on, and Jem, old man, I believe we shall find the stones about here somewhere."

After a short consultation we decided to bring all our things ashore, and for this purpose we approached the bank of the river.

All at once John Harlow clutched my arm. "Great Heavens!" he cried, pointing to a mass of branches which were being carried rapidly down the stream. "There goes our raft; some floating trees have become entangled with it and torn it loose."

My heart stood still. What an awful fate awaited us, imprisoned in that loathsome place.

Our small supply of provisions would soon be exhausted, and then——

Despairingly I stood and gazed at the great rock overhead, and the towering walls that shut us from the world. Once I tried to speak, but the words stuck in my throat. Presently John Harlow put his arm through mine, and said:

"It strikes me we've been and gone and done it.

"Cheer up, old man," he continued. "And now as it will soon be dark, you take the things up to the cave, while I collect some driftwood for our fire."

By the time I had carried my last load into the cave, my partner had laid in a sufficient supply of fuel to last us through the night.

As soon as we had eaten our supper we made our fire blaze, and examined our immediate surroundings. There was not much to see. The side at which we had entered stood out boldly in the ruddy glow, but the roof and further portion of the sloping floor were lost in darkness.

"Well," said John, stretching himself comfortably on the sand which covered the floor, "things might have been worse, and you won't make them any better by sitting there as solemn as a man at his own funeral. To-morrow we'll try exploring the cave, and if the ground keeps on rising it might bring us to an outlet of some kind, and salvation."

Although our chances of escape were small, I could not help being cheered by Harlow's hopeful way of viewing our situation. At last, tired out by our day's exertions, we lay down on the sand and slept.

The next morning we had our breakfast in the open air, and then prepared to explore the cave.

A happy thought occurred to me whereby we could save our candles. I had a small can of lard. I melted the grease, soaked in it pieces of dry wood about eighteen inches long, and in this way made eight fairly-good torches. With these stuck in our belts, our small stock of provisions on our backs, and our freshly-filled water-bottles slung over our shoulders we commenced our journey.

As we went on, the floor became steeper and steeper, until at last we had to climb, and John's idea of a possible outlet began to seem reasonable.

For about half-an-hour our exertions kept us silent, but all at once John Harlow, who was leading, gave a cry of warning and we stopped. We were standing on the edge of what appeared to be a great expanse of mud or water. On touching it with my foot, however, it proved to be sand, covered by a thin crust which gave way under the slightest pressure.

My partner hesitated about advancing any further into this unknown country. Alas! it was I who suggested we should continue on our way. I pointed out that, even though we had no landmarks to guide us, and our compass might be influenced by deposits of mineral, still we should leave such a plain track on the perfectly smooth sand that we could easily return if we wished, without any danger of getting lost.

On we went for an hour or more, and low reefs of partly decomposed rock began to make their appearance, like a succession of dark waves rolling towards us. Suddenly, John Harlow dropped on his knees so unexpectedly that I shot over his head, extinguishing both his torch and my own. At the same moment there was a terrific crash, a crash so terrible that the earth shook at the concussion; the air displaced by the fall of some huge mass of rock rushed past, and the whispering echoes became less and less, then died away.

"What has happened?" I cried.

"We've come to the emeralds," shouted my partner, still on his knees, nearly putting out his freshly-lighted torch as he waved it wildly above his head.

"What do you mean? Have you gone mad? Did you not hear that awful crash?" I exclaimed, shrinking back from him.

"Crash? Well, let it crash—Jem, my boy; look here—look," and with trembling hands he scooped up some sand, and held it towards me. "Emeralds! Emeralds!" he shouted with excitement. "The ground's alive with them! We're millionaires!"

I could see little green specks shining amongst the sand, and had I not previously received a great fright I should probably have been as much excited as my partner. Instead of this I felt angry.

"Millionaires are we!" I said, pushing away his hands. "Yes, millionaires, and with all our wealth we could not purchase a crust of bread!"

My words brought John to his senses, and after a short silence, he said in his usual manner:

"You are right, Jem. Still, I would rather be somewhere else with my pockets full of emeralds than in here with a crust of bread as big as a church." Then while trying to scratch one of the green crystals with his knife, he added: "They are emeralds right enough."

We now picked up handfuls of the sand, blew away the finer particles, put the stones in our pockets, and continued to do so for some time. How long I should have remained thus employed it is hard to tell, for as I felt my store increasing, I became more and more excited, until my partner impatiently pulled me to my feet, and, despite my angry protests, fairly dragged me away.

My excitement soon subsided, yet as we plodded on, thoughts of wealth and happiness in the future made me almost forget the dangers and difficulties of the present.

In half-an-hour or so the air became much warmer, and the sand gave place to rocks; but the thick dust with which they were coated still retained our tracks. And now we had to stop and discuss a matter on which our lives might depend. We had lighted our last torch! Should we use the candles?

We determined to use half of them before giving up all hope of an exit, for we thought that, if we used but one at a time on our return journey, they would carry us back as far as we wished to go.

Shortly, a great change took place in our surroundings. The ground became rougher as we advanced, and we were obliged to climb heights and depths of which, in the intense darkness, we could form no definite conception.

Yet, judging by the time it took us to descend one of these crevices, a false step meant death. And now, to add to our danger, the air became damp and the rocks slippery.

At last we reached comparatively level ground, but dense mists enveloped us so closely that we were stumbling over protruding rocks. Then it gradually became clearer, and the moisture overhead was drifting along in clouds.

"Ha!" cried my partner, "there must be a draft of air to carry the mists along like that; somehow I feel that our troubles are almost at an end."

Scarcely had the words left his lips than his feet slid from under him, and he rolled down an incline towards—oh, Heaven! the awful sight comes again before my eyes!—towards a dark, oily, turbid substance, through which bubbles of gas forced their way, accompanied by little jets of steam.

With a shriek that froze my blood, he disappeared. Half frenzied with horror I cried aloud:

"John Harlow, come back, come back!"

Then I ran from the place until I caught my foot against a rock, my candle went out, and I came heavily to the ground. As with shaking hands I fumbled for my matchbox, the darkness seemed peopled with ghastly forms—every way I looked John Harlow's apparition rising from the ground. Once more I had a light. Then—on—on!

Delirious with sorrow and fear I rushed on. I know not how I went or how the time went. I was brought to my senses by a discovery. I was at the edge of a chasm and could hear the splash of water below.

While I leant forward and tried to penetrate the darkness, the rock on which I stood gave way under me, and I fell with sufficient force to dash my candle from my hand. I rolled over twice, and then was stopped by a second rock in time to hear the first splash into the water below.

It was useless to think of finding the candle—the last one—for I had jerked it far out into the chasm; but I still had some wax matches, and I came to the desperate resolution that I would continue my descent, and, if water barred my way, to plunge into it and drown rather than prolong my sufferings.

But I had no choice. Before I could make a move my support gave way and I went sliding down to the waters below. Then I fainted with fright.

When my senses returned, I lay for many minutes trying to think where I was. On either side was a great cliff, above, the moon shone calmly as she floated through the fleecy clouds. Thinking that I had awakened from a horrible dream, I wearily raised my head and looked about me.

I was lying at the base of a huge cone-shaped heap of decomposed rock, its apex resting against the cliff, and terminating in some black, ragged object, which I could not quite make out at first. Soon, however, a peculiar hissing noise struck my ear, and as I gazed upwards, the black object showed itself to be a kind of irregular archway, through which a grey torrent of small particles poured down the cone, and I knew that it must be the exit from the scene of my suffering.

For days I wandered in a network of interesting gorges with perpendicular sides. Once with my revolver I killed a squirrel, and so badly did I need food that I ate it raw. Another time I used my ragged shirt as a net, and caught some minnows in a pool.

I have dim memories of Indians giving me food; and once, I think, they fled before me, as though I were some dangerous animal.

Then one day I found myself being carefully tended by rough but kindly hands—some prospectors had found me.

Years have passed since then, and though I have twice been very poor—I lost all my emeralds, save half a dozen small ones, during that dreadful time—the wealth buried in that dreadful place has never tempted me to revisit the scene of my awful experience.

The Spanish (Onion) Privateer.

I.

Ye wad dootless ken that me an' Jock MacGregor wur jint owners o' the splendid twenty ton steamship Haggis plying between Spain and Prestonpans in the Spanish inyin trade, but ye wudna hae suspeckit that she wis the first privateer tae get letters o' marque frae the Spanish Government.

It a' cam' aboot this way. Ye see, me an' Sagasta wiz aye kin' o' chummy owre the heed o' me and Jock daein' sic a big thing in Spanish inying, an' when I ca'ed on him at Madrid some months syne he says tae me confidential like:

"Senyore MacParritch," says he, "the interests o' commerce and the Spanish inyin trade are menaced. In a short time ye'll see America picking a quarrel wi' us aboot Cuba or some siccan a trifle so's tae divert the Spanish ingin trade frae Prestonpans tae America. In event o' war can I rely upon you?"

"Senyore Sagasta," says I, "you can. Me an' Jock'll fecht tae the last gasp in defence o' justice an' the Spanish inyin trade. Viva la Espanya!"

"I knew it," says he; "bring in Senyore Jock."

So I gaes oot and brings in Jock an' a' the rest o' ma gallant crew, an' lines them up in imposin' array afore the dazzled gaze o' the Spanish Premier. "Jock MacGregor," says I, "stan' oot." "Whit fur?" says he. "Tae be reviewed," says I, turning wi' haughty dignity tae Sagasta. "This man here," says I, "is pairt owner o' the s.s. Haggis wi' masel'; this other yin is Bill 'Icks an English body that means weel, though he disna aye dae weel, an' this here is Terence O'Hara, a rale guid sort when it comes to fechtin' an' drinkin'; windin' up wi' this young loon, Jimmie Dougal, oor caibin boy."

"What a splendid body o' men!" says he. "Don Jock," says he, "when the American eagle swoops upon the s.s. Haggis, will you stan' calmly by?"

"I'm shair I'll no'," says Jock. "I'll wring 'is neck first."

"Bravo, my fine fellow; an' you, Senyore Billicks, will you also defend your freedom tae the death?"

"Yes," says he, "if Saunders MacParritch pays me my back wages."

I looked at him wi' a freezing glance o' silent contempt, an' Sagasta says, smiling like:

"Oor sojers keep sayin' that, tae; but they're guid sojers for a' that. Your wages 'll be a' richt, ma man," an' under thae condeeshuns Bill agreed tae defend 'is freedom.

"An' you, Senoyre Terence, will you fight?"

"Oi will, yer 'onor," says Tarry; "who is it Oi've got to foight, an whin do Oi begin?"

"I'll tell ye in plenty time, Senyore Terence," says Sagasta, pleased like, an' pattin' Jimmie on the heed he adds; "I ken this yin 'll dae a' richt, I see he's a Scotsman like yersel."

Sae wi' a wave o' 'is soord he knighted us a', an' then presented me wi't as a token o' esteem an' respec'; an' efter handin' me a letter o' marque an' anither letter wi' nae marque on 't ava, containin' sealed orders to be opened in the English Channel.

"Come oot tae the back-yaird," says he, "and get a piece o' ordnance tae pit on board the Haggis."

So oot we a' gaed, an' he shows us a nate wee brass cannon.

"Aw, but there's a hole in it," says Jimmie.

"That's the touch hole," says Sagasta, an' he showed us hoo to work the deedly weapon, and gied us a stock o' powder an' shot, an' then Bill 'Icks hurled the hail affair doon tae the docks in a wheel barra.

"Buenas noches, Ustedes," says Sagasta tae oor cavalcade as we moved grandly awa', an' I yells back "The same tae yersel, Senyore," an' wi' thae waurlike an' encouraging words ringin' in oor ears, we left the shores o' sunny Spain wi' anither cargo o' Spanish inyins aboard.

II.

Sae after some hard steamin' we reaches the English Channel, an' I opens ma' sealed orders in the presence of o' ma' trusty band an' reads them oot:

"Intercept a' vessels fleein' the American flag and tow them back tae Spain—Sagasta."

"Bring oot ma' telescope," says I, an' syne I sweeps the horizon. "Yonder's yin," says I; "an it's a fat yin. Great Scott," says I, "it's the Paris! A' hauns on deck till I tell ye whit tae dae." Sae they a' cam' croodin' roon an' I draws ma' soord an' pints tae the rapidly approachin' Paris.

"Yonder," says I, "are the tyrants that wad grund ye beneath the iron heel o' slavery. As freeborn Britons, wu'll we staun tae be trodden on? Naw," says I, "wu'll shed the last drop o' bluid in oor veins first. Oor orders are tae capture yon vessel, an' accordin' tae the law o' nations whit we tak' an' keep we get tae oorsels. An' though we're Britons we're Spanish Knights, forbye, mind that. Wu'll sune be steeped tae the lips in gore, bit wu'll fecht like men in defence o' the Spanish ingin trade an' oor happy homes in Prestonpans, an' Ballymena, an' Auchterarder, an' Seeven Dials, and Mullguy. Are ye a' ready, men, to fecht tae the daith?"

"Ain't we to hev no grub first," says Don Bill Icks; an' I says, "Yes, ma brave lad; gae doon tae the caibin an' bring up oor rations. Noo, ma gallant band," I conteenued, "wur on the verge o' a glorious battle—" and Don Bill 'Icks pops up 'is heed, an' says he, "Don Jimmie's ate the sardines." "What!" says I, "a' yon fivepenny box, put the scoondrel in irons, lock 'im up." "It wizna me," says Don Jimmie, "it wiz Alfonso XIII." Noo, Alfonso XIII. was oor cat, but on accoont o' 'is illustrious name I didna' like tae look him up, so I thunders oot ferocious-like, "Lock up the sardines efter this; discipline must an' shall be enforced aboard the s.s. Haggis. Beat tae quarters."

Sae Don Jimmie rattles on an' auld corn beef can, an' then I yells oot, "Clear the decks fur action," and Don Bill 'Icks chucks Don Jimmie's bonnet intae the watter an' I roars out, "Ye're no tae heve things oot o' the ship that wey; put them doon in the engine-room," So Don Bill 'Icks drops a besom doon the shaft, an' I hears a kind o' noise, an' Don Tarry bangs up frae whaur 'e'd been shovellin' in coals, an' says he, "Oi'll break yer jaw for yez, Don Bill 'Icks, if yez throw things on me heed agen." So I pacifies them by sayin', "Men, men, can ye no' unite in the face o' a common foe? Hist the Spanish colours, Don Tarry," says I; so 'e whups oot the flag 'e used tae carry at the Orange Walk, an' unfurled it flutterin' proodly tae the breeze.

"Noo, Don Jock," says I, "stan' by wi' a rope an sling it on tae the Paris as she scoots past; see an' catch on an' haud her ticht; is the cannon loaded, Don Jimmie?" "Aye, aye, Don Saunders," says he, an' I sings oot—"Full steam ahead, Don Tarry," an' wi' that we swept majestically intae action. Oh, it wiz a graun sicht tae see us bearin' doon upon the doomed ship wi' colours fleein', an' me graspin' the tiller wi' the yae haun an' ma soord wi' the tither, an' Don Jock stannin' calm bit determined wi' a coil o' rope roond his neck, an' Don Tarry wi' the steam haunle in his caurie haun an' a chunk o' coal in his richt, an' Don Jimmie haudin' a lichted match to set off the cannon wi' when the time cam', an' Alfonso XIII. sittin' on the death-dealin' ordnance washin' his face, an' Don Bill 'Icks sittin' on the gunnle o' the ship eatin' a hunk o' breed an' cheese. It wiz truly an awe-inspirin' scene.

The Paris wiz jist aboot a hunner fathom awa' when I gies the command: "Deed slow stop full speed astarn," so's to rin alangside o' 'er till Don Jock got cleekit on til 'er, and then the Paris cam' abreast o' us. Jock snibbled 'er wi' a masterly twirl as she tried tae rush past, an' in a meenit we were bein' draigled starn first through the bilin' ocean at twa an' twenty knots an 'oor. "Haud on til 'er, Jock," says I, forgettin' in the wild excitement o' the battle that I was addressin' a pure-blooded Spanish nobleman, wha had preserved his prood title unspotted throughoot coontless generations o' a fortnicht. "Haud on till 'er, Jock," says I; "she's worth haudin'," an' wi' that Jock wips the rope roon a post an gies it a kinsh that made a' thing snug.

The capture o' the Paris wiz an accomplished fac'.

She wiz oors.

III.

"RESERVE yer fire, Don Jimmie," I yells.

"Oh, I've burnt my thoom," says he, an' wi' that the careless loon drapt the burnin' match on the touchhole. Bang went oor cannon, an' Alfonso XIII. got sic a fricht that he loupt the hicht o' the funnel an' the deedly instrument rowed owre on Don Bill 'Icks's taes.

"Blarst this war!" says Don Bill 'Icks.

The scene o' carnage and devastation resultin' frae that shot was something awfu'. For yairds aroon' the sea was covered wi' the sheets o' auld newspapers Don Jimmie had wadded the gun wi', an' oor quarter pun shot had scraped echt-pence or nine-pence worth o' pent off the side o' the devoted Paris. "Load 'er up again, Don Jimmie," I yelled, fur the battle fever was on us a'. Twa or three men cam an' looked owre the bulwarks o' the doomed vessel an' yin o' them asked us if we were in distress.

"Oi'll dishtress yez," roars Don Tarry; "it's Fogarty, the biggest villain that iver left Ballymena unhung."

"Barrin' yersel'," shouts Fogarty, an' wi' that Don Tarry lets fly the chunk o' coal he had in his haun' an' knocks Fogarty's pipe oot'n 'is jaw.

The dugs o' waur were let lowse wi' a vengeance.

"Paris ahoy," says I, wi' freezin' hauteur, "heave tae or we'll sink ye," and just at that meenit a lump o' cauld pie catcht me richt in the lug. "Men," says I, "ye saw that; let there be nae quarter, slay them without mercy; bring up the reserve amuneetion an' butcher them in cauld bluid." An' then the battle raged. Don Bill 'Icks brocht up the reserve ammuneetion, a box o' rotten eggs, laid last year, an' we commenced to shell the enemy wi' ghastly effect. Everywhere oor shells struck they spread panic amongst oor foes. Don Bill 'Icks got hame a magneeficent shot richt in Fogarty's e'e, an' Don Jock an' Don Tarry played terrible havoc wi' the miscreant that threw that piece o' cauld pie. An' a' this time Don Jimmie mainteened an incessant rakin' fire wi' oor heavy ordnance. He sent yae shot slungin' in through a porthole intae the cook's pantry, smashin' a soup tureen tae atoms, an' wi' 's very next shot he struck the cowerin' cook 'imsel' an' knocked oot twa o' 'is false teeth. Oor foes fled dismayed before oor witherin' fire; but a second or twa later a puff o' white vapour spurted frae the side o' the Paris wi' a deafenin' roar.

"Button up your jaikets, my men," says I; "she's begun tae use 'er Krupp guns'—but syne I saw she was only blawin' off steam; then oor foes trained the deck hose on us an' tried to droon us off till they got the rope cut, but every time a hose gunner showed himsel' we picked him off wi' a rotten egg. I saw that we wad hae tae board the vessel an' stop 'er ingines, so I gied the order:

"'Cease firin' an' board,'" an' Don Jimmie Dougal grabbed up Alfonso XIII. and pitched him on tae Fogarty's neck, cryin':

"Forward brave heart, Dougal will follow thee," an' it wis a' that Fogarty cud dae tae teer Alfonso XIII. frae his muffler an' throw 'im back at Don Bill 'Icks, fellin' that splendid warrior on a heap o' Spanish inyins, but Don Bill 'Icks springs tae his feet in a saycond an' clutchin' up the biggest inyin 'e cud see 'e screeches oot:

"Blime if I don't slab that bloke on the snitch," an' aimin' wi ruthless preceesion he smashed Fogarty richt on the nose wi 'd, an' jist at that meenit the rope broke an' the Paris escaped frae 's like the win', an' Don Tarry howls oot tae Fogarty:

"Ye're Cunnaucht," an' the last we saw o' the Paris was Fogarty foamin' wi' impotent rage, an' covered wi' bluid and rotten eggs.

IV.

VICTORY was oors, an' the settin' sun gilded that scene o' strife wi' a halo o' glory as we steamed calmly on in search o' anither victim, wi' Don Bill 'Icks openin' a fresh tin o' sardines for oor gallant band.

Of course the Paris got safe tae America efter that, but Sagasta was sae pleased wi' oor heroism that he decorated us a' wi' the Order o' the Spanish Inyin an' promised us mair tae follow.

HER TRUEST FRIEND.

Miss Dewar was five-and-forty years of age on the 19th of March, 18—, well, no matter what year.

And she was stout and short, with no visible waist; and hands that were red and fat, instead of white and slender; and features that belonged to no Grecian type or Roman mould, but seemed to be setting up each on its own special account, with no reference whatever to the others.

But we have not mentioned the most important fact of all. Miss Dewar had £10,000 of her own.

And that was without doubt the reason that her relatives sent her pressing invitations to "come and visit them," and despatched various presents to the farm. And that is also why little girls worked hideous pincushions and tidies to decorate her rooms, and young men wrote acrostics for her birthday, and everybody listened politely to her speeches, however prolix they might be.

For a rich old maid was worth cultivating, and it wasn't at all likely now that Miss Dewar would ever marry.

It was a bleak afternoon, the red and brown leaves whirling round and round in the blast, and the great wood fire upon the hearth sending, every now and then, spiteful little gushes of smoke into the room where Miss Dewar and her second cousin and companion, Janet Heath, sat together, working crotchet roses for a counterpane.

"Janet," said Miss Dewar politely, "you're a fool!"

Janet looked up with a flush of colour on her pale, pretty cheek.

She was not at all unaccustomed to these little complimentary remarks on the part of Miss Dewar.

"Be a sensible girl," added the elder lady. "Give him up, and I'll buy you a blue silk dress and a black lace shawl."

"But I love him, Miss Dewar."

"Oh, psha-a-aw!" grimaced the spinster. "Love indeed! I never was in love!"

"And," added Janet, growing more rosy than ever, as she stooped to pick up her crotchet hook, "he says he would be miserable without me. Don't, please, be angry; but, indeed, I must marry him."

Miss Dewar jumped up so suddenly that the dozing blackbird in its cage uttered a shrill note of consternation.

"Very well," she said, "very well, Janet Heath. Pack your trunk as soon as you please. I can dispense with your services at once. And pack mine first, if you please, Janet Heath."

"You are not going away, Miss Dewar?" queried poor Janet in consternation.

"I'm going to visit my relatives," said that lady with pursed lips.

And then little Janet knew that her own fate, as far as any worldly advantages to be derived from her kinship to the heiress, was sealed.

"Put in the black silk gown, Janet," said Miss Dewar in a tone as lugubrious as if she were giving orders for her own funeral. "Of all sin, I regard ingratitude as the basest—and the China silk scarf—to think that I have nursed a viper to turn and sting me at last! And don't forget my easy slippers—though I don't know either why my corns should be entitled to any more consideration than my poor bruised heart."

And then, as Janet Heath began to cry, Miss Dewar marched out of the room.

"I never could endure the damp," said the maiden lady. "I'll go to my niece Maria, or I'll make Herbert Smythe a sort of a visit; he's always saying how delighted he would be to entertain me. As he's a bachelor I must put up at a hotel; but he will take me about. They both love me, although I haven't done half for them that I have for this little serpent's tooth of a Janet. I dare say she expects to be my heiress, but she'll find out her mistake."

"They seem to live very nicely," thought the rich relation, when she arrived at the house of her niece Maria. "I didn't know her husband's income justified such style as this."

The servant showed her into a reception-room, furnished after the style of Louis Quinze. His mistress was out, but would return presently, he explained.

"I'll wait," said Miss Dewar.

A wizened little girl, with her hair braided in long Chinese plaits, and red, chill-looking elbows, was tinkling away at the piano. She looked round as the guest entered.

"You are Angelina, I suppose?" said Miss Dewar affably.

"Yes," said the child, "I'm Angelina. And who are you?"

"I am Miss Dewar," said the heiress graciously. "You have heard your mamma talk about me, haven't you?"

"Oh, yes!" said Angelina, her small eyes lighting up.

"You're the old maid that mamma says is so out—out—"

"Out of health?"

"No; some very big word."

"Outrageous?" suggested Miss Dewar, somewhat discomfited.

"No—not that—outlandish! And you're going to die and leave me all your money, and then we're to travel on the Continent. But papa says he doesn't see but what you're going to live for a century."

"Hem!" said Miss Dewar. "So your mamma's kind enough to consider me outlandish, is she?"

"Mamma's going to invite you to visit us," went on the unwisely communicative Angelina, "when the De Veres are gone. She says she doesn't want them to be shocked with your Noah's-Ark ways. I had a Noah's Ark once," added the child, "with a dog in it and Shem, Ham and Japhet."

"I dare say," said Miss Dewar, checking a strong inclination to laugh, although she felt herself growing purple in the face with indignation. "I think I won't wait any longer, Angelina. Good-bye."

And Miss Dewar shook the dust of that mansion off her feet.

"A pretty hypocrite's nest I should have got into there!" she said, half aloud, as she entered the vehicle she had been wise enough to bid wait. "Janet Heath, with all her faults, was at least frank and truthful enough. Drive to 27 Batchelor Square, coachman!"

It was one of a row of "Mansions," and her cousin occupied a suite of apartments on the third floor.

She beat a brisk tattoo on the panels with the handle of her umbrella, and a voice answered:

"Come in."

But to her amazement the occupant of the apartment, instead of a young artist in a black velvet painting jacket, was a grim female, sitting very upright on a gothic chair, with tattered gloves and bonnet bent on the side.

"Is Mr. Smythe in?" asked Miss Dewar.

"No," answered the stony female, "he ain't. But if you're wise you'll sit down, like me, and wait until he does come in. I s'pose you've come after your bill?"

"Have you?" asked Miss Dewar, taking the first part of the hint, by depositing herself on a sofa, and wondering where the man-servant was.

"Yes—for the seventh time. He owes everybody—Smythe does. I'm his laundress, but you can ask his landlord and the wine merchant, and the tailor, and the hatter, and——"

"Then," curtly observed Miss Dewar, "I should think you were all great fools for trusting him!"

"So we be," said the woman grimly; "and I ain't a denyin' of that, but you see he's kept us on the string all along with stories of his rich cousin, Miss Dewar, as has made her will in his favour, and is goin' to leave him no end of money."

"Oh!" said Miss Dewar, rubbing her nose vehemently with the end of the umbrella handle.

"He says," added the unconscious traitoress, "that she's as old as Methuselah, and can't live but a few days; but I, for one, don't believe a word of it. But you ain't a-goin', be you?"

"Yes," said Miss Dewar, rising. "Please give him this card when he comes in, and tell him, if you like, the little conversation we have had."

And she was nearly downstairs before the laundress, fitting on a pair of spectacles, had read the two words inscribed upon the card:—

"Miss Dewar."

The heiress was very silent during her drive to a hotel. Perhaps she was engaged in rendering the funeral rites on her dear departed delusion! All that she said to herself was contained in one sentence.

Janet Heath sat by the fire . . . musing.

"I don't like being made a fool of," she mentally enunciated, "and I believe I've come very near it."

Janet Heath sat by the fire in the next evening's twilight, musing, perchance, half in sadness, half in shy pleasure, when the door clicked on its latch and in walked Miss Dewar.

Janet started to her feet with a slight cry.

"Don't be alarmed," said Miss Dewar stroking her soft brown hair with a kindly, reassuring touch. "I've come back to you, Janet Heath; for I believe, in spite of everything, you are the truest friend I've got, and that you love me after all!"

"Indeed, Miss Dewar, I do!" sobbed Janet, with her old foolish trick of tears.

"And so," said Miss Dewar. "You can marry that Harry of yours, and he can come here to live, and we'll be a happy family together. Untie my bonnet strings, Janet—they've got somehow into a knot—and make me a cup of tea. Those railways are enough to shake one into a jelly!"

So Miss Dewar settled back into the old groove again, and when the letters came she sent them back unopened. And when Mr. Herbert Smythe and the Barton family arrived in propria personæ she obstinately refused to see them.

"I won't be bothered!" said Miss Dewar; "Janet's my heiress, and there's an end to the matter."

And the relatives discovered that they might as well attempt to move the rock of Gibraltar as to alter her determination.

STARTS TO-DAY.

THE FINAL WAR

By LOUIS TRACY.

PROLOGUE.

Why London is Safe in November.

London in a fog is a disembodied city.

There is life without form, motion without visible intent, weird cry and rumbling sound without apparent reason or locality. Buildings lose their distinctive shape, and abruptly fade into impenetrable gloom; men and women possess no outward individuality, but pass, strangely shapeless, from darkness into darkness.

All around there are millions of people and miles of streets, but the wayfarer recks not of them. His tangible touch with the outer world is confined to an effort to plant his feet firmly on the greasy pavement, whilst he seeks some guidance by grasping the iron railings in front of a house. Each yellow-rayed lamp is a discovery; each lighted shop-window an event of importance; the crossing of a street places every sense upon the alert to discover unseen dangers. The instinct of self-preservation causes men to curse and women to shriek when they stumble against an obstruction. If the object proves to be some equally perturbed pedestrian, the muttered apology is due more to habit than to concern.

On the night of November 2nd, 1898, a fog of unusual density had temporarily blotted London off the map. Experienced people who were anxious to get home from the City abandoned cab or omnibus in favour of the underground railway.

The stranger in London was well advised to stay indoors at hotel or lodging-house, as it was utterly impossible to reach any distant point unless complete acquaintance with the topographical features of the way were joined to knowledge of the best-lighted streets.

Two men who had been dining together in a pleasant set of chambers situated in one of the streets leading out of Portman Place, quickly discovered this unpleasant fact when they endeavoured, about nine o'clock, to walk towards Hyde Park. They had managed to reach and cross Oxford Street—were cannoned into a bye-street by a hansom whose driver had been offered a sovereign if he succeeded in getting his fare, a celebrity of the variety stage, to a well-known music hall in time for his "turn"—and finally came to a standstill near a lamp post in Hanover Square, without having the slightest clue to their whereabouts. They showed their annoyance by growling imprecations upon England and its climate in French and German, but agreed that it was best to remain in one spot until a passing pedestrian should pilot them somewhere.

They were both handsome and well set-up men, fashionably attired, and clearly persons of consequence. Whilst they spoke French as a means of communication it was evident, from the gutteral utterance of one, that he hailed from the other side of the Rhine.

"We are in a very awkward and untimely predicament, my friend," said the Frenchman. "Were we better acquainted with this detestable London and its peculiarities we would have ordered some more coffee and liqueurs and chatted quietly in front of a comfortable fire, rather than venture out into this truly British variety of atmosphere."

"So," replied the German. "Meanwhile, pass a cigarette."

His companion searched through his pockets for his cigarette case, but he had forgotten it.

"Misfortune!" he groaned, with humorous pathos. "England deprives us even of that resource."

"Ah, well. We will have our turn. But hold. Try your English on this pig of a coachman. They never understand what I say, and, holy blue, I am not surprised, as I hardly comprehend myself."

A smart brougham and a pair of horses had been drawn up close to the murky beams from the gas lamp. Before the Frenchman could interrogate the driver, a footman had jumped nearly on top of him in his haste to reach the door of the carriage.

"Beg pardon, milady," said the man, as he opened the door, "but the coachman says he cannot find his way, and your ladyship's party is running considerable risk if he proceeds."

"Oh, how stupid of him," came a voice from the interior. "Tell him he must go on. We cannot stop here."

"Mother, dear!" in a softer tone, "perhaps we had better find out where we are before Thompson drives any farther."

"Wait a moment, Irene. We have not long left Brook Street, and I think this must be Hanover Square. I will just jump out and tell you in a jiffy, as I know how the numbers run." Suiting his action to the words, a young man sprang from the brougham and collided with the German on the kerbstone.

"Pardon, monsieur," said the Frenchman, bowing. "Vil you do ze goodness of telling me ze how to go?"

Something in the stranger's voice and manner enlisted the keen attention of Captain Harington. He was the junior military attaché of the British Embassy at Paris, and spoke French like a Parisian. But he answered in English, without considering his motive:

"Yes, if you will wait until I learn myself."

The Frenchman hardly understood the concluding idiomatic phrase, but he gathered the general purport of the remark. Harington groped his way up the steps of the nearest house and struck a match to look at the number.

"If we are in the square," he cried, "we are just six doors from the Grasmeres. I will go and make certain," and they heard his retreating footsteps.

"What does he say?" queried the German.

"I cannot tell exactly," answered the other. "He is going to make something, but he will return. If it were not for the fog we might have a peep at the fair ladies in the carriage."

In a few seconds came Captain Harington's cheery voice: "It's all right, Thompson. Just pull up a few yards ahead."

The carriage moved off, and the foreigners were again left disconsolate by the one tangible thing they had so far discovered, the lamp post.

"He is a beast, that Englishman."

"A beast, undoubtedly. But I think he will come to our assistance, as he is taking these ladies to a house close at hand."

The Frenchman's opinion was justified a moment later. The young officer returned, and asked them where they wished to be directed to. They consulted together on this point, and the German suggested returning to their residence, but his companion prevailed, and finally intimated to Harington that they desired to reach the French Embassy.

Still speaking in English, their guide informed them that it would be a most difficult matter to proceed to the Embassy during the prevalent dense fog, but if it was of pressing importance he would put them in the easiest way of getting there. The Frenchman assured him that whatever the risk they must endeavour to gain their end, whereupon Captain Harington led them into Regent Street and gave them explicit directions regarding the turn into Piccadilly.

In order to render his meaning quite clear, he drew them close to a well-lighted shop window, and sketched a plan of their route with his finger on a pane of glass.

At last they parted with mutual hat-lifting and the Englishman retraced his steps with a puzzled expression on his face.

"For the life of me I cannot tell why it is," he thought, "but the presence of these two men in London seems to me to be a harbinger of trouble. Why are they both here at the same time, and above all else, why are they together?"

He could give no valid reason for his perplexity, but he was glad, in the same indefinable way, that they had no suspicion of his identity.

When he entered the brilliantly-illuminated house of the Earl and Countess of Grasmere, he found a numerous company assembled for the musicale to which he had been escorting Lady Eskdale and her daughter. Lord Eskdale was the British Ambassador at Paris, and, after enjoying a brief holiday in Yorkshire among the pheasants, he had hurried back to his official duties, leaving his family in London to fulfil a few social engagements before they rejoined him at the Embassy.

To Captain Edward Harington fell the pleasant duty of accompanying the two ladies until their return to France, and, judging by the bright glance with which Irene welcomed him as he took a vacant chair by her side, the visit to England was a delightful one for both.

"What a time you have been, Teddy," she whispered. Lady Eskdale was at the moment engaged in a voluble exposition of her adventures in the fog to a well-known judge, otherwise her daughter's remark would have been couched in less familiar language.

"I had to show those men who stood near the carriage, when the coachman stopped in the square, the way into Regent Street," he replied. "By the way, did you recognise either of them?"

"I? No. How could I? Did you?"

"I think so. Who is this chap singing?"

"The new Russian tenor. He is a great favourite in society, although practically unknown on the stage. I am told that he was introduced under the ægis of the Russian Ambassador, so he was immediately lionised."

"Well, that is curious," said Harington.

"What is curious?"

"The number of different nationalities I have more or less come in contact with during the last five minutes. Is Lord Salisbury here to-night?"

"No. He made a big speech somewhere to-day about the taxation of ground values, or some such mysterious subject, and he is tired, but the Foreign Office is represented by the Under-Secretary. I wish to goodness you would not be so jerky in your conversation. If you don't improve I shall have to talk to the judge."

"Where is he?"

"Why, standing near mamma, of course."

"I mean the Under-Secretary."

"There, near the window, smirking at the fat lady in black. What is the matter with Teddy," she went on to herself, for her companion murmured a hasty apology and went towards the couple she had indicated.

Watching his opportunity, Captain Harington caught the Under-Secretary as he moved away.

"Will you give me a moment, sir?" he inquired.

"Certainly," replied the other, with an air of polite surprise at being thus unceremoniously buttonholed.

"I am Captain Harington, of the Grenadier Guards, and at present second military attaché at Paris," said the young officer, rather at a loss to explain himself, now that he had succeeded in gaining the great man's attention.

"Oh, yes. I knew your father well. In fact, we were at Eton and Christ Church together. Dear me, how you remind me of him and of the years gone by. I am delighted to know you. Come into a quiet corner and let us become better acquainted."

They passed into an outer room, followed by Irene's wondering eyes, whilst an outburst of applause signalled the conclusion of the Russian tenor's song.

More at his ease now, Edward told the Under-Secretary of his rencontre with the foreigners, and concluded by saying: "I brought them quite close to a well-lit shop window so as to be sure I was not mistaken."

"And who were they?" asked the Minister, puzzled to account for the serious manner in which his companion had recited a trivial incident.

"Count von Bremen, the head of the Intelligence Department of the German Army, and General de Rosny, Chief of the Staff in the French Army of the North."

"A queer companionship," said the Under-Secretary, after a pause.

"So it appeared to me," said Harington, relieved to find that an older man than himself should have been similarly impressed. "They left me to make the best of their way towards Albert Gate."

"What! The French Embassy?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes. When they were discussing their next move, de Rosny urged von Bremen to accompany him, as it had suddenly occurred to him that it was important they should go there."

"And what do you make of it all?"

"I have no theory that is of any value, sir."

"Well I should not mention the matter to anyone else. Ah, M. Pochowski, how are you? That was a lovely song you gave us just now."

Harington turned and saw the Russian tenor standing quite close to him, apparently taking an artistic interest in a fine collection of Satsuma vases.

* * * * *

The distinguished officers, who may now be designated by their proper names, had little difficulty in reaching Piccadilly after the careful instructions given them by their courteous guide, but when they left the area of partial illumination afforded by the places of business at the eastern end of that well-known thoroughfare, they had to exercise extreme caution to avoid further bewilderment even in such a straight road.

"It has just occurred to me," said de Rosny, as they quitted a tobacconist's shop where they had obtained a supply of the much-needed cigarettes, "that this is the Jour des Morts, the day that we French people devote to memories of the dead."

"A most cheerful reflection, truly," said the Count.

"And "—in a lower tone—"it is also à propos to say that if we were invading London to-day it would be a most suitable festival so far as the French army was concerned."

"Why?"

"Ah, your wits are dulled by the fog, my friend. Do you not see that the most invincible attacking corps would be powerless against this infernal mixture of smoke and mist?"

"It would equally affect the defenders."

"Not so. The English commander would say to the colonels of his regiments: 'The enemy are massed in the suburbs to the south. Take a couple of policemen, or postmen or omnibus conductors, with each company as guides; march by your own routes, and exterminate the enemy wherever you find him.' Voilà tout!"

"By the left bank of the Rhine, it is true, too," replied the German, as he was shot against his companion by the impact of a big Lifeguardsman who walked straight ahead as though it were broad daylight, for he was in a hurry to reach Knightsbridge before ten o'clock.

The Frenchman ignored the unpleasant form of the rejoinder and went on: "You now know why I wished to go to the Embassy to-night. We must delay our preparations until the spring or early summer. I never before understood what a London fog really meant, and I am told that such days as this are frequent during the winter. Moreover, I was always opposed to a campaign at this time of the year. It is so horribly unpleasant."

"I do not attach so much importance to that consideration as you do, though that it deserves to be borne in mind as a factor in the situation cannot be doubted; but I am disposed to agree with you for other reasons," replied Count von Bremen.

"And those are?"

"First and foremost, the necessity for an even greater surprise than we have presently arranged. These Englishmen are born soldiers, and we must absolutely give them no chance of rallying after the first blow is struck. The affair must be so rapid, so dramatic, so far-reaching, that England shall be prone at our feet within a few hours. I feel assured that I can convince you of the possibility of a greater coup than that which we now contemplate. Indeed, it was to discuss the details that I desired to return to our residence, but the Embassy will serve as well. Then, in the second place, we must have more definite assurances from Russia."

"France will soon secure those. I heard to-day from Paris that another big loan was about to be negotiated. A thousand thunders! What is this?"

De Rosny had run into one of the iron posts that guard the carriage ways at Hyde Park corner, and nearly swallowed his cigarette owing to the violent blow he had received in the stomach.

"When we are looting London," he growled, whilst spitting tobacco out of his mouth, "I shall make it my special business to blow up these things with dynamite. They are as hard as an Englishman's skull. Ugh! I hate this miserable country and everything in it."

When, at last, after a thoroughly uncomfortable walk, they entered the French Embassy, they were announced as M. Jean Riche and friend, and were at once conducted to the Ambassador's library. They remained closeted with him for nearly an hour, and Count von Bremen, at the end of that time, held telephonic communication with the German Chargé d'Affaires, the Emperor's representative being at that moment in Berlin.

As the result of a further consultation, de Rosny and von Bremen sent off telegrams to the Ministers of War at Paris and Berlin respectively, containing the apparently harmless message, "Financial settlement postponed," which was safer than a cypher telegram, as by a secret code it signified: "Imperative reasons for delay. Will communicate with you personally on my return."

In another hour the fog had lifted. Thousands of Londoners poured forth from places of amusement to sup at club or restaurant, or hasten home to distant suburbs; but not one amongst them, not one of the millions in the great city that lay around for miles, knew that for a brief season, and by the fiat of a little conclave of men gathered in a house overlooking Hyde Park, England had been spared the devastating horrors of war.

CHAPTER I.

The Ball at the Embassy.

The month of May in Paris, if the elements be reasonably propitious, is a perfectly delightful period, and May Day of 1899 heralded in the promise of a gracious summer. The French capital was more than ordinarily full of visitors, and life in the world of fashion was more like the changeful scenes of a ballet divertissement than the dull routine of ordinary existence. Americans were there from Chicago and New York spending millions made in packing pork, Russian notabilities abounded, and Germans, the male element vastly predominating, were in such numbers that the wonted supply of lager beer fell short in the cafés. A mad whirl of gaiety and light-heartedness filled the thoughts of every class of society. This social abandonment was, if possible, accentuated by a species of political electricity that permeated the air, and of which all men were dimly conscious.

The new Ministry in France had taken up and developed the policy of colonial expansion given effect to by their predecessors, and a singular rapprochement with Germany was vaguely supposed to have contributed in a very remarkable way to the furtherance of French ambition. Both countries had been working amicably together for nearly a year, and already the result had made itself felt in the most vulnerable portions of the British empire.

It is true that England had long ago secured all the best market for her produce, that her ships carried five-sixths of the commerce of the world, and that her surplus population had the pick of many continents wherein to live and prosper. But a determined attempt was now being made by our great commercial rivals to take from her some at least of the advantages that had been gained by centuries of enterprise backed up by daring perseverance.

The Rhine had dwindled into a stream of no political significance, and men openly said on the boulevards and in the brasseries of Paris and the beer gardens of Berlin that the star of England was beginning to wane. As a witty Frenchman put it: "The bones of Englishmen whiten the by-ways of the world: they make most excellent sign-posts for our future progress."

But Lord and Lady Eskdale and their beautiful daughter felt that, come what might in the future, it was their present duty to maintain in regal style, the hospitable traditions of the British Embassy, and thus it came to pass that the first night in May was chosen for an official dinner, to be followed by a grand ball.

During the six months events had travelled apace with Harington and Irene. Lord Eskdale thought so highly of the young soldier that his wife's desire for a more advantageous match for her daughter was over-ruled, and the pair were now affianced. The Prime Minister had personally conveyed his thanks to the Ambassador for the information placed at the service of the Government by the attaché, as subsequent investigation had shown that it was fraught with grave importance.

Inquiries had been made amongst the London bankers, with whom it was well known nearly every foreign prince had large dealings, and it had been found that there was a steady and continual withdrawal made by these, for no accountable reason of the securities they held. This was enough to put the Government on the alert. Harington's timely service was of considerable value, and he reaped the benefit, for the kindly interest of an exalted personage means much. In fact, a staff appointment at Aldershot, when the next vacancy occurred, was promised to him.

His sister Ethel, a charming girl of Irene's age, was in Paris on a visit to the Eskdales, and it was one of those coincidences suggestive of arrangement that Lieutenant Frank Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, should have chosen gay Lutetia as the scene of a short leave of ten days. Harington and he were fast friends, and it was not unlikely that the tie of friendship might be strengthened, if the guardsman had not judged amiss the tendency of the pleasant-mannered sailor's thoughts. It was his ardent wish that Rodney might make a match of it with his sister, and Ethel had even stronger views on the question than her brother, so for once the course of true love appeared to be running smoothly.

The gathering in Lady Eskdale's reception room before dinner was announced was very select indeed. The French President and his wife, the Russian Ambassador and the Grand Duchess, the German Ambassador, the French Ministers of War and Marine, the Governor of Paris, and quite a number of other great people made the brilliant salon glitter with the magnificence of their diamond stars and ornaments, whilst the lovely dresses of the women toned down the gorgeousness of the uniforms by their softer hues.

The British Ambassador, of course, took in Madame la Présidente to dinner. His interested and urbane manner gave no indication of the troubled state of his thoughts; and in very truth he had that afternoon had much cause for perplexity. A cypher telegram, dispatched at midday to London, was unaccountably interfered with en route, and a call from the Foreign Office for a repetition, had, as he ascertained shortly before the dinner-hour, resulted in even greater confusion. In the endeavour to put matters right he also discovered that the telephonic communication between the two countries had unaccountably broken down.

Now, his message to Lord Salisbury contained a very plain intimation that affairs were in an alarmingly unsettled condition in France, whilst large sales of British securities on the Bourse had emanated from inspired quarters, and not from any public movement. These sales had been proceeding steadily for some days and had seemingly culminated that morning. From this condition of affairs he argued the necessity for keen watchfulness on the part of the British Government.

By an extraordinary blunder, this message, although in a cypher believed to be known only to three men in London and three in Paris, had been metamorphosed into an absurd reference to the weather, and the repetition brought about an inextricable medley of meaningless nonsense. But Lord Eskdale was even more suave than usual to the President's wife.

There had been a grand review of the garrison of Paris that day, and the lady, with the fanfare of the trumpets still in her ears, asked the Ambassador what he thought of the troops.

"They were superb," he replied. "Their soldierly qualities were such that I almost regretted it."

"But why?"

"I would prefer to see such perfect manhood engaged in the arts of peace rather than part and parcel of a huge machine of destruction."

"That is the last thing I should expect to hear from an Englishman," said madame.

The Ambassador laughed. "Have we such a reputation as fire-eaters, then?" he queried.

"You speak in the accents of success," she retorted. "It is always the interest of those who have the booty to prate of peace."

"In such a matter, England's interest," he replied gravely, "is the interest of the world. The preservation of the peace of Europe is our inheritance."

Madame smiled.

"What would you do," she asked, "if the French were to dispute your guardianship?"

"Ah, madame," returned the courtly ambassador, "it is not your men we fear, it is your women."

"You laugh!" exclaimed madame, stung by his playful treatment of her words. "But take care. A hundred years ago France taught the world the art of government. She must now teach it the art of empire."

Lord Eskdale glanced rapidly at her, and for a moment a troubled look rested upon his face.

"A woman is seldom epigrammatic," he reflected, "without being also indiscreet."

Then, aloud, with perfect serenity:

"You have achieved more than half the task already, my dear lady."

Madame paused appreciably before she answered, with a quick look at her companion:

"In what sense?"

"Our hearts are already prostrate; it needs but the subjugation of our arms."

"Ah, you were only leading me up to a pretty compliment. But I am glad that you acknowledge it is for us to contest with you the domination of the world."

"I yield to you now, without a murmur of dissent," he said.

She saw that the Ambassador was in a frivolous mood, so changed the conversation to the prospects of the coming exhibition.

Why, he never knew until afterwards—but Lord Eskdale felt that he added years to his life during the progress of that meal. It was apparently unending, and it required all his powers of self-command to restrain himself from reviling the excellence and prodigality of his cook.

At last it came to a conclusion, and Lady Eskdale rose whilst his Excellency escorted Madame la Présidente to the door of the drawing room. He returned at once, to find that the President and the Governor of Paris wished to be excused from attending the ball on the ground that affairs of departmental importance in connection with the spring manœuvres of the army in the north required their attention. Their departure served to break up the men into groups, and Lord Eskdale encountered Harington, who was present officially, near the door.

"Edward," he said, "where is your friend, Rodney? Can I see him at once?"

Harington laughed and blushed. "To tell the honest truth," he replied, "he is dining in my bedroom, where he will dress, as he is bound to Ethel for the first dance."

"Tell him to prepare for a long journey at once, without anyone being the wiser. You do the same, and meet me in my private office in five minutes."

The guardsman was clever enough to smilingly assent as he lit a cigarette, for the German Ambassador had come to say that he also had pressing official work which would prevent him from remaining longer, and he hurried from the room.

In one of the passages Harington met Irene. He glanced hurriedly round to see if anyone was looking, then took her in his arms, hopelessly crushing her frock the while, kissed her fervently, and said: "Goodbye, dearest. Your father will explain, but don't say a word to a soul."

And he disappeared towards his own apartments.

Irene thought he had taken leave of his wits, but she kept her amazement to herself nevertheless.

When Frank Rodney heard his instructions, he thanked Heaven that he had had his dinner, seized some of Harington's clothes and shirts, in case he should not have time to go to his hotel, and in three minutes announced himself ready for orders.

When they reached his Excellency's study they found him awaiting them.

Without any preamble he thus addressed the naval officer:

"Lieutenant Rodney, I wish you to catch the ten o'clock train from the Gare de Lyon for Italy. You will reach Modane to-morrow morning at eight o'clock. From there send by Italian cable the single word 'Britannia' to the Governor of Malta, and to Sir Michael Culme Seymour, who commands the Mediterranean Fleet, which is at present at Valetta. Repeat these two messages from Turin in the afternoon in case the first may have miscarried, as the officials at Modane are French. A P. and O. steamer arrives at Brindisi the following morning, and you must catch it, if necessary taking a special train for the purpose, and wiring the captain to wait for you as a Queen's messenger. Go on to Malta, and tell the Governor in person the circumstances under which I sent you, and proceed by the same steamer if you can, to Gibraltar, where you will then find the Mediterranean Fleet. Here is £250 in gold for your expenses, and this sum should be ample for all contingences. It is now 9.15. You can do what I ask?"

"Yes, sir," replied Rodney. "But my leave expires in two days."

"Captain Harington will get that put right for you at the Admiralty. You, Harington, will leave for London by the eleven o'clock train, and, if you reach there by to-morrow morning—it is possible you may be detained—find Lord Salisbury or the Under-Secretary, and tell him my precise instructions to Lieutenant Rodney, subsequently explaining matters at the Admiralty. To-day my telegraphic dispatches have been interfered with, and from other indications I fear immediate and pressing European complications."

"It is an odd thing, sir," said Harington, "that the French army manœuvres should be held so early this year and quite close to Brest, while the Germans having followed their example in the locality of Bremerhaven."

"And this morning, sir, whilst driving with Eth—I mean Miss Harington—near Vincennes, I counted 400 field guns with their limbers, drawn up in a barrack square, and an astonishing number of empty trucks on some adjacent railway sidings," added Rodney.

"I know, I know," said Lord Eskdale, with utter anguish in his tone. "But now, my dear boys, go, and God be with you. If I am mistaken, Harington, return here towards the close of the week. Leave by this door, as it commands readier access to your rooms."

He silently shook their hands and opened a door other than that by which they had entered.

The two men darted out and nearly fell over Lord Eskdale's French valet, who was in the passage engaged in the needless operation of dusting his own boots.

"Who is that fellow, Teddy?" said Rodney, and, on learning, he added quietly: "Call him to your room on some pretext."

The servant murmured an excuse on hearing Captain Harington's order given in French, but when it was peremptorily repeated he came with them. Once inside the chamber Rodney said sternly to the valet, speaking in English:

"Why were you listening outside Lord Eskdale's study?"

After a moment's hesitation, the man replied that he did not understand what the officer was saying.

Rodney smiled.

"You are clever," he said, "but that pause was fatal. We shall be under the disagreeable necessity of gagging and tying you for the rest of the night. Tear up one of the ambassadorial sheets, Teddy, and be quick, as we have not much time."

The Frenchman was no coward. The electric light switch and bell-push were near him, and with a bound he had turned off the one and pressed the other, knowing that even if he did not escape from the room, the two officers would hardly care to explain why they were found assaulting a servant. But he had never had any personal experience of the methods of English sailors. In a second Frank threw him to the floor, grappled him with arms and legs, rolled with him under the bed, and being a much more powerful man, forced his arms beneath his back, whilst effectually smothering his mouth. Then, in a singularly calm tone, he said: "Turn up the light, Harington; order two cabs when the servant comes, and then shift the bed."

The result of this arrangement was that in very brief space of time the valet was tied, dumb and helpless, upon a sofa, and the Englishmen were hurrying off with their portmanteaux. Harington on the way out, giving instructions that his room was not to be disturbed before the breakfast hour. To enforce the command he locked the door and gave the key to his own soldier servant.

"I should like to see Tommy Atkins' face in the morning," laughed Rodney, "when he finds our trussed bird. It's a good job we saw him in the passage or we should have been stopped on some pretext during our journey. By-the-way, Harington," he added, "His Excellency forgot one thing. I will wire you at the club from Modane to-morrow to say I have got through. It may be allowed to pass even if the frightful burst-up which the business seems to indicate comes off. One more word, old chap, kiss Ethel for me."

"Oh," said Harington, "I didn't know you had reached that stage. Good-bye, old fellow, and good luck."

And their fiacres rattled off through the lines of carriages which were bringing up guests to the Embassy.

The Russian Ambassador and several French Ministers had by this time absented themselves, and Lady Eskdale received more than one laughing complaint from a wife concerning the ungallantry of her spouse. Her ladyship was puzzled, but could get no opportunity of a quiet word with her husband, who looked completely at his ease chatting with several distinguished personages.

Irene and Ethel, who were, beyond doubt, the loveliest women present, were astonished at the absence of their wonted partners, and if Irene had some perception of the facts of the case, she obeyed her lover's instructions and kept her scant information to herself. At last Ethel Harington lost all patience, and asked Lord Eskdale if he knew where her brother was.

His Excellency smiled as he replied: "Both he and Lieutenant Rodney have left Paris on affairs of State. They had no time even to say 'Good-bye' to you, my dear."

Whereupon Ethel, in wonderment, communicated the news to Irene, and they both marvelled greatly; but the fact did not prevent them from scribbling a name in front of every dance on the programme.

About midnight Lord Eskdale's English valet managed to reach his master and whisper: "There's an English gentleman in the hall, my lord, and he says as how he has a note for your lordship from Captain Harington, and he will give it to no one but your lordship personally."

"Take him to my study, Jenkins," was the reply, and when his Excellency entered the room later he found awaiting him a stout, red-faced Briton, in the regulation check suit and deerstalker hat of the middle-class Englishman, when travelling on the Continent.

The stranger evidently meant to make sure of his man before stating his errand.

"Is your Excellency my lord—I mean is your lordship his ex—that is to say, my lord, are you—"

"Yes, I am Lord Eskdale," was the kindly answer, much to his relief.

"Well, my lord, my name's Briggs, William Briggs, of Catford, where I do a bit in the bicycle line, though I don't ride much myself nowadays, being a bit too 'eavy above. I've bin over 'ere a week, my lord, partly on business and partly on pleasure, as the sayin' is, and I was a-goin' 'ome to-night when a young gent 'e comes up to me on the platform, an' 'e says, says 'e: 'You're an Englishman?' 'Why, anybody can see that,' says I. An' says 'e: 'Are you in any special 'urry back?' and says I: 'It's the season, but I won't lose much for a matter of a few hours. But why d'ye ax?' Says 'e, 'I'm Capting Harington, from the Hembassy. 'Ere's my card,'—which 'e gev me—'I want yer ter do his lordship the Hambassador a service. Will yer stop till the morning train and take 'im'—meaning you, your lordship—'a note on a matter of great himportance to England, and 'ere's a fiver for yourself.' 'E seemed in desperate earnest, my lord, an' I wouldn't take 'is fiver, but 'ere's the note," and he handed Lord Eskdale an envelope addressed to himself and endorsed "Per kind favour of Mr. Briggs."

"'E said as 'ow I wasn't to give it to anybody but your lordship's own self, my lord," and Mr. Briggs glowed with the thought of the fine story this would make for the habitués of the Cat and Anchor at Catford.

The note ran as follows: "Whilst detained for a moment in a block of carriages outside the Embassy, I heard one coachman say to another that he wondered why the President and a lot of Ministers and Ambassadors were driving off to Versailles at this time of the night. Here, on the platform, there are General de Rosny and a large number of staff officers, travellers to Brest by the northern line. I thought you should know this.—E. H."

"Mr. Briggs," said Lord Eskdale, when he had gravely re-read the pencilled message, "you have, indeed, done your country a good turn by your readiness to postpone your journey. Will you write to me from Catford and assure me of your safe arrival there?"

"I will, my lord," said Briggs, visibly inflated.

"You had better stay here to-night, as it is so late, and I presume your luggage is at the station. My man will look after you. Good-night."

Briggs did not explain that his luggage, consisting of a woollen shirt, a pair of socks, a brush and comb, and six collars, was contained in the small hand-bag on the table—his mind was too full of the glorious possibilities of Catford.

The President's wife had retired at midnight, and by three o'clock the last carriage had rolled away from the courtyard of the Embassy. Lady Eskdale was about to seek her husband and chat with him concerning the events of the night when a closely-veiled woman sprang out of a hired carriage at the entrance to the Embassy, sped silently past the astonished footman, and approached her ladyship. It was Madame la Présidente, pallid, with a fever-light in her eyes.

"My dear," she said in trembling accents, "I like you, and I have come, wrongly perhaps, to warn you. You will be called upon to leave France before many hours have sped. I tell you, that you may be prepared. Farewell!"

Without another word of explanation, she quitted her astounded hostess, and was rapidly driven off.

CHAPTER II.

A Council of the Powers.

During the same night a strange scene was being enacted at Versailles.

On leaving the British Embassy so soon after the conclusion of dinner, Lord Eskdale's guests entered their carriages. Quiet directions were given to their coachmen, and the vehicles turned into the magnificent avenue of the Champs Elysées, already radiant with the freshness of early spring. They sped swiftly along past the Arc de Triomphe, and entered the Bois de Boulogne. It was scarcely ten o'clock when they passed Longchamps, on which the white tents of the soldiers, who had that day been reviewed, shone beneath the moon. Soon Passy was left behind, and the hoofs of the horses clattered along the deserted streets of the village of Versailles. The carriages drove through the great gates of the Court of Honour, and pulled up before a narrow doorway, where their occupants got out.

In a tapestried room above a small group of men awaited them. Here, in the pleasure palace built by the great Louis, where he feasted with his mistresses and learnt the fatal news of Blenheim that shattered his ambitions—where Napoleon, too, met his Ministers after his last brilliant campaign in Italy, and rested before making his last dash to Waterloo—a grim and unexampled Council was being held.

There were scarcely twenty men present, but each was a figure of commanding importance in European politics. The military and diplomatic strength of a whole continent might be said to be represented here at its best. It was a strange alliance, hereditary foes meeting in friendly union and Ministers who had for years schemed against each other with all the artifices of cunning at last linked together in a common purpose.

No small issue could have achieved this miracle. Before these men was set the hardest and most momentous task that ever perplexed the strength and wisdom of the world.

The President of the French Republic took the chair at the head of the table. Opposite him was General Caprivi, the Chancellor of Germany. To right and left were M. Hanotaux and Count Holbach, the French and German Foreign Ministers, and several of the chief diplomats of both countries. Near the President sat a tall and distinguished-looking man, with hair of iron grey, and a grave impenetrable countenance, who seldom spoke, but at whom, from time to time, those around him glanced uneasily. It was General Gourko, the trusted emissary of the Tsar of Russia. Other faces, too, known in every Court in Europe, and feared in many, might be seen.

Each one was grave and anxious. It might have been thought that some guilty bond held them in artificial union. Distrust seemed to peer from their eyes as a chance remark called up the lurking fires of hereditary hate. Yet there was a respectful silence when the President opened the conference.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I have just paid the last official visit of a President of France to the representative of the Court of England. The armies of Germany and France are on the point of success. To-morrow before noon we shall be at war with England!"

He turned, with a true French love of dramatic effect, to mark the effect of these words. The only response was a grave bow from Count Caprivi.

"The details we, of course, all know. It is enough for me to say that they have been efficiently carried out. England is secure and confident. Her ambassador is occupied in the dance. Her navy is distributed over the globe. Her army is in India. And yet at Brest and Bremerhaven there are the invincible navies of the two allied powers, together with transports that will carry to the shores of England a mighty army. To-morrow we shall land upon those shores. Within a week we shall be at the gates of London. There is nothing that can withstand us. It may be that the instinctive courage of the English race may lead to a defence of London. We may not be able to occupy the city for three weeks. But I believe you are with me when I express the conviction that within a month the British Empire will be shattered, and that the flags of the chief united powers of Europe will float from the dome of the Mansion House!"

A murmur of approval followed the recital, and then Count Caprivi interrupted:

"Time is precious, and we have much to settle. The destruction of Great Britain is a matter of simple generalship. We need not waste time in estimating the number of days, or the details of military occupation. We may regard the British Empire as already struck off the map. But I must remind you that several points remain yet to be settled in our joint treaty. How is Great Britain to be dismembered, and how are we to share her dependencies?"

Here M. Hanotaux rose and walked behind the chair by the President. Touching a cord that hung down from a roller upon the wall, he liberated a large map of the world which covered the whole space. It had many curious lines upon it and strange colours. Across the British Islands were written the words: "Under joint government."

It was the map of the world as it was intended to be after the collapse of England. The strange colours were the emblems of the foreign powers that had bidden for her colonies. The lines were marks to show how, in the greed of cruel appetite, the confederates had arranged to share some fair possession and split up a fertile country into fragments.

"Here," said the President, "is a précis of what we have already arranged. You will see," pointing to the map, "that Canada falls to France, East Africa to Germany, Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa are governed by a joint board for the profit of the allies. Malta and Aden are dismantled. Dover is held by a joint garrison. England herself," he concluded, "will be governed by a military council in the interests of France and Germany for a time at least. We are not inclined to be merciless, and if she behaves herself, we may be induced later on to grant a limited form of home rule, which will necessitate a sanction for all legislative measures from a combined Board of Administrators meeting alternately at Berlin and Paris. We shall also occupy Ireland to watch movements in England and stamp out any signs of rebellion. Turkey and the Egyptian question can be settled satisfactorily at a later date."

"There yet remains," said the German War Minister, "Gibraltar, India, West Africa, and West Indies, the Chinese possessions, and a number of smaller but yet difficult points."

This observation produced a sudden silence. Secure in their belief that England was already a conquered nation, each delegate was wholly engaged in selfish schemes for the aggrandisement of his own country.

An eager discussion then arose, in which no one seemed prepared to come to a point. And at times there passed looks of malice and anger ill-suppressed as some slight word lit up hideous depths of selfishness or jealousy.

At last M. Hanotaux observed:

"We might begin with India. It is a large and splendid territory. France at least——"

At this point General Gourko's impassive face relaxed. Turning to the President, he said:

"There is no need to discuss that point. India is claimed by Russia. Is there anyone who disputes her claim?"

M. Hanotaux started—and turned red.

"A huge plum!" he exclaimed. "Do you want the lion's share, sir, without doing the lion's part?"

"M. le President," said Gourko calmly, paying no heed, "there can be no discussion on this head. My instructions are final and peremptory. Is it said we are not fighting for our spoil? Is it not agreed that Russia's part is to hang back and make no move till the moment comes—if ever such a moment needs to come? You forget, perhaps, that it is you, and not we, that have demanded this blow. You have been forced to action by the decline of your commerce, the decay of your trade, your imperative need of fresh markets, your lack of colonies. England has seized all that is fairest on earth, and you can no longer exist against so huge a moncpoly. You are both in desperate straits, and the imperative voice of your suffering peoples forces you to close with this all-devouring race which is checking your growth, crushing your strength, and throttling your prosperity. That is why you have formed this alliance, is it not?"

He paused, but there was no answer.

"Russia, however," he continued, "has no such need. She has rich and fertile lands. Siberia alone adds a second empire to her throne. What she wants is, no doubt, a sea-coast. That sea-coast is India. If Russia helps you to secure the success of schemes she is not interested in, she demands that sea-coast. Gentlemen, you cannot oppose the resistless necessity of things. Russia must and will secure for herself the Indian Empire."

His words fell inexorable and unanswerable. The quiescence of Russia was essential to England's overthrow. It was essential to the peaceful division of spoil. Large though the price she asked, there could be no refusal.

Then rose a debate upon Gibraltar, and it well nigh brought to a close the temporary alliance between the powers. That impregnable fortress was coveted by both. But Count Holbach had not come unprepared for this. He had, that morning, had a long interview with the Spanish Minister, and it was in his power to outwit his French comrade.

He proposed that Gibraltar be returned to Spain.

To his joy, the French Minister accepted this method of settlement as the most satisfactory way out of the difficulty. If he could have seen a letter bearing the official stamp from Madrid that even then lay in M. Hanotaux's pocket, he would perhaps have been less satisfied with himself.

And thus the Conference went on, and by slow degrees all of the British Empire that remained was divided between the two countries. What was left of England was a crippled island under the heel of a despotic military government, a tributary state of less consequence than Bulgaria, and a people crushed, ruined, and enslaved.

"One point only," observed Caprivi, as the Council was about to rise. "Germany, of course, claims Belgium."

The Frenchmen started to their feet at this amazing announcement.

"Impossible!" cried the President.

"Not so," replied Caprivi calmly. "It is no doubt a prize of value, but we are prepared to pay for it."

M. Hanotaux turned upon him a look of disdain.

"And what payment do you presume to consider adequate?" he said.

The German put his finger carelessly upon a map which lay on the table. Then quietly:

"We offer Alsace and Lorraine!"

It was a startling dénouement of the grim drama of hatred and selfishness that had just been played. But the German statesman knew his men.

Before he returned to Paris that night he placed in his pocket a signed précis, in which Belgium figured as a German dependency.

It was almost dawn when the Council rose.

"Adieu, gentlemen," said the President with a bow. "When we next meet, it will be in Whitehall."

A SANE LUNATIC.

He was considered eccentric by most of his acquaintances, and by others a mild sort of lunatic. Indeed, it was rumoured that he had spent a portion of his life in a private asylum, and had been discharged as incurable, but harmless.

He was apparently wealthy, and spent his money lavishly. Being myself possessed of a goodly share of this world's goods, it was not the man's prodigality that attracted me, but his eccentricity. Underlying it I discerned a brain of unusual power, which I thought was somewhat hampered by some great sorrow which I considered the key to his many peculiarities.

His favourite topic of conversation was psychic phenomena, upon which subject he was seemingly well versed, a fact not to be wondered at, as he informed me that he had spent several years in India devoting his entire attention to the study of this subject. On this account I dubbed him "Doctor," and he seemed to prefer it to his own name.

Having hinted somewhat vaguely regarding his eccentricities, or peculiarities, call them what you will, it would seem pertinent to here offer some explanation regarding this point, upon which the main thread of my story hinges.

Many times, while discussing his favourite topic over a small bottle, or being otherwise happily engaged, has he suddenly uttered a sharp cry of pain, and suddenly left me with no explanation, nor did he subsequently offer one. Only once did I question him on the subject, at which time he made it so apparent that the query was distasteful to him that I ever after held my peace.

He also had a way of suddenly leaving town without giving me the slightest notice, or advising me as to his destination or intended time of return. Many times has he casually strolled into my rooms, after long absence, and informed me that he had just returned from Australia, Siberia, or perhaps some place of which I had never heard. I honestly believe he had been in every civilised and uncivilised country on the globe. He had no intimate acquaintances other than myself, and expressed the desire not to be presented to anyone except those with whom he was unavoidably thrown into contact.

Late one afternoon I received an invitation from him to dine, and, later, go to the theatre, which I gladly accepted, and at the appointed time presented myself at his rooms. Handing my card to his man, I was shown into the library, the servant disappearing into an inner room, from whence he soon returned, and without offering any explanation as to when I might expect to see his master, disappeared into another apartment. This, was the first time I had ever seen this fellow, and I learnt later that he was dumb, which fact did not much surprise me, knowing, as I did, "Doctor's" antipathy to having anyone about him of a questioning turn of mind.

The hangings, rugs, furniture, and wall decorations of the room in which I was seated had been brought from every known land, and the ten or fifteen minutes that elapsed before "Doctor's" appearance were well spent in admiring the many curios which my friend had collected during his extended travels over the world.

At length he came, with an apology for having kept me waiting, He seemed to be in exceptionally good spirits, and remarked that he had never felt better in his life.

"Do you know, Duckworth," he said, "I have been looking forward with unaccustomed pleasure to our visit to the theatre this evening, as it is the first time for ten years that I have dared to go to a place of public amusement, and undoubtedly you surmise the reason why."

"Well, Doctor, I am glad you are in such good spirits," I answered.

This was the first time that he had ever referred in any way to his "eccentricity," and I was in hopes that he would go on and confide in me more fully, and his next remark almost convinced me that he would.

"I have had a premonition," he went on, "that I am to have peace and enjoyment for this night at least, and propose to make the most of it."

Hereupon he changed the subject; and try as adroitly as I might, I could not bring him back to his original theme.

We went to the play, which was of absorbing interest to both of us. Nothing occurred to mar our enjoyment until we were leaving the theatre.

"Doctor" was walking immediately in front of me, and we had just reached the street, when, suddenly throwing up his arms and uttering a sharp cry of pain, he fell prone upon the pavement. I was upon my knee at his side in an instant, and found him perfectly conscious but utterly unable to rise. His face was set and pale, and he was evidently suffering excruciating pain.

"Call a cab, quick," he whispered, "and don't mention a doctor. Take me to my rooms as rapidly as possible."

A bystander called a cab and helped me place my companion inside. As we rode rapidly towards my friend's apartments he remarked, half to himself, "A broken leg this time. Good for six weeks at least."

Upon my request to be allowed to stop for a surgeon on the way, he flatly refused, and begged me to take him directly to his rooms and leave him in the hands of his man Andrews, who thoroughly understood the situation.

When we got him upstairs I noticed that he had lost consciousness, and as Andrews had left the room I took occasion to examine both my friend's legs; and, although I had heard him aver that his leg was broken, I was utterly unable to find the slightest bruise or damage of any description. The man's limbs were as sound as my own.

Just as I was concluding my examination and was still bending over the unconscious man, I was suddenly roughly seized from the rear and quickly drawn back from the couch. As I turned to resent this treatment I beheld Andrews bowing low before me with an expression of abject apology on his intelligent face. I asked him what he meant by handling me so unceremoniously, and by signs and looks, which he had a wonderful faculty of making one understand, he told me, as plainly as I could have expressed by speech, that it would be his master's earnest desire to have me leave them alone, as he thoroughly understood the case. He then wrote upon a tablet which he always carried with him, the following:

"Please do not call again until master sends for you."

"Doctor," having at various times informed me that he placed implicit confidence in his servant, I quickly decided it was best to accede to Andrew's request, and took my leave.

On the evening of the fifth day after the "accident," I was in my den busily engaged in arranging some papers when there was a knock at my door. It was Andrews with a note from his master, which read as follows:

Dear Duckworth.—I trust you do not feel offended at not hearing from me before, but the fact is, I considered it best to be left alone with Andrews until somewhat recovered. The delicate tact and silent sympathy you have shown towards me during the several inexplicable occurrences which you have been unfortunate enough to witness, have convinced me that you are a man who can be thoroughly trusted, and I have decided to make clear to you, as far as I am able, the strange influence of which I am the helpless victim.

If you have no other engagement, kindly call this evening. If possible return with Andrews.

Cordially yours,
"Doctor."

It was but the work of a moment to change my coat, snatch up my hat and gloves, and signify to Andrews my readiness to accompany him to his master.

I found "Doctor" seated in an easy-chair with his right leg reposing on a pillow supported by a stool.

"Good evening, Duckworth," he said, "I am very glad you found it convenient to come."

"I am very glad you sent for me," I remarked. "How is your injured leg?"

"As well as might be expected," he answered drily. "Andrews informed me that he found you examining my understandings on the night of the accident, and what you found or rather did not find has undoubtedly imbued you with some misgivings regarding my sanity; and on this account, among others, I am about to give you a short and concise sketch of my life, and would request that you keep it a profound secret."

I bowed without speaking.

"You have shown considerable interest in my views on psychology, and this is another reason for my making you acquainted with my life.

"I was born in a small town in the south of England in the autumn of 1853. My mother died when I was in my third year, and from then up to the time I graduated my life was uneventful and happy. My father, being wealthy, humoured me in every way, and my future life promised to be rosy.

"About a month after my return home from the University my troubles began. I was very fond of riding, and one afternoon had just returned from a long ride in the country, and was proceeding at an easy canter down to the stables, when suddenly I received a severe blow on the back of my head which knocked me from my horse. I almost immediately became unconscious and knew nothing until an hour after, when I opened my eyes to find my father and the doctor bending over me.

"I was lying in bed in my own room, and upon opening my eyes my father and myself almost simultaneously asked 'What happened?' I insisted that I had been struck a crushing blow on the back of the head, but my father averred such was not the case, as he saw me fall from my horse without any apparent cause and ran up to find me lying unconscious.

"I was suffering from a bursting headache, but there was not even a bruise on my head, although it was sore to the touch.

"Some three weeks later my father was taken with pneumonia, and within ten days had passed away. I will pass over the two months following my father's death and relate the circumstances of the next attack of my peculiar malady.

"I was seated in the library engaged in arranging certain affairs which had been neglected since my father's death, when suddenly my left hand, which had been resting on the table, was forced down flat as if by some heavy crushing weight, and for the space of several minutes I was absolutely unable to move it. I threw myself back in my chair and with all the force at my command endeavoured to release my hand from the table, but without avail. With my eyes fixed upon my flattened fingers, from which all the blood seemed to have been forced, the remembrance of the first visitation of the unseen force flashed across my mind. Up to this time I had felt no pain, but soon the pressure began to relax and I was able to release my hand, and then terrible pains began to shoot through my fingers and arm. That lasted for two hours.

"I knew of an eminent specialist on nervous and mental diseases and called upon him. He expressed himself as believing that my trouble was an extreme nervous affection of which he had known but two cases before, and advised me to travel, interest myself in the outside world and keep my mind off myself as much as possible.

"I decided to take the doctor's advice and travel, although I had not much faith in his diagnosis. Having decided on this plan I returned home, made arrangements for an extended absence, and the next week sailed for New York. I visited every corner of both the Americas, but all this was of no avail, as at various intervals my strange attacks have returned in ever-changing form. I have experienced a broken rib without the usual accompanying ocular evidence, of which my present condition is a parallel case. I have felt the grip of powerful unseen hands about my throat, and nearly choked to death in consequence; have been stabbed in the back, and experienced in various other ways the force of some unseen and inexplicable power, which I felt would eventually cause my mysterious passing away.

"After spending five years in America I returned to England. I then became interested in spiritualism and psychological research, and soon became a firm believer in the latter doctrine, which I have since coupled with many original theories of my own.

"I believe in the presence of a fluid, universally diffused, which animates all living beings on the face of this globe, and that the actions of these beings are due to their own individual organisations. I also believe, that two individuals of the same general temperament, physical and mental organisation, will, through the medium of this universal fluid, be affected by each other in various ways; that in different cases this influence may tend entirely in one direction, which in my case is that of the transference of the sensation of physical suffering. I believe that ninety per cent at least of the so-called lunatics in this world are not in reality wrong mentally, but are influenced in this way.

"I am practically convinced that there is living somewhere a man whose aches and pains I am obliged to endure, and the one aim of my existence is to find this individual and if possible attach him to my service and keep him out of harm's way, if he chances to be in a walk of life that will make it feasible: if not, some other plan must be found.

"It probably occurs to you that, considering the vast population and area of our world, my task does not present the slightest probability of success, and for many years I laboured under the same apprehension; but now I believe I am on the right track.

"During my extensive travels I have found that in some localities where I have spent considerable time I have been practically free from the influence, while in others it has been very strong. After carefully considering this phase of the manifestations, I have arrived at the conclusion that the closer proximity of my man, the more potent the influence, and in consequence my field of search has narrowed itself down to the city of Manchester and its immediate surroundings.

"Now as to the sort of man I am looking for, In all probability he in no way resembles me in appearance; the little finger of his left hand is missing; he has a scar from a cut on his left cheek and one on his back under the shoulder blade a little to the left of the spine. These are the remains of certain accidents which have befallen me. At present he is laid up with a broken leg, and in consequence I am practically in the same fix. I believe I shall find him to be of exactly my own age, and considering the number of wounds and broken bones in the case, he is probably following some hazardous occupation.

"He may be an honest working man, or what is more likely, a criminal. Now I surmise that our broken legs are not so bad as they might be, and if he gets proper care, we shall be up and about in three weeks from now, and I then propose to go North and ferret him out, and what will please me next to finding my man will be to have you accompany me."

"Doctor" here concluded his story, and it is hardly necessary to inform the reader that it left me for several minutes in a state of speechless wonder, for it was the strangest recital that had ever come to my notice outside pure fiction.

"I'll go with you," was my first remark after somewhat recovering my senses, whereupon "Doctor" grasped my hand without a word, but his face spoke volumes.

It was now nearing midnight, and I took my leave after arranging to spend some time with him each day in maturing our plans, as far as was possible, with the material we had to work upon.

At the end of the three weeks "Doctor" informed me that he was ready to start, and two days after we were on our way to Manchester, where we eventually arrived and engaged two adjoining rooms at one of the smaller and less frequented hotels.

Andrews was left behind in care of "Doctor's" apartments.

We spent several weeks hunting in every quarter of the city and the surrounding neighbourhood for an individual bearing the marks as described by "Doctor," but with no success; however my friend assured me that we were on the right track, as he had experienced various sensations which, in his mind, pointed conclusively to the near proximity of the object of our search.

"Doctor" was not an early riser, but on the other hand I was, and one morning while awaiting his appearance, it occurred to me that, inasmuch as "Doctor" expected to find his man among the criminal class, and as we had visited every known haunt of the criminals at large in the city, would it not be a good idea to carry our investigations to the prison?

Then my companion sent word that he was suffering from headache and must keep his room. I therefore decided to carry out my plan alone. I went straight to the chief of police and told him the kind of criminal I was trying to find. He looked at me for a moment and then said:

"You must mean Wilson?"

"Who is he? What is he like?" I asked eagerly.

"Wilson is about forty-three. Height five feet ten inches. Hair black. Eyes black. Scar on left cheek from nose to ear. Scar under left shoulder blade. Small finger missing from left hand," said the chief, as though reading from a book.

At last we were on the track, for here was the description of a man who answered all requirements to the letter.

I asked the chief if he could give me any further information regarding this man.

"Certainly," he answered. "I see you are not quite posted in the affairs of Manchester. He was arrested for murder about two months ago and in an attempt to escape he broke his right leg. He was tried, found guilty and pays the penalty at ten o'clock this morning. If——"

But I waited to hear no more; rushing from the place like a madman, I jumped into a cab and shouted instructions to the driver to drive with all speed to the hotel and not to spare the whip, at the same time glancing at my watch. It was just five minutes to ten.

Should I reach the hotel in time? And what could I do if I did?

Ghastly visions flashed before my eyes as we rattled through the streets. The cab stopped. I jumped out and rushed up to my friend's room; throwing open the door, I beheld "Doctor" standing in the centre of the room.

The sight of him held me spell-bound. He was standing as rigid and straight as a post, feet together, arms close to his sides, and on his face an expression of agony such as I hope never to see on a human face again.

"Thank Heaven you've come," he groaned, "I've been standing here for about five minutes, bound and ——"

I shudder with horror as I recall what then occurred.

His words died in his throat, his body seemed almost to leave the floor, and then all his muscles relaxed, and he pitched forward on his face.

I quickly raised and placed him on the bed. His face wore an expression of profound peace, and at last his troubles were at an end.

Wilson had paid the penalty of his crimes and——

"What's the verdict, gentlemen?" asked the Coroner.

"Heart disease," came the prompt reply.

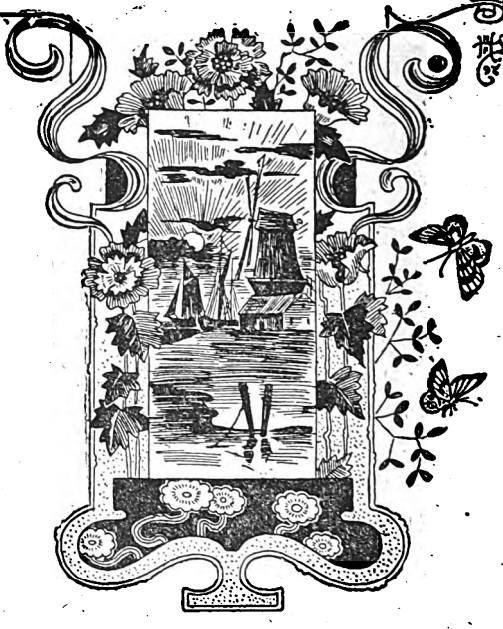
SAM'S RIVAL.



"So you never heard of Myrtle's ghost, eh?" said Jack Catlin, tilting his chair back and snickering most aggravatingly.

"Don't understand you," said Jack's brother Sam, reddening. "I suppose Myrtle has a ghost. All men are mortal, so are women. When they die they 'give up the ghost,' I believe. So Myrtle must have a ghost to give up."

"Oh, yes," said Jack, "but Myrtle has another ghost all to herself—one that she hasn't given up yet—I suppose she wouldn't tell you about it, though. But you might ask, just to see what she'd say."

Sam Catlin was uneasy about that ghost. There was something of an insinuation in his brother's words. He became more uneasy after leaving his brother, and decided to call upon Myrtle Brooks at once.

"Why, Sam," the young woman exclaimed, "I never expected to see you here at this time of the day! Sit down, won't you?"

"No," said Sam gruffly, "I don't suppose you did."

"What's the matter, Sam? What makes you so cross?"

"Cross? I cross? I'm not cross. I only came to ask you something, that's all."

"Oh!" And the red of the two pretty cheeks spread indefinitely. "Ask me something! I wonder what you've got to ask me now."

"It won't take you very long to answer," said Sam looking up from under his eyebrows, while he kept tapping the toe of his shoe with his cane.

Myrtle made no answer. She was smiling and looking at the tips of her fingers in the awkward way some girls have of seeking relief from a sudden palpitation of the heart.

"You won't mind answering, I suppose?" Sam asked.

"No; that is if I can, Sam. Go on."

"I want to know"—(Myrtle's head was beating like the works of a very large watch)—"I want to know about—that—that ghost of yours."

Myrtle's expression changed. The blush was still there, deeper if anything, but the half embarrassed, half happy smile was gone.

"Who told you?" she exclaimed defiantly. "Who told you that story, Sam?"

"Oh, fortunately, if I have to be absent, there are people who—who are friendly enough to tell me what has been going on, you know."

"Friendly? What has 'friendly' to do with it? What do you mean by this, Sam?"

"Tell me, first, what you mean. I want to know about that ghost of yours."

"And I want to know, first, who has any right to tell you—to—to meddle in my affairs."

She was getting angry, too.

"Then you won't tell me about that ghost?" Sam asked, rising from the chair and taking his hat, with an air of grim determination.

"It isn't that I mind telling you, but—what have you heard?" the girl asked, rising at the same time.

"What is there to hear?"

"Nothing. That is——"

"Yes? 'That is?' 'That is'—what?"

"Nothing but some silly talk."

"Silly talk always has some foundation, Miss Brooks."

The girl stood biting her lip, seeming to be mentally occupied in debating some difficult problem.

"I don't know whether I ought to tell you or not," she said at last, turning a defiant look upon him.

"Just as you please, Miss Brooks," and Sam moved towards the door.

"Of course, it's just as I please," she burst out, losing all self-restraint. "What do you mean by talking to me about your 'friendly people' and 'what has been going on?' I don't know that I ever gave you any right to talk to me like that."

"Oh, no," the young man sniffed. "And I don't know that you ever will, either. Good morning, Miss Brooks."

And he was gone.

Myrtle threw herself face downwards on the sofa as soon as she heard the front door close, and sobbed. She and Sam were not engaged, but everybody in her family and in his fully expected that these two would either become engaged or else marry without the tiresome prelude of a formal engagement.

Digitized by Google

Myrtle sat sobbing with her forehead against the back of the sofa.

Sam Catlin walked at a good, brisk, high-tempered rate in the direction of his brother's office.

He arrived at the office ten minutes after Jack had gone out to lunch. So, guided by the instructions of the office-boy, he made off for the restaurant where Jack was accustomed to eat.

Sam's two week's stay at home had begun only two days before this, and he had not yet shaken hands with all the people he knew there, and who were supposed to be glad to see him again after a year's absence. Many such passed him as he stalked through the street to the restaurant, but he was in no mood for greetings, and only returned curt, hurried nods.

As he pushed the swinging door open, a slim, pale young man, with a cigarette in the left corner of his mouth, was all but toppled over by Sam's momentum.

"Where the——" Sam began.

"That you, Sam?" the pale young man interrupted him, saving his hat with one hand, and his cigarette with the other.

It was Myrtle Brooks' adoring cousin, Welby.

"Oh, how-d'you-do?" Sam said hurriedly. "Beg pardon. Glad to see you."

And he went in, leaving Welby to straighten himself and wonder what was wrong.

"What's the matter with you, Sam?" Jack asked, as Sam violently occupied the chair opposite. "You nearly ran over poor Welby, didn't you?"

Sam took up the bill of fare and looked at it mechanically.

"What's the matter with me? H'm, question is, what's the matter with him? Can't see where he's going. Smokes too many cigarettes. H'm. He's as pale as a——"

And then Sam suddenly dropped the bill of fare and stared dumbly at the pepper box and the sauce bottle.

His brother looked up quietly, too busy satisfying his own hunger to pay much attention.

"Pale?" he said. "Yes. Have some mutton. Where have you been?"

Sam grunted his order to the waiter and continued to stare at the condiments.

Jack steadily continued his meal, only stopping long enough to remark. "You did need rest, Sam. That's a fact. Yes, you are pale."

No reply.

Presently that abominable smile of Jack's began to be in evidence.

"By the way," he said, "did you find out anything about Myrtle's ghost?"

Sam laid down his knife and fork.

"Look here, Jack," he said. "I don't want to have an unpleasantness in my own family. Yes, I have found out about—it. Now, please don't tell me any more about that ghost. I've had quite enough."

The smile was gone. Jack was staring wide-eyed at his brother. The lunch was finished in silence.

Sam Catlin went home, and straightway wrote as follows:

My Dear Miss Brooks.—I have to apologise to you for my rude and unreasonable curiosity of this morning. I acknowledge that you have given me no right to insist upon explanations of any kind from you. Please to pardon this indiscretion of mine and forget it, as well as all that may have gone before it, and led up to it.

By accident, I have found the answer to the question with which I offended you.

Very sincerely your friend and well-wisher,

Samuel Catlin.

Myrtle threw herself face downwards on the sofa.

The answer came next day.

My Dear Mr. Catlin.—I hasten to say that your apology is sincerely accepted. I must also ask you to forgive my outburst of temper.

It is incomprehensible to me how you can have found out the answer to your question by accident. Your brother, Mr. Catlin, I believe, and your mother, I think, both know the story of what they have taken a delight in calling "my ghost." It happened more than a month ago, when you were ill in Manchester.

Mrs. Catlin is quite at liberty to tell you all you wish to know about it——

That was as far as Sam read. He went and demanded an explanation of his mother.

"Why, Sam," Mrs. Catlin laughed. "I should have thought Myrtle would have told you about that herself. I know she scared the wits out of me at the time—sending round here at ten o'clock at night to ask if I had any news of you. You go and ask her. She'll tell you."

"Then it isn't Welby?"

His mother laughed, and Sam, in his impetuous way, rushed to Myrtle's home and found her in the garden.

"You deserve to be told not a word," she said, very severely. "You made such a donkey of yourself. Sam—you were ill—up there—and one night, when I was sitting playing the piano, I thought I heard you whistle that part where the nightingale comes in—just as you used to"—sobs here. "And just then Gyp gave one of his little sudden barks"—more sobs. "And I thought you were standing behind me"—sobs and confusion and kisses.

"Then I'm your ghost, darling?"

Myrtle's face was smothered against as solid a chest as any ghost could reasonably envy.

"Now, Myrtle, don't call me an idiot all the rest of my life. I thought it was your cousin Welby. He is so pale, you know, dear."

And incontinently, the merriest kind of laughter broke in upon the sobs.

THE GLADIATOR.

A Tale of the Eastern Empire.

By GEORGE C. WALLIS.

PART THE THIRD.

"Through the Meshes of the Net."

CHAPTER I.

The Pirates.

Of the life that Rhesus led in the galley, it ever irked him to tell afterwards, so seared was his soul with the horror of it. Yet it is needful for the proper progress of this strange story that something be said of those evil days. How long he pulled the oar in that reeking hold, amid its dirt and darkness and infamy, he could never quite recall, but it must have taken at least five of the best years out of his life; taken them out, had almost been written, as though they had never been. But the memory of them remained ever with Rhesus, hanging over his mind as the shadow of a thick cloud on a sunny day, and who shall say how many years were missing at his life's end?

Some time in the next day—or it may have been the next but one—the breeze failed, and the master roused the convicts to their work by a gentle application of his scourge. They were creeping down the pleasant waters of the Hellespont then, having just left Propontis behind, and now and then, as he bent and strained to the oar, Rhesus caught a glimpse through the narrow opening of the heights of Thrace. Mount Olympus, clothed in its eternal snow, he could have seen, had he been free; and many another well-known spot, rich in memories and in legends of the vivid past, along those fertile and historic shores.

Down the Hellespont they pulled the heavy craft, with much blasphemy and sweating of blood, and passing the historic hill of Ida, came out into the Egean. The rest of the day they toiled through the heat and the dampness, naked save for a loin-cloth, each one of them consumed with thirst and madness, like chained beasts; and when night came, on a choppy sea, they lay down in their fetters, and in that stifling ship, fœtid with the breathing of a hundred wretched compeers in crime and misery, must sleep.

Each day thereafter was like that; sometimes, when the sea was steady and the heat not so intense, a little more endurable; sometimes, when she lay becalmed, and the sun baked them as in a pitiless furnace, a little worse. Rhesus' hair grew grey in streaks, and all unkempt, his skin was drawn and puckered as an old man's; those few years put twenty to his age. Even the slave-sailors who worked the galley had some pity upon him and were less harsh to him than to the others—though that was an ill turn after all, so bitterly galley-rowers hate each other for a preference—and once or twice the captain had him brought on deck when he swooned away.

But Rhesus was a pagan, under the ban alike of Church and State, so the captain fingered his ivory crucifix and swore by his favourite saints and sent the prisoner back, thanking God that the law allowed neither Jew nor Heathen to own a Christian slave, and having thus stifled the generous impulse within him, went to his wine.

So the weary years passed on, as a evil nightmare long prolonged, until a break came in the monotony and found Rhesus a fresher and a lighter, if a worse fate. They had traded long between Berytus and Athens and Byzantium, and long escaped the prowling pirates who infested the sea, but in an evil hour for him the captain pointed his prow for further afield and ran for Alexandria. On that voyage his luck failed; he came away with a heavy loss and many goods on his hands; and one stormy evening, as they ran, bare-poled, before a strong gale, a pirate vessel loomed across their track.

There was scant mercy shown to merchants who resisted, and but that he was in an angry mood he would have yielded and so saved his skin. But he chose to flee, and all through the dark hours the toilers in the hold heard the hurried stamping on the deck, and felt upon their sore hides the frequent sting of the lash.

At dawn the captain finding escape impossible, these had a spell of peace as the ships closed and the robbers boarded. There was a moment of suspense, in which flashes of hope shot across the dark horizon; and then, as a dozen pirates came down the hatch and severed their chains and put knives into their hands, a moment of frenzy that turned the ship into a living Hades.

For those rowers were mad with the sudden liberty, eager as wild animals for the blood of their late masters, and bursting upon the latter as they stood at bay in the bow, pulled them down and tore them limb from limb, exulting in their savage strength; and not one was spared, not one was left alive. Then, reckless, insane with the lust of freedom and revenge, they turned to the pirates and rushed at them, a frantic, howling mob. But these were tougher fellows and used to such work, and defending themselves calmly until their assailants had spent their spasm of fury, punished them thereafter so that most crept back, cowed and beaten, to the hold. But Rhesus did not go below. He stood, knife in hand, near the mast, and threatened to slay the first that touched him, vowing that nothing would make him go down again.

"He fought well, certainly," said the chief of the pirates to his men. "It would perhaps pay us better to take him as one of us, instead of wasting a man or two to be rid of him. What say you, slave?"

"Anything but the oars!" cried Rhesus. "Though it likes me not to join such villains, I consent!"

"He has some courage, I vow!" cried the chief. "He shall go with us."

So Rhesus became a pirate, a freebooter, a despoiler of merchants, a scourge of the sea, and added another to the several avocations that had occupied his life.

Having scuttled the captive ship with the miserable rowers aboard, they put off from the scene of evil success and sped swiftly westward before the impulse of the still high gale. The rest of that day and the following night, despite his weakness from the strife and long captivity, they put Rhesus through the rounds of work that each aboard must do in turn. What matter that his eyes were drowsy and his head swam and his knees trembled under him? What matter that the ship pitched and tossed on the storm-shaken sea, and out of the blackness of the wild night came a deluge of rain? He had bought his life and freedom at a price, and must pay the penalty; and when at last the wind abated somewhat and the heavy cloud-banks drifted away before the red onset of the rising sun, he dropped from sheer fatigue, and on the bare deck, his back to the bulwark, fell asleep and passed into a land of hideous dreams

The rough work and evil deeds the pirates committed thereafter sorted ill with the better nature of Rhesus, but the memory of wilful Eutasia kept his protests back, and made the wealth he got so wrongly seem sacred in his eyes. Surely none of the crew thought of him as less scrupulous than themselves. As daring, as careless; as ready for fray or frolic, for friend or foe, he assuredly was; so none suspected his secret loathing, none his secret desire—a desire, he began to fear, that would never be gratified.

But time in its circling course brings all things round, and in a manner he least expected, out of what he thought a dire misfortune, a way was made for Rhesus to the goal of his longing, a way that once begun seemed to lead straight thereto, as though carved through the thicket of circumstance by the sweeping axe of a god.

He kept wide-open ears to the floating gossip of the sea and the littoral towns, and heard much of matters in Constantinople—of the genius of Belisarius and his thankless treatment at the hands of Justinian and Theodora—and worst of all, at the hands of Antonina, his faithless wife—of his Persian victories; of his splendid triumphs in Africa, where he had captured Carthage and taken Gelimer prisoner, and so added a Vandal kingdom to the empire in one campaign; and of the new task that the greedy despots set him—the reconquering of Rome.

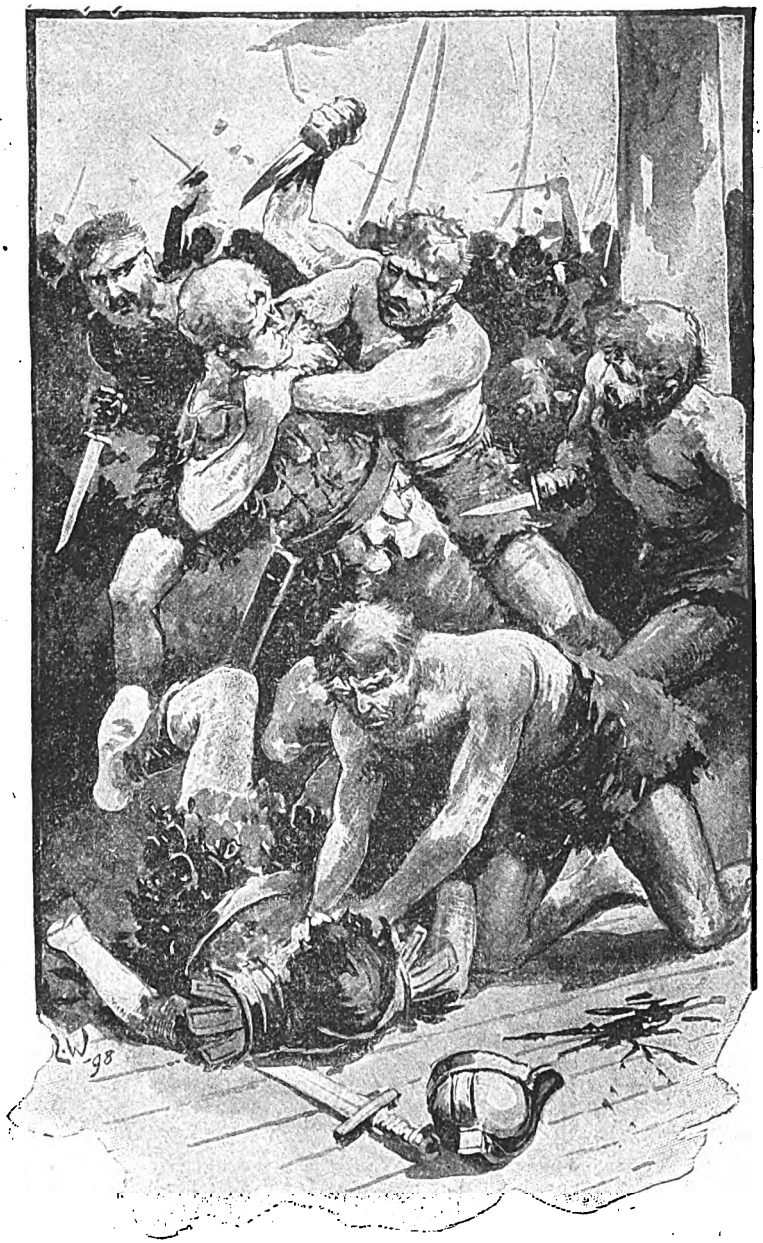
Had the pirates been equally attentive to this last news, or known the energy of Belisarius as Rhesus knew it, they would not have lingered amongst the isles of Greece so long that warm season. As it was, they crept out from the sheltering lee of a high bluff one day to find themselves right in the path of the great Byzantine fleet, and being discovered by the look-out of one of the brigantines, knew that the end of their roving days had come. They ran for it at first, but the light ships went three leagues to their two, and seven of them coming in pursuit, caught them easily. Then the robbers let down their anchors and prepared to die.

The enemy closed round warily, knowing their desperation, demanded their object in flight, and asked if they would surrender and go before the general.

"Tell your general," roared the pirate chief, with an imprecation in the names of all the saints, "that we please ourselves where and when we come to bay. We will go before him, without further parley—when we are all slain! We are not yet ready for the dungeons of the capital or the rowing holds of your ships!"

With that the seven ships closed in, and the fight began. As for Rhesus, a wild hope had risen and taken hold of him, and whilst they fought he held back and leant upon the mast, his sword in its sheath and his arms folded. The wild sea-dogs gave a good report of themselves ere they finished, and the manner of their ending evoked in Rhesus an admiration that their living could not; but they were only a handful to the troops that ship after ship sent on board, and presently it was over, and Rhesus alone was left.

The victors, surprised at his inactivity, asked grimly if he preferred a slow and ignoble death to a swift and hot one; whether he would go before the general as one who had not even the courage of his wickedness, or whether he would be ended as he stood. He replied that he would go before Belisarius.



They pulled them down and tore them limb from limb.

CHAPTER II.

Rome Roman Once More.

The great soldier sat under an awning on the deck of his flagship and received Rhesus with an ironical smile on his leonine face.

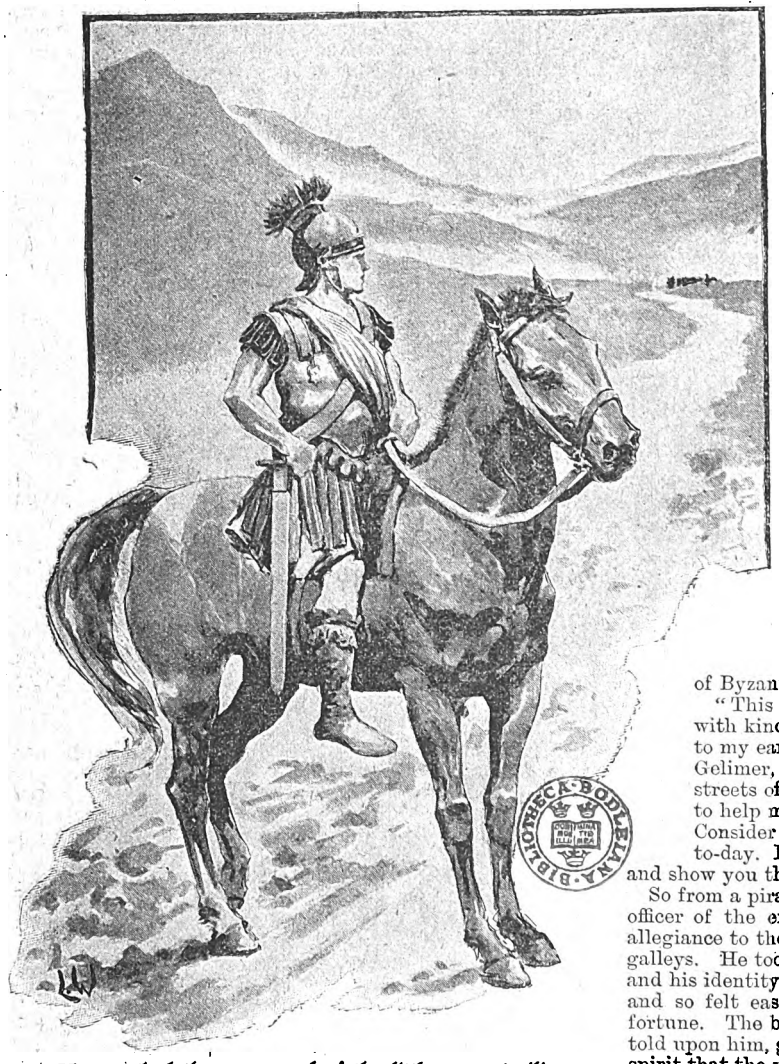
"You know, Sir Pirate, how we deal with those—without exception—who prey upon the commerce of the empire?"

"Yes," answered Rhesus. "You deal with them as they merit, as I should deal with them were I in your place. But you will not so deal with me when you know how I come to be in this plight."



BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

He watched the rear-guard of the little army trailing round the bend of the hills.

"I can but judge a man by his friends," said the soldier; yet there was an awakening interest in his eyes and a perplexing air of half-recognition in his face, so Rhesus took fresh heart and told somewhat of his story.

"If a man should fall among thieves, and be forced to act as a thief to keep a whole skin; and should be so in love that he prefer life with dishonour—and hope—to death, what then?" he asked.

"What then?" repeated the general. "Why, I should say it was a hard case, but not sufficient excuse for one with so smooth a tongue, even as yours! But don't give way yet, man; Belisarius loves justice above all things, and there is something familiar in your face. Here, Procopius; perchance you have a better memory than I. Where have we seen this fine fellow before?"

The learned secretary and companion of the general eyed the prisoner a moment, nonplussed by his dress and altered appearance, then the light of recognition broke through the clouds of his perplexity.

"You see so many faces, general, or you would remember him well. Mind you not young Rhesus—Rhesus the Roman—who was the best charioteer in the capital, albeit he wore the green badge; whom they sentenced to the galleys?"

"That I do now," cried Belisarius, who came himself of a family of charioteers, "I recollect him well, and have wished he had worn the blue." Then he turned to Rhesus again, smiling. "I can believe your tale now, though it seemed but a coward's plea at first. I cannot help but spare your life now, Rhesus, come what may of it at Court, where I have many enemies. Will you wear the blue and enter into my service in this coming campaign in Italy before you venture back to the capital? I have need of resolute men such as you, to lead these ill-paid mercenaries."

He looked at the prisoner keenly as he spoke, and the latter felt that fascination for him that made him so liked by his soldiers, seize him all on the sudden. He had admired his loyalty and martial skill before; he was now enamoured of the man.

"I will put on the azure band to-day," he cried, grateful and enthusiastic, "and you can make me what you will, so long as I get to Rome and see the banners of Byzantium flying from her walls!"

"This is a man's talk!" answered Belisarius, with kindling eyes. "I never heard sound sweeter to my ears than that, even when I paced the Vandal, Gelimer, in his purple robe, through the crowded streets of Constantinople! Had I a dozen such men to help me I should feel more secure in my successes. Consider yourself officer of a thousand, Rhesus, from to-day. Procopius will attend to your wants to-night, and show you the men."

So from a pirate Rhesus was transformed suddenly to an officer of the expedition to Rome, sworn to loyalty and allegiance to the Emperor who had sentenced him to the galleys. He took care, however, that the tale of his life, and his identity was not bruited about among the sailors, and so felt easy as to the ultimate outcome of his good fortune. The better food and easier mind he gained soon told upon him, giving him back, in some part, the healthy spirit that the years of toil and vice had stolen.

The future once more began to have a brighter tinge, and the image of Eutasia, floating through his dreams and daylight visions, held out to him a beckoning hand. He remembered now her intercession more than her girlish caprice, and though he feared Marcen's cunning, there ever came, as the end of his confusing thought, a strange, dim sense of ultimate success—a foreknowing, as it might be, that she would be true to him through all; that to keep her first vow she would break a thousand others. Whence came this feeling he knew not—who should tell him? The world of life is surely greater than we see with these wondrous orbs of ours, and who shall say what messages, what influences, are passed from one to another of us through that larger part of existence that is to us unseen?

Surely Lucretius was in error—surely there are other things in nature than the ever-falling atoms? But such matters as these, Rhesus, are best left to the scattered students of your old academies!

The soldiers told him much of recent history, as the keels of the light ships cut the sparkling waters of the pleasant sea, and he made himself a favourite with all in those hours of ease snatched from the constant care of governing; those hours spent in the cool, fresh mornings, and the langourous, darkening eves, when the vessel slipped sibilant through the slight curl-spray, and the sun in his rising or setting was attended by sundry stars.

He heard of the ambitions of King Amalasontha, whose dream of a United Gothic Italy was so roughly nipped in its budding by the hired assassins of Theodatus; how the latter, too, was deposed and slain at Capua, after enduring a twenty days' seige that was terminated by General Vitiges entering the town through the aqueduct; how Vitiges was made king in his place.

It were needless to weary the reader here with the campaign that now followed—how Belisarius enticed Vitiges away from the capital, and sailing up the Tiber in his absence, laid siege to the ancient City of Seven Hills; how aged Lenderis and the garrison gave in and were allowed to go free. That is all in the history books. But long after, Rhesus remembered seeing the old man and his scanty troop marching out along the broad Flaminian Way; and he thought that after all, those Goths were not so barbarous as their eastern compeers, that the Holy City might have been in worse hands than theirs.

The Roman triumph was not long unchallenged. Vitiges gathered his force together, profiting much by the ill support Belisarius received from the east, and the brave general found himself at last with 5,000 men only, besides the inhabitants of the city—whose old traditions yet lingered, called upon to defend Rome for more than a year against an overwhelming army of revengeful Goths.

For a year and nine days Rhesus marked by day their steely ring drawn close, and saw by night the twinkling curve of their bivouac fires. Often, in that long siege, his heart sank and his hope dulled, but as often the depression passed, charmed away by the romance of the place. The very streets he trod, the houses he lived in, the walls he defended were holy ground to him, the fallen shrine of the old beliefs he cherished so fervently; and who fights so well in the darkest hour as one who fights to guard the relics of his faith from infidel hands?

Along the wall that stretched from the Pincian to the Flaminian gate, the fiercest fights befel, and there Rhesus was apportioned; and though he strove his hardest, giving his soldiers scant time for rest or sleep, himself less, the fierce Goths wrecked much of the old glory he sought to save.

The old Mole of Hadrian, covered with the white marble of Paros, was partially destroyed, and though those huge bows, the balistæ, and those huge slings, the onagri, were worked almost continually, the foe often gained footing within the lines long enough to do irremediable mischief. Some of the matchless statues chiselled by Praxiteles and Lysippus were thrown down and broken in their charges—work that would have been immortal destroyed in the frenzy of an hour.

But the garrison never lost faith in Belisarius, and darind them to a pitched attack on the tenth day of the secong year, repulsed the Goths and drove them out over the Milvian Bridge, slaying some 30,000 in the rout, besides the many who fell into the Tiber and the Father River swept away in his vengeance.

And then, had the promised reinforcements been sent to Belisarius from Constantinople, Rome would have been made Roman for certainty, would never have had other than a Roman master again. But the jealousy of Justinian lost the golden opportunity, allowing the enemy time to regather their forces. It is true that the troops followed Vitiges and defeated him in Ravenna, his last stronghold, and made themselves popular with the peaceful, law-abiding people—for Belisarius allowed neither rapine nor plunder on his marches;—it is true that winter and disease wasted away the army that Theodebert the Frank was hastening southward with, and delayed the preparations of Totila, the clever young leader of the Goths; but in the midst of it all the enemies of the General at Constantinople prevailed, and he was recalled to once more prove his loyalty to an unworthy ruler.

He left as many men as he dare to guard Rome until his return, and set out with unmoved fortitude to meet his traducers. There is surely no more pathetic spectacle in history than that of this brave and skilful soldier, true beyond corruption and loyal passing belief, accepting so calmly the suspicion cast upon him; never swerving from the course of unquestioning duty, though his steadfastness was ever to his own loss.

He left Rhesus, with a picked band of men, at a lonely village just within sight of the Great Aqueduct that in old time carried the water of the hills into Rome, and bidding him guard his line of retreat, struck out across the country to the east coast, where the fleet lay.

"If I cannot come back within the year all will indeed be lost," he said at parting, "and then, Rhesus—or before, if all be lost sooner—you will best serve your country by saving your skin and making for home. I will bear you a message to this love of yours, as you have asked, and if her answer be as you think, will dispatch you word by a trusty slave. And so, Rhesus, farewell."

Thus mindful of an underling's welfare in the midst of his own misfortune and anxiety, he bade Rhesus good-speed, and the latter saw him not again. He watched the rear guard of the little army trailing round the bend of the hills until the last man vanished behind the dim edge of the fertile slope, and as the white mists of evening began to rise from the sun-baked valley, turned his horse's nose back to his temporary home. A soldier's lot is hard at times, when the glamour of victory is taken away and the heat of battle is gone!

But Rhesus had soon other things to occupy his mind than solitude and sadness. The dark past, with its culminating night of horror, thrust itself before his memory again, compelling him to begin the struggle anew, reminding him that he was still in the toils of treachery, and must in some way cut himself loose from the meshes of the clinging net. It happened thuswise.

THE MIRACLE THAT WAS NOT PERFORMED.

THERE was once a learned doctor who had studied long and hard, but in Cucuguano, where he had settled, no one had faith in him. Meeting him always with a book in his hand, the Cucuguanese said:

"That doctor knows nothing—he is always studying. If he studies so much, it means he needs to learn; if he needs to learn, it means he does not know; if he does not know, he is an ignoramus."

A doctor without patients is like a lamp without oil. Without other resources, forced therefore to earn a living by hook or by crook, up to this time the poor man had not been able to pay even for the water he drank.

He decided that there must be a change. So one day he managed to spread abroad through all Cucuguano the report that his science was so sublime and all-powerful that not only could he heal the sick—mere child's play—but raise the dead as well. This miracle he promised to perform openly in broad daylight in the multitude.

Few gave credence to the report. Yet even the incredulous said:

"We will let him attempt it, anyhow. Let's see him at work—the proof of the pudding is the eating. He may succeed—he reads so much, and nowadays such wonderful discoveries are being made."

Finally it was settled that on the following Saturday, at the stroke of noon in the cemetery of Cucuguano the doctor would raise a man from the dead—nine or ten, some old women went so far as to say.

There was a crowd of people in the cemetery that morning, and, true to his word, on the second stroke of the bell the doctor appeared. He bowed to the crowd and began:

"My dear friends, I have promised to bring one of your dead back to life. I intend to keep my word. Be silent and hearken to me.

"It will cost me absolutely no effort to raise from the tomb Giacomo or Giovanni, Nannina or Betta, Amadeo or Simone. Shall I raise Simone? Simone—what was his last name? Simone Capannaro, who died of pleurisy a year ago."

"Excuse me, signor dottore," said Caterina, poor Simone's widow. "Certainly he was a fine fellow: he made me very happy, and I shall mourn him as long as I have eyes for tears. But, pray, do not bring him back; for, you see, towards the end of the month I'm to put off mourning, and, to please my family, I'm to marry Pasqualone."

"You did well to tell me, Caterina. Then I will raise Nina Carota, who died on Candlemas Day."

"For heaven's sake, signor dottore!" cried Giacomo Carota, "Nina was my wife; we lived together ten years—ten years of misery, as all Cucuguano knows. Let her rest where she is, for her sake and mine. Such a temper, doctor! Obstinate as a mule, lazy, and quarrelsome. And that is not all. But that's better left unsaid."

"Yet, my dear fellow——"

"Excuse me for interrupting, signor dottore. Nina left me three children, and, as I could not manage them alone, I have married again—so you see, it is useless."

"Well and good. I can conceive it would be martyrdom to have two wives in the house. Then whom shall I restore to you, my dear people? I must find some one. How about Master Pietro?"

"Ah, my poor father!" cried a voice. "May he rest in peace! A good man was he! But don't bring him back, pray, doctor! He who wished so much to see us a united family would be heartbroken to find our affairs in such a muddle. After a dozen law suits, the six of us—four sons and two daughters—have finally divided the property into six little strips. Each of us has a swarm of children; each of us has to shift for himself. There is not one of us who has anything to spare."

"So it cannot be?"

"No; if you should bring him back we would have to make up a little income for him among us all. But the times are so hard, doctor, you know. And the taxes are heavy——"

"Enough, we will let Master Pietro sleep on. But I have not come here for nothing. Tell me whom to raise."

"Ghita—bring back Ghita, my Ghita!" cried a poor old woman, weeping.

"No, no, doctor; do not wake her," interrupted a girl. "Oh, no, pretty creature; it's all well she died. We dressed her in white and put a wreath on her hair till she looked like a bride. Leave her in holy ground; the man she loved was killed."

"Poor Ghita! But you must admit you are making it hard for me. To put an end to it all, I will bring back Gringaletto, who was choked to death while eating dinner not a month ago."

"You must not—you must not," cried Lina Paparero, wringing her hands. "He sold me that vineyard of his on the instalment plan. For ten long years I've been paying in hard coin far more than its value, and now would you have me go on? He charged exorbitant interest. It's not fair, signor dottore."

"What's to be done? I'll try someone else. I see over there a little white wooden cross; the harebells seem trying to hide it; the tall grass is almost on a level with it. You can read that that narrow grave holds a ten-months-old baby. True, it seems half a pity to bring the tender soul back to this world to bear—what you have all been bearing. Still, if you wish him raised, say but the word, and I will display my power."

"Signor dottore," whispered a wrinkled crone, "that little one is ours, alas! I am the grandmother. My daughter had not yet weaned him; he was just cutting his teeth when suddenly he died. But God took him from us. God's will be done! Now there is another babe. God knows what He is doing. What he takes with one hand He gives back with the other. We are poor."

At this the doctor burst out:

"Enough for to-day, if not too much, indeed! Since you won't have the miracle now, I will perform it on another occasion. Only I beg of you to agree beforehand on the person to be brought to life."

And he strode away.

From that memorable day our cunning doctor has done wonders in Cucuguano. It is true he does not raise the dead, but he saves the lives of those who are ill. The Cucuguanese, now fully trusting him, say:

"If he did not fulfill his promise, to tell the truth, it was not his fault—it was ours."

NOTES OF INTEREST.

SWIMMER.—Some medical authorities assert that most of the supposed cases of drowning through "cramp" are not due to that cause at all. Many swimmers, if seized with cramp, could turn over on their backs and float for a time with the chance of being rescued. These authorities say that death results from a perforation of the drum of the ear, the pressure of the water causing vertigo and unconsciousness.

U. G. D.—Admirals and generals are of equal rank, but the former take the precedence in cases where two officers belonging to each grade meet together, the Navy being considered the most distinguished service.

QUERIST writes: "Is there any place in the heart of London where a watchman calls the hours of the night, as the old 'Charley' used to do? I have heard so."——Yes; in Ely Place, Holborn Circus. When the gates of this little street are closed, the watchman reigns supreme; the police have no legal right to enter; and the watchman must call the hours from eleven at night till five in the morning. An old charter gives the watchman the right to act in all respects as a policeman. Ely Place is governed by commissioners, the present Chief Commissioner being the well-known solicitor, Sir George Lewis.

R. B.—The Boers are descended from the Huguenots who left France under the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and from the Hollanders who emigrated at various times in search of civil and religious liberty.

G. W.—Wolves' skins make the best banjo drums.

T. S. would like to know why Santiago is sometimes called "Santiago de Cuba."——Because there are other places of that name, the Spaniards almost always (in ordinary circumstances) add the words "de Cuba." The three places best known by that name are, Santiago de Compostella, in Spain, which city claims to have relics of the Apostle St. James—Sant Iago, as the Spaniards call him. The Apostle is said to have founded the city. The other two are the Cuban stronghold and the capital of Chili.

L. E. N.—Yes, corsets have been found on the waists of Egyptian mummies.

W. R. G.—Practically, a judge cannot be removed from his office, as to do this it is necessary to obtain the intervention of the Sovereign on an address presented by both Houses of Parliament. Such a proceeding is very rarely necessary, as judges are generally more willing to resign than to be deprived from any cause of their official robes.

MY readers will observe this week that we have begun "The Final War" in Short Stories, and I most strongly recommend everyone to read the opening chapters. It is without doubt one of the finest war stories ever written, and dealing, as it does, with places and persons the names of whom you are well acquainted it is of special interest. Another series of stories under the heading "Untold Stories of the Indian Mutiny" starts in this number, and I may say in connection with this series that all the facts are absolutely correct. The author is thoroughly acquainted with every phase of Hindoo life, and has heard the stories mostly from the lips of those who were actually through the Mutiny.

T. B. T. writes to ask what quadruped is the most numerous all the world over.——Without a doubt, the rat. Every continent of the world has its variety of rat. It has been found in most of the South Sea and Indian Ocean islands, and the remote rocks of Ascension and St. Helena have long been its home.

W. H. wants to know if the artificial incubation of eggs is a modern invention.——Far from it. It was practised by the Chinese and the ancient Egyptians. Diodorus, who wrote forty years B.C., tells us "that the Egyptians, with their own hands, bring eggs to maturity, and the chickens thus produced are not inferior to those hatched in the ordinary manner."

H. G.—Counterfeit sovereigns and shillings are usually made of electro-plated iron. The false coins will not bend, and, standing any of the ordinary tests, are successfully passed in considerable numbers.

GREETING.—No, the shake of the hands has not always been the common form of greeting in England. Down to the reign of Charles II. the kiss was the common form of greeting for friends and strangers alike, and shaking hands was a mark of close intimacy or high favour. Anne, Countess of Pembroke, one of those ladies whose diaries have been made public property, used to note in her diary the persons with whom she had shaken hands, as though it were something out of the ordinary to greet anyone in that fashion.

W. T.—Russia has 650,000 hereditary nobles, and 380,000 whose nobility expires with them. A nobleman has few, if any, privileges as such. He must enter the army or civil service to obtain precedence in Society.

A. P. L.—The Chinese prefix "Ah" to a person's name is an endearing diminutive, equivalent to Tom-my, Sam-my, John-ny in the English language.

H. R.—No, clergymen are not allowed to enter trade of any description. This was not always so. In olden times it was not at all an uncommon thing for clergy, who were very badly paid, to eke out a living by trade dealings. The Abbot of St. Albans, in the time of Henry III., might be seen behind his stall selling Yarmouth bloaters, and those who wished to obtain foreign goods cheaply in the time of Henry VI. had but to apply to a couple of Iceland bishops, who had received a license from the King for smuggling.

L. H. G.—Napoleon Bonaparte was never wounded. Wellington was once, but only very slightly.

HUSSAR.—There are several explanations of the origin of this name, but the most probable is that it is derived from the Magyar word, houtsar—"twentieth." In 1445 it was found necessary to take important steps for the preservation of Hungarian territory, and a law was passed compelling the peasants to supply one man out of every twenty to serve as a soldier—and that man must be a horseman. The first hussars were from the plains, and at the present time the Hungarian hussars are the best light cavalry in the world.

T. R. SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

Miss S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

25 Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

Miss M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."

Mrs. F. HARPER, 61 Portland Crescent, Leeds, writes: "My doctor persuaded me to try a box, and I find they have done my breathing a lot of good and I can get about much better. My doctor did not wish his name mentioned, but they have done him good personally."

A. BROWN, of 25 Edwin Street, High Pallion, Sunderland, says: "You have no idea what a most wonderful effect the Tablets had. I am a great deal thinner, and better in health."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity.

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

L. LUDDRINGTON, "Sunnyside," Station Road, Sidcup, says: "I have benefited greatly, and have lost a stone."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Miss A. ATKINS, 329 Southdown Road, Liverpool, writes: "I lost nearly a stone from taking one box."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

Mrs. JAMES SMITH, of Cowell Terrace, Soham, says: "Your 2s. 6d. box of Tablets reduced my weight 12lb."

Mrs. WOODS, 447 Cowbridge Road, Canton, Cardiff, says: "Tablets have a most marked effect, and I shall take every opportunity to make known the wonders of your remedy."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

"Miss HUMPHREYS, of Claremont Buildings, Shrewsbury, has lost 1st. in weight already, and thinks the Tablets deserve every success."

Mrs. O'CONNOR, 2 Kensington Square Mansions, London, writes: "I am much less stout for taking them."

Surgeon Colonel E. S. BRANDER writes from Ihansi, India, in September, 1897: "Your Tablets in my own experience form an excellent remedy for reducing weight."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Miss J. GUISE, 3 North End, Croydon, says: "I cannot speak too highly of the Tablets; I was stout all my life until a few weeks ago, when I first began your treatment. I was surprised to find they acted so admirably. I am now getting quite a slender figure, besides being better in health."

Balgowan Lodge, Methven, N.B.

Miss MCPHERSON writes: "I have taken a box, and am reduced 1st. in weight."

SHORT STORIES

No. 502. ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending August 13th, 1898.

The Neglected Grave.

"I DON'T think it is fair," said Sophie, as she gave the pebbles at her feet a vindictive shove.

"I don't either," said Otto, as resolutely. "Old Fritz was a soldier just as much as anybody, wasn't he? A soldier's a soldier, isn't he, even if he does get old and die very poor and ragged?"

"Course he is!" chimed in Herman, stopping a moment in his play. "He went to the war, one of the very first one's, and all through it. I heard father say so."

"And he's buried in the churchyard and among the poor graves," exclaimed Sophie, "and no one takes any notice of him, or decorates his grave, or anything!"

Herman shook his head.

"Well, I don't think it's fair," she repeated again.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" asked Herman, piling up two sticks.

"He's the only soldier here, and people didn't trouble about him."

"But why didn't they?" asked Sophie, exasperated. "In Berlin and other places they have a great time, don't they, and decorate the men's graves that haven't been braver than old Fritz?"

"Yes, they do," Otto spoke up after a thoughtful silence, "and everybody's going to Berlin at the end of this week to bury a soldier. I heard father say so."

"They always do, and its going to be extra this time, 'cause they've got a big man, a general or somebody, who was in the war, to speak to 'em, and they've got a lot of money and going to do things fine, band and speeches, and people will go from ever so far."

Sophie's eyes glowed.

"I'd like to be there," she cried, clasping her hands.

"You want to be in things just the same as everybody else does. You're blaming them for not decorating old Fritz's grave and now you want to go yourself, just the same's the others," said Otto.

Sophie was silent for a moment.

"Supposing we decorate that grave ourselves?" she said slowly.

Otto stared.

"And have a procession and everything," continued the girl gravely.

"I don't suppose it makes much difference who decorates, seeing its' done, and I think our flowers would look just as good as anybody s."

"And you, Otto, and Herman"—a bit uncertain—"and perhaps Maria and Heinrich can have a nice procession and go there, and it'll be just as good as if the regular people did it."

"That would do splefididly," assented Otto, "but flags cost such a lot."

"Do you have to have flags?"

Herman nodded.

"It wouldn't be decorating without one," he decided. "You have to have one, at least, to stick into the grave, so's to tell he was a soldier. It doesn't have to be very big, but you've got to have one."

"I don't see what we can do," said Otto, discouraged. "It's only three days off, and we can't any of us go over to Müllheim to buy one, and then we haven't got the money."

"I'll make one," said Sophie.

"Oh, yes, I can!" as the boys looked at her doubtfully.

"I don't suppose it will be very good, but it'll be a flag all right, so why shouldn't it do?"

"We've got some carpet cuttings upstairs and I know I can find some pieces, 'cause my old red dress is there, and there's lots of blue calico. Only Herman will have to draw the picture on the flag; I couldn't do that."

Herman thought he could do that, and the children went back at once to begin.

* * * * *

A solitary rider on horseback rode down the country lane.

He glanced sharply to the right, then dismounting, opened a gate and turned into the faint path which led across the fields to the little church and cemetery.

He threw the reins over his horse's head and let him graze at will. Then he wandered into the little graveyard.

He had scarce reached the spot when, approaching from another direction, came a little procession of five children, laden with flowers.

A boy led the way, beating now and then on a battered drum.

The man slipped behind a tree.

The little procession passed through the gate, and, marching solemnly onward, paused beside a neglected grave.

"We must plant the flag now, Sophie," said the biggest boy.

She handed it to him.

The man leant forward. The flag was a curious affair and made him smile.

The boy took it gravely and stuck it firmly into the soft ground at the head of the grave.

"We must sing," he announced.

Five young voices in five different keys struggled bravely through "Die Wacht am Rhein."

The man drew nearer.

"Now, we must pray," said Sophie, glancing down at the paper in her hands. The five children knelt about the grave. The boys removed their caps.

"Our Father," began Sophie in a tremulous voice. The others joined her. Then Maria said a simple prayer. The rest listened in silence, but joined in "Amen."

The eyes of the looker-on filled with tears.

"Now we must put on the flowers."

Quickly but tenderly the straggling grass-grown grave was covered with flowers. They were of all colours.

"Now I'll read you a few words from the Bible about the soldier's armour," said Herman, and slowly the familiar words fell from his boyish lips.

Just then Maria's roving eye caught sight of a man, who was close beside them now. She gave a little jump.

"I will tell you the story of comrade Fritz, here," he began abruptly, but with a pleasant smile. He stood at the head of the grave bareheaded, with the sun shining on his grey hair.

They drew about him. Then he told them of Fritz's courage in war, and what the war was about and how it should teach them to be true and brave, and the children listened with scarce a breath for fear of losing a single word.

"And I had come here to-day to do honour to my fallen comrade," he added. "But I find that you have done it already—more than I could do."

He glanced at the rough flag. There were tears in his eyes.

The silk one in his hand fell to the ground.

Otto picked it up and would have planted it on the grave.

"No," said the man; "keep it. Yours alone shall do honour to-day."

And after a few more words the little procession marched away, while the general—for he was a noted general—stood watching them with head uncovered until they had vanished from sight.

Then, with a farewell glance at the flower-strewn grave with its homely flag fluttering in the soft May breeze, he rode rapidly away.

* * * * *

"And it was you, children?" Sophie's mother said the next day.

"The general told us all about it in his speech last night, and he said we must emulate your example."

She looked very proud and happy as she kissed the children.

"We'll do it every year," said Herman, looking at the new silk flag hanging on the wall.

"Of course we will," said the others.

James Hartley.

THE RESCUE ON THE NORTH ROAD.

I WAS ever a careless, hot-headed fellow; one of those whom a slight injustice will quickly drive to the bad, yet withal easily drawn back to the good by a loving hand. That were a sign of weakness, perhaps; yet I had enough strength—in the way of obstinacy and courage—to satisfy the most exacting.

Thus it happened that when my father — whose memory I still revere—blamed me for a fault that was not mine, my anger blazed up at the injustice, I shook the dust of the family mansion from my feet, saddled my good mare, and turned her head in the direction of far-off London, where I hoped by good luck to find favour with the King.

But, alack! like many another, I was disappointed; and smarting under the sense of the wrong done to me at home—now rendered more keen by the failure of my hopes—I rapidly drifted into what my dear mother used to call the crooked path.

Ask me not how I came to be dubbed a swashbuckler before I had been many months in the capital; question me not concerning the evil repute that accrued to my name; let me tell of my last adventure in that capacity, and what it led to.

I was seated at a table in the parlour of the "Black Boar" one evening. My fortunes were at a low ebb; I had had but one gold piece left when I arose that morning, and I fear that I must confess that I had spent most of the change in an endeavour to drown my sorrows. I suppose I must have fallen into a drunken slumber, for I mind me that someone shook me heavily.

I lifted my head from my chest and gazed with stupid solemnity at the figure before me; and when my muddled brain became a little clearer, I recognised Sir Reginald Wenbow, who was known to me by sight and by repute.

"Zounds!" quoth he, as he seated himself in a chair at the opposite side of the table. "I have had some trouble to find you, Master Sellon, and almost as much difficulty in waking you. You might have chosen a less evil-looking and foul-smelling place than this. And when your addled brain is——"

But I permitted him to go no farther with his insolence.

"You were under no necessity to seek me," I retorted fiercely, "and now that you have found me, let your speech be civil!" And I put my hand upon the hilt of my sword.

"Tut, tut! Keep your spleen for others. I have work for you to do."

"An' it pleases me to do it," I replied quietly.

"You are good as a fencer, I have heard," he went on, pretending not to notice my remark, though I knew by his face that he did not relish my freedom of speech, "and have had some experience of brawls."

"You forget that I am hotheaded!" I said warningly. For though I had earned the character, I liked not to be told of it; I had some good left in me.

"I am Sir Reginald Wenbow," he said.

"A name as well-known as my own," I replied with much significance. For there were some pretty stories afloat about him.

He sprang up with an oath, and half drew his blade. I quickly followed his example. Then he burst into a mirthless laugh, and sat down again.

"We cannot afford to quarrel," he said. "I want the services of a man such as you, and you want money. Let us proceed to business. We can talk freely here, as we have the room to ourselves."

It was true that I wanted money; did I not get some soon, I should have to turn common robber on the highway.

"To-morrow evening I have a little venture on hand. A lady will be in danger along the North Road beyond Islington, as she is coming into London. I have heard of the plot and I intend to save her. I want your help."

"You shall have it!" I exclaimed heartily, for a woman in distress was always sure of the succour of Master Sellon. "I want no pay for that."

"It is my affair," he said, "and I ask your help; so I pay for it. Seeing that you are willing to go with me, meet me to-morrow evening at six of the clock, mounted and ready at the 'Red Calf,' near the lower end of the North Road—you know it?"

"Aye," responded I, "but the mount? I have had to sell my mare."

He put some money down on the table, and, after a few more words, he left me.

I was punctual at the appointed place on the following evening, mounted upon my own mare, which I had been fortunate enough to buy back from the man to whom I had sold it. I was greatly pleased thereat, for a man feels more sure of himself on a nag whose tricks and qualities are known to him. Sir Reginald came up soon afterwards, and we set out on our—or his—venture.

It was towards autumn, and a most uncomfortable season. The wind blew chilly across the heath, and we were glad to skirt the highway and keep as much under the shelter of the trees as 'twas possible to do. Moreover, that course suited Sir Reginald's plans.

I marvelled somewhat at this venture. It seemed to me that had Sir Reginald been the assailant instead of the rescuer 'twould have better befitted his character.

We had ridden some distance when we came to a rise in the ground just overlooking a bend in the road. Standing in a clump of trees we should be hidden from those travelling on the road.

"We will await their arrival here," said Wenbow.

It was dusk, and the moon was covered by clouds. It was not a pleasant thing to wait there, and I began quickly to tire.

"How do you know that there is danger?" I asked after a few moments.

"Because I make it," he replied coolly.

"Mayhap, you will be good enough to explain, gentle sir," I remarked, curbing my temper. "I am no hand at riddles."

"I create the danger from which I rescue the fair lady," he went on. "I seek to win her favour, but hitherto I have met with but little success." I could well believe it if the lady had heard the stories that had come to my ears. "This is a little plot to win my way into her good graces and those of her respected guardian."

He then unfolded the course of action, which I was fain to admit was by no means a bad one.

A little more waiting, then my ears were gladdened by the sounds of travellers approaching us. Two minutes later a coach came in sight round the bend in the road.

Touching my mare with the spur, I made her jump into the path; at the same time I cried in a loud voice for the driver to pull up, and fired one pistol in the air. The object was to create the idea that several men were attacking the coach, and there was no manner of doubt that the object was attained. The driver pulled up and shouted, the horses, terrified, reared and plunged, and the man who was riding outside fired his pistol at me, slightly wounding me in the left arm.

Such a scene of confusion was rarely seen on any similar spot in His Majesty's dominions, I ween. In the midst of it up dashed Wenbow with more cries. There was a pistol shot from him, another from a man on the coach, a scream from a woman in the coach, and oaths in a man's voice from the interior of the vehicle, and then, as I dashed off—to return again as one of the rescuers in a brief space—I heard another shot and a cry of anguish from the driver.

As soon as I got to the trees I made a terrible noise as of men fighting, and then turned my mare—who had behaved as I knew she would—back to the road and returned to the coach, crying out that the villains had fled.

I was just in time to prevent the horses from running off with the coach and its occupants. Both the driver and the other man were nowhere to be seen, nor could I understand whither my companion had disappeared. Having quieted the animals, I attached the reins to a tree and was about to open the door to reassure the lady and gentleman, when I heard Wenbow groaning near by.

I found him on the ground, badly bruised; his horse had stumbled, thrown him heavily, and then bolted. I dismounted, picked him up, and carried him to the door of the coach.

"There is no further cause for alarm," I said, doffing my hat to the invisible occupants. "We have driven off the assailants, but my friend is hurt and has lost his horse, so I beg that you will take him in with you, and I will drive you to your destination."

There was no response, so, after vainly trying to penetrate the obscurity and gain a glimpse of the young and pretty maid within—I knew by her scream that she was young, and I judged her to be pretty—I opened the door.

"Are they gone? Where are our driver and our guard?" asked a gruff voice. But, in spite of his gruffness, he could not hide a tremor in his tones.

"By my faith, I know not where they are, good sir," said I, answering the last inquiry first. "But you are safe, and if you will take care of my friend, who risked his life to save you, and tell me your destination, I will drive you there."

"Why, it is none other than Sir Reginald Wenbow!" exclaimed the old gentleman.

And I heard an exclamation from the maid that methought was not quite expressive of pleasure.

However, they took him in, and the old gentleman thanked me and told me where to go; and, after vainly trying to catch a glimpse of the lady, I attached my mare to the side and prepared to mount the coach.

I thought I would give another look round for the driver. I found him stretched on the ground, dead. Wenbow must have shot him. The guard had fled.

As I walked back to the coach, I caught a glimpse of the face that I had been trying to see. In an instant it was gone in the darkness of the interior, but the features I had seen by the light of the moon, which was shining now, set my blood to leaping in my veins and my mind to pondering. Where had I seen that face? How pretty it was!

By the time we reached the mansion near the river to which the old gentleman had directed me, Wenbow had sufficiently recovered to take his venture in hand again. He dismissed me somewhat curtly, saying that he would see me on the morrow; and I, ashamed of my part in the affair, though I could not explain why, was glad to get away before that pretty damsel could see me. That was not my usual disposition.

On the morrow Wenbow called upon me, true to his word, and paid me several gold pieces, which I was fain to accept for the reason that I was without one single coin after having paid my just debts to my host of the "Black Boar." I thought that that was the last of the affair on the North Road. But I was mistaken.

Two days passed; it was the third day after the so-called rescue. I was sauntering along without purpose, and found myself passing the mansion to which I had driven the coach. I cast my eyes up at it as I went by, and then moodily continued my walk. I had proceeded some distance when I felt a touch upon my shoulder. Turning, I saw a lacquey holding a note.

"I am commissioned to give this to you and ask you to read it, Master Sellon," he said with a bow.

"How in the——," I began. But I cut my words and opened the note, even while I wondered how he knew my name and who had sent him.

"I will follow you," I told him when I had spelled out the few lines. My face flushed when I read the name at the foot of the writing, and the rascal of a lacquey noticed it—confound him!

She! How——? What——? My head was full of confused thoughts as I followed him back to the mansion which I had gazed at so wonderingly. I but dimly recall what passed until I found myself face to face with the maid of the coach!

"So I have found you at last, Master Sellon!" she cried, her pretty face all aglow with pleasure, her hand outstretched. "To think that you should have been one of our deliverers, and I should not have recognised you!"

I bent low over her hand and kissed it, to hide my shame and confusion.

"I have changed since the time we played together as children in our happy country home," I summoned courage to reply. "It is so long since you left us, and you, too, are changed, Lady Mary. I was not aware that you were in London."

"I have not been here long," she replied. "I heard Sir Reginald Wenbow call you 'Master Sellon' that night, but before I could be sure that it was you, you had disappeared. I tried to find you, and——" She paused, and then went on again in some confusion. "I saw you pass a while ago and sent after you."

I caught the glance in her eye, and I felt that in trying to find me, she had heard of my evil reputation. Despite my efforts, I blushed to the roots of my hair for very shame I should have fallen so low and that my boyhood's playmate should learn of my unworthy doings. Then my anger rose, and I felt defiant. Was it not all due to the unjust accusation brought against me?

"You have heard evil things of me," I cried, looking her boldly in the face.

"I have—many," was her response in a low voice, "but I do not believe them! My childhood's friend could not act thus!"

Heavens! How those words, uttered in that soft tone by that sweet maiden, cut me to the heart! My defiant attitude was upset, and my head fell upon my breast as I answered:

"They are true!"

"Master Sellon!" The voice was softer than ever.

My arm trembled as I felt the touch of her hand upon it. I looked up and tried to meet her eyes boldly. We thus stood for a second; and then I burst forth.

"My father drove me to it by his injustice. He accused me and slurred my honour for a sin that was not mine. I left his house and came here. But fate was against me—and——"

I stopped. The excuse seemed so pitiful, and the flush deepened on my cheeks.

"Your father has found out the truth and will gladly welcome you home," she said. "I saw him but recently." There was no chiding in her voice and I blessed her for her goodness. "Promise me," she went on, "that you will not again use your sword in unseemly brawls, and let me thank you for your bravery three nights ago."

I promised her, and asked myself whether I should tell her the truth of that adventure. As I again raised her hand to my lips, the door was flung open and in strode Sir Reginald Wenbow.

"What are you doing here, brawler?" he demanded in braggart tones. "Begone from this lady's presence!"

"What right have you to ask that question and issue that command?" I retorted. "And if I have been a brawler, you have been glad of my services. Have you told the lady the story of the rescue?"

Lady Mary looked curiously from him to me and from me to him. He became furious, and drew his sword.

"You knave!" he cried hoarsely. "I will chastise you as you deserve, and put it out of your power to tell false tales!"

"I would make you eat your words and chastise you for unseemly conduct in a lady's presence," I responded hotly, "were it not that I have promised——"

"Oh, defend yourself, Master Sellon!" screamed Lady Mary, in terror, as she saw him rush towards me with drawn sword.

I waited for nothing else. My blade leapt from its sheath, and in an instant we were fiercely engaged, while my sweet guiding angel cowered, fearful, in a corner.

The fight was a desperate one. We were both skilled in the use of the weapon, but he was the more skilful. He pinked me in the shoulder and in the arm, but try as I might I could not touch him. He laughed at me and I lunged furiously. That act of imprudence nearly cost me my life, but luckily I was quick enough to parry the thrust.

Then my turn came. His success made him careless; he gave me an opening and I took it. My blade went through him, he sank to the floor with a moan, and I leant against the wall and wept that all this should have happened before her, and that I should be such a brawler.

I was aroused by two things; the sound of voices and footsteps, and a cry from Mary—Lady Mary. I turned to find myself confronted by some of the King's troops.

I threw down my sword and held out my hands. I imagined that I was to be arrested for killing Sir Reginald, who—despite his character—had powerful friends. But the captain, after casting a glance at the motionless body, shook his head.

"I came for him," he said. "He has been found out at last in his plots against the King. You have afforded him a more honourable death than he would otherwise have had."

Then I swooned like a silly wench!

Sweet Mary! Poor Wenbow! I have to thank him and bless her for bringing me back to an honourable career. By the influence of her guardian I received an appointment in the King's service, and when my father next saw me he had reason to be proud, instead of ashamed, of me.

Lady Mary became my Mary three years later, after I had received the honour of knighthood at the King's hands, and has ever been my guiding angel.

Why do I say that I have to thank Wenbow in part for my good fortune? Because that good fortune resulted from my participation in the "Rescue on the North Road."

Untold Tales of the Indian Mutiny.

By H. HUNTER.

II.—"AN UNCLASSIFIED QUADRUPED."

Captain Dowsett glanced up quickly from the paper on which he was writing. The orderly was bringing a man into the tent. The man, who was wearing the khaki uniform then authorised for service in the field, acknowledged the Captain's glance by bringing the two forefingers of his right hand to a level with his eyebrow, and suddenly letting his arm drop motionless to his side. He stood thus, in the military attitude of attention, till the pen ceased to travel over the paper, and Captain Dowsett, looking up again, said:

"Well, Smithers, anything fresh? I'm just closing my report."

Dowsett was the officer in command of the picket on outpost duty between Jalalabad and Sir James Outram's camp at the back of the Alambágh—the Garden of the World—which lay on the Cawnpore road about two miles from the royal city of Lucknow. Colonel Berkeley, chief of the staff, going his morning rounds, would visit the picket in due course, and Captain Dowsett was busy with his report.

"I've seen him agin, sir," replied the man.

Captain Dowsett balanced his pen on his forefinger for a couple of minutes, evidently puzzled by the statement of Private Smithers.

"It's a funny sort of story, Smithers," he said at last, throwing himself back in his cane chair and looking hard at the man, "but I suppose I ought to make a note of it. You've spoken to your right and left hand men?"

"Yus, sir."

"And what do they say?"

"They see nothin'."

"And you've seen him now, three times in as many weeks?"

"Yus, sir, reg'lar."

"But not on the same night of the week?"

"No, sir, diff'ren' nights."

"And each time he comes from the same direction, takes the same course, and disappears at the same place?"

"Yus, sir."

Captain Dowsett bent over the camp-table and recommenced writing; but presently stopped.

"Do you remember exactly when it was you saw him first?" he inquired.

"T wo days before the Pandis tried to cut off our rear at Gaili."

"Yes, and the next? Just go over the story again, Smithers, will you? I'll put it in my report for the Colonel. It's a curious sort of tale certainly, but at least it will show the Headquarter Staff that we keep our eyes open out here, and if anything comes of it I'll see that you get the corporal's stripes."

"Well, sir," began Smithers, a little awkwardly—he didn't relish having to "yarn" to the Captain—"it was the week before Chris'mas, yer know, when I went on at the batt'ry what the Engineers is makin' up there between the camp and the fort. An' one night, leastways it was dark, there was no moon, but the sky was clear with a fair sprinkle o' stars, an' I reckoned it was about two or three a.m. Well, I see somethin' come out o' that there mango tope—you know the patch, sir——"

The Captain nodded.

"An' creep along in the shadder, close to the groun', till it was opposite the garden wall of the mosque that's between us and the villages down by the canal.

"I see it leap over the wall, slip roun' the mosque, and then disappear."

"Yes," from the Captain.

"'What the dickens is that now?' says I. 'Tain't a man, I'll bet my life; an' there's no hanimals as I knows of in that mango tope.'

"Then I pinched meself to make sure as I wasn't dreamin'. It was a fair buster, Capt'in. Whatever it might be, it was a dark objec' that went on four legs. It got over the groun' pretty fast, and seemed to go with a hop, step, an' a run.

"The queerest part o' the bis'ness to my thinkin' was that it should slink along just outside the trees but well inside the shadder, as if afraid o' showin' its ugly mug in the open, never stoppin' for a look roun' or to smell at nothin', as you'd naturally expec' any proper sort of hanimal would do; but keepin' on with a shamblin' sort o' trot straight for the old mosque what we drove the Pandis out of last October.

"'There ain't nothin' to eat there, mister,' thinks I; and then Sharland, my left-hand man, challenging: 'All's well,' and everythin' being quiet in front, I jest put it at the back o' me mind, till I gets another chance with him.

"That, sir, come on New Year's night. It was jest sich another night as before. The moon went down about twelve, an' save for a han'ful o' stars the sky was as black as ink.

"Every time I came abreast o' that mango tope I watched it with all my eyes.

"By and bye, I see something moving slowly along the edge—it was goin' stealthy-like, an' I watched it for all I knew. It wasn't a walk, it wasn't a run. It was on all fours, with its nose to the groun', goin' between a creep and a crawl, its legs gathered up under it; like no hanimal as I ever see, in field or forest.

"'You're a rum un,' says I, 'whatever breed you belong to: an' if I on'y had the loan o' the Captain's glass for one five minutes, I guess I'd put a name to your old carkiss, and maybe a bullet thro' your black old hide.'

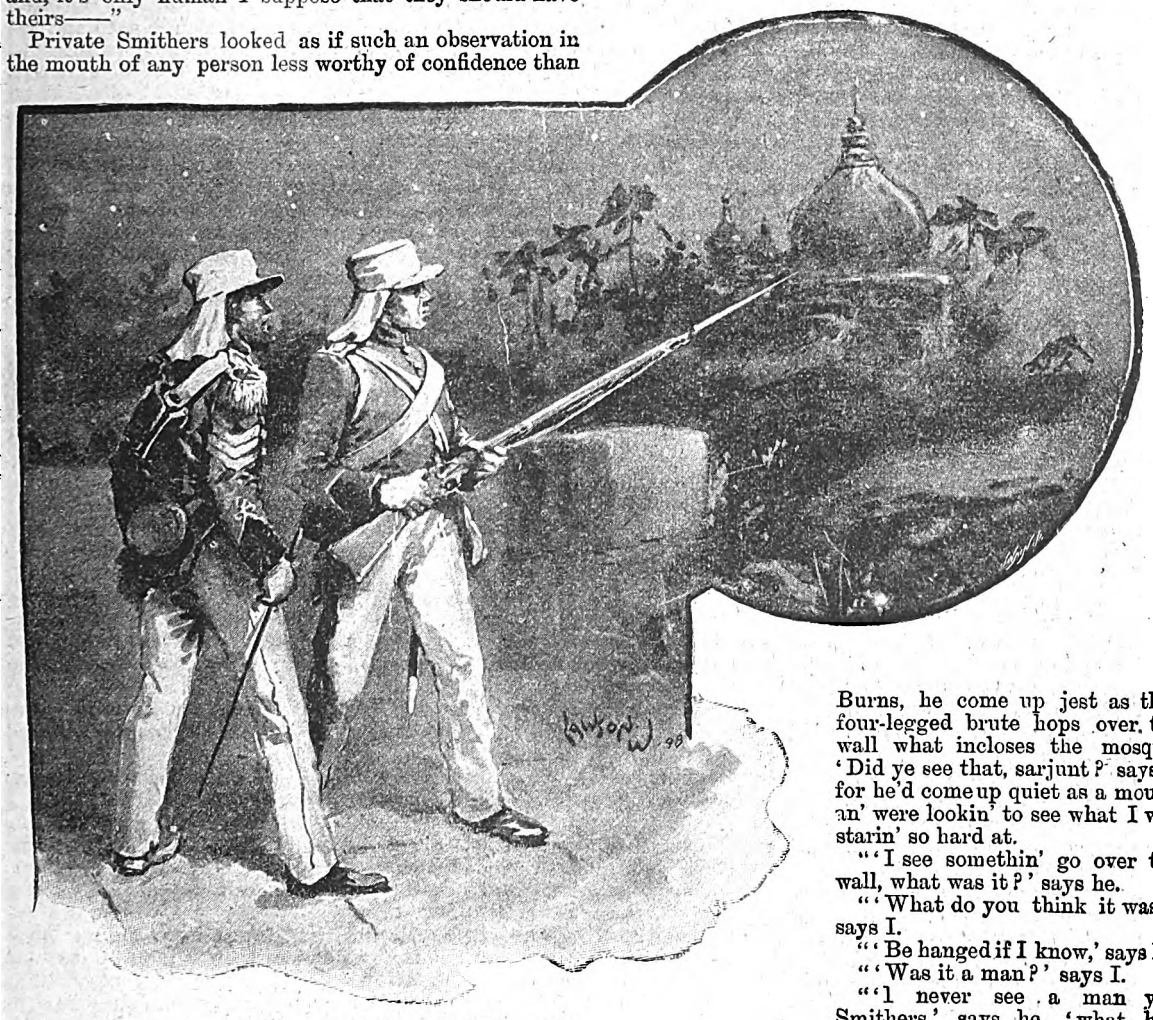
"I minds, sir, all of a suddent, what Cun'nel Barkley said after the scrimmage at Gaili. 'Them rascals,' says he, 'have got somebody who's supplyin' 'em with information. They couldn't ha' gone straight for the key o' the whole position by 'appy haccident.' You remember, sir?"

"Yes," said Dowsett, "I remember. There's no doubt information is conveyed. We've got our spies: and, it's only human I suppose that they should have theirs——"

Private Smithers looked as if such an observation in the mouth of any person less worthy of confidence than Captain Dowsett would have brought down upon the head of the unfortunate offender a perfect avalanche of barrack-room expletives and stable-yard objurgations.



"'Did ye see that, sarjunt?' says I."

"And that we," continued the Captain, catching sight of Smithers' face and amused at the look of supreme disgust that was plainly expressed there, "that we should catch them and hand them over to the tender mercies of the Military Commission. So you imagine this unclassified quadruped to be a spy—eh?"

For the moment, Private Smithers was brought up "all standing." His own vocabulary was limited. The unfamiliar words made use of by his officer in describing the "hanimal," sounded in his ears uncommonly like laughing at him; and not being quite able to gather their exact meaning, he was dumb.

The Captain came to his man's assistance.

"And this time of sighting him, you spoke to the sergeant?"

"Yus, sir," said Smithers. The question started him again on the main track of his narrative. "Sarjunt Burns, he come up jest as that four-legged brute hops over the wall what incloses the mosque. 'Did ye see that, sarjunt?' says I, for he'd come up quiet as a mouse, an' were lookin' to see what I was starin' so hard at.

"'I see somethin' go over the wall, what was it?' says he.

"'What do you think it was?' says I.

"'Be hanged if I know,' says he.

"'Was it a man?' says I.

"'I never see a man yet, Smithers,' says he, 'what had four legs to his share, and that brute, I'll swear had got four of 'em, an' a tail as long as a cow's behind 'em.'

"'It come out o' that mango tope,' says I, 'went all along there by the fringe o' trees, slunk thro' the high crop, shuffled across the bit o' scrub yonder; then popp'd over the wall, slipped roun' the side o' the mosque and went down by the bamboo huts to the canal.'

"'Gone for a drink, p'raps,' says the sarjunt. 'Drink be hanged,' says I.

"'Jack Pandi ho'ds all that groun' over there, don't he? He's in the villages on the canal, ain't he? How came he to go straight for our right centre at Gaili? That four-legged beggar give 'im the tip. How else, eh?'

"'There ain't no beasts in that mango tope that we

knows of, sarjunt, is there? An' beasts, I reckin, can't do with on'y one drink a week mor'n men.'

"'This ain't the fust time I've seen this 'ere beast,' says I. 'I didn't make any report, no. 'Cos why? Well, you see, I'd on'y got half a tale to tell, an' the ripple o' laughter isn't a pleasant soun' to hear when the laugh's agin yerself, sarjunt. What do you think?'

"'He come out o' the mango tope—this brute, beast or devil—two nights before gaili; and went thro' jest the same performance then, that he's gone thro' now; an' tho' I watched till me eyes fair stood out o' me head wi' strainin', I couldn't make up my mind what name to give him. I couldn't get a fair look at him no-how, any more than I've done to-night.'

"'But I'll bet he ain't one o' the beasts what went into the Ark—leastways not on four legs. None o' Noah's beasts would ha' been so mighty par'ticlar abart keepin' his carkiss close in the shadder, or so uncommon careful to choose the darkest hour o' night, the nearest spot to the garden wall, an' jest the very place to come out on, where he's least exposed to observation from the picket. It's only from this one point,' says I, 'as we're standin' on, sarjunt, that you can see both the corner of the grove and the wall of the mosque; an' it's bad seein' at the best in this light.'

"'I b'lieve you're right, Smithers,' says Sarjunt Burns. 'He didn't jump like a beast, did he now?"

"'No,' says I, 'not like a nat'ral sort o' beast. An' he didn't jump like a man either. These black scum keep all sorts o' gods an devils in their heathen temples. Why shouldn't it be some monstrosity without a name, eh? One o' Satan's own fathering, you understan'.'

"'I don't know why it shouldn't,' says he, 'but I'll speak to the Captain.'

"Yes," interjected that officer, who, having got all the facts he wanted, was anxious to close his report, "and I asked you to report to me, Smithers, if you saw the beast again."

"Yus, sir."

"And you have seen him again?"

"Yus, sir."

Smithers, thankful the "yarning" was over, answered the direct questions of his captain with military brevity.

"But you can't say now, positively, what it is?"

"No, sir. 'Taint a beast as was ever born in a jungle."

"The same actions were repeated on this occasion as on the former?"

"There was no difference, sir, as I could see. He always appears and vanishes at the same points. I never see anythin' of him after he whips roun' the side o' that old mosque. He never comes back, sir—after he's had his drink," added Private Smithers slily.

Captain Dowsett laughed.

"You may go now, but I'll come and keep watch with you at the battery to-night."

"An' see nothin' for your pains," muttered Smithers to himself, as he left the captain's tent. "That devil's dog don't venture out of his hole, wherever he hides, any too often, I reckon. He ain't gone across the canal for nothin' this time, I guess.

"Them Pandis have been a deuced sight too quiet, since we give 'em pepper at Gaili not to mean mischief. There's trouble a brewin'—an' be hanged to 'em, more widders, an' orphins in the old country.

"Praise the Lord, Bob Smithers, that ye're not a married man."

II.

It was four o'clock in the afternoon of the 15th of January, 1858.

Captain Dowsett was enjoying a cigar. He had watched with Private Smithers at the unfinished battery on the Cawnpoor road every night for best part of a week; but, as Smithers had anticipated, without being gratified with a sight of "the beast."

He had briefly noticed the matter in his daily report after his interview with his man, and Colonel Berkeley had brought it before the General; but nothing had followed, and the Captain was very much inclined to think that the Indian night and Smithers' imagination were responsible for the apparition.

At that very moment an Englishman—a member of the Uncovenanted Service—disguised as a native swashbuckler; wearing tight silk trousers, tight fitting muslin shirt and short silk jacket of brilliant yellow, his face stained with lamp black and oil, and his feet encased in scarlet slippers with curled uppers and pointed toes was detailing to Sir James Outram and Colonel Berkeley the exact position of affairs in the city.

So closely in his dress and appearance did he resemble one of the Budmashis, whose garb he had adopted, that he was fired on twice by the picket before he got safely inside the British lines and declared himself. He had run the double risk of discovery by the rebels and death from the bullet of an English sentry.

He brought word that for the past fortnight Ahmad Shah, the famous Moulvie of Faizabad had been preaching a holy war against the English, and working up the rebels, both Hindoostanis and Mussulmans, to a pitch of fanatical frenzy by declaring that the god Hanumán had visited the city and disclosed to the Chief Brúhmin the weakness of the British position.

There was, said the Moulvie, over a hundred thousand armed men in Lucknow and less than four thousand white faces outside; and of these, five hundred had been detached to convoy supplies on the way from Cawnpore.

Sir James looked at Colonel Berkeley and the Colonel looked back at Sir James. There was no need for speech.

The look they exchanged said plain as spoken words: "Someone is playing traitor."

Hanúmán, so ran the narrative delivered by the speaker, had directed the attack to be made between the 12th and 16th of the month. They were favourable days, and he had promised, himself, to lead his followers to the assault.

Victory, the Moulvie had urged upon the men, was certain. The new batteries were without guns, the battery near the fort was unfinished, only half a Company was on duty there; and Hanúmán would be with his people in the fight, to show them where to strike the decisive blow.

"The Moulvie," added the informant, "left the city with a considerable force on the previous night, his objective being Banni."

"Exactly," remarked the General quietly. "With intent to cut off the convoy, of whose approach he has had warning. Then he must have turned our camp, Berkeley, and taken up position on the Cawnpore Road."

"By the way, Mr. Rollinson," he continued, addressing the gay looking individual in silk jacket and cream coloured turban. "What you tell us about Hanúmán is welcome news. It clears up a little matter concerning which there's been much speculation and a good deal of mystery. That's the beast, Colonel, which figures in Dowsett's report," he said, turning to Colonel Berkeley. "The four legged nondescript which his man saw come out of the mango tope. The man could swear to four legs and a tail but wouldn't go beyond that," and, in spite of the serious nature of the information he had just lis ened to, Sir James laughed heartily at Smithers' description of the "hanimal."

"We must get that fellow," said he, "alive if possible; strip off his monkey's hide and see what's the true colour of his skin. But black or white, he'll get a short shrift if we lay hands on him.

"Offer a reward, Colonel, of five hundred rupees to the man who takes him, and I hope it may be Private Smithers."

III.

When darkness came down on the British camp outside Lucknow on the night of the 15th January, 1858, each man gripped his weapon tighter as he swore to bring in "Hanúmán," and made ready to answer the call whenever it should come. Eyes and ears on the strain, nerves tingling for the fight, hearts beating high and fast, brains throbbing and pulses thrilling; alive and alert to the finger tips, they peered through the darkness and listened for every sound. Few perhaps, but fit; less than four thousand in all, but every file and every rank, black as well as white—for there are black faces too amongst that gallant four thousand—animated by the single desire to avenge the ruthless slaughter of helpless women and innocent children.

The General's offer of five hundred rupees for Hanúmán, the spy who was masquerading as the monkey-god, and the chances of capturing him were discussed at every camp fire with much zest and eagerness, alternating with the equally interesting question of the particular point where the attack would be delivered.

But the night wore away and no alarm had been given.

Olpherts had gone out along the Banni Road with two guns and a detachment of horse; and subsequently the rest of the battery and the 90th regiment were sent to support him.

But at the camp profound stillness reigned.

Towards three in the morning the convoy came in with the supplies.

At eight breakfast was called. The men broke off, grumbling and disappointed. They had been kept under arms all night for nothing.

"Hanúmán," had broken faith. "His courage," said they, "had oozed out at his tail, and 500 rupees had gone with it."

Suddenly the sound of firing was heard in the direction of the uncompleted battery on the right. The picket was driven in, and with loud yells the mutineers swarmed to the entrenchments. The men rushed to arms. The rebels were in force and the fight for the battery began in grim earnest.

"Eighty-fourth, to the front," shouted Captain Dowsett, springing forward and waving his sword aloft. At the same moment catching sight of a queer figure brandishing a heavy tulwar, and urging his fellows to the attack.

"Hanúmán! Hanúmán, the spy!" he cried, pointing to the strange looking figure which was 'made up' to represent the monkey-god of Benares. "Take him men! Take him alive!"

The cry was taken up by Brasyer's Sikhs, it spread to Mande's Riflemen and Down's Fusiliers.

Presently the entire British right was yelling like demons possessed, "Hanúmán! Hanúmán!! Take him alive!"

The suddeness and savageness of the cry, coming as it did from so many hundreds of British throats, seemed to strike a panic into the hearts of the rebels. They wavered.

Dowsett with three companies of the 84th, and Brasyer with his detachment of loyal Sikhs, held the post of honour. Eagerly watching for chances, and as eagerly supported by their fellows, they saw the opportunity and embraced it.

In a very few minutes the rebels were driven from the entrenchments. The battery they held longer. Finding however, that they were making no progress on the left which had been attacked simultaneously with the right they began to retire.

Up to this point, "Hanúmán" had managed to "cheat the devil," but now a desperate attempt was made to capture him.

It became a struggle between Brasyer's Sikhs and the men of the 84th. With these it was not simply a question of rupees. They felt their honour touched. The spy belonged to their man; and the 84th determined not to be robbed of what was their lawful prey.

The rebels on their part, stuck bravely to their monkey-god or his representative, and lost heavily for their allegiance. To them, ignorant of the order of the British General, the fact that "Hanúmán" remained unharmed amidst the hail of balls and rain of blows was proof convincing of his divinity. So they fell where they stood, and their bodies made a wall round Hanúmán.

But the end came at last.

"Smithers! Where's Smithers?" shouted Captain Dowsett.

The rebels were in full retreat. The Queen's colours were waving above the battery, and a queer object was squatting on the ground surrounded by a crowd of curious white faces.

Smithers had gone down only a minute before, with a sabre cut across the forehead. But the rivalry was generous.

Not a man there, but felt that the honour of capture belonged fairly to Bob Smithers. It was he who started the "hare," and had stuck to his story through joke and jest, even when the captain seemed inclined to desert him.

They helped him to his feet, bound his head round with a handkerchief and led him to the spot where the spy cowered against the low parapet. There, Private Smithers formally handed over "Hanúmán" to the custody of Captain Dowsett.

The man was a native officer, a member of the Order of British India, and in the enjoyment of a pension from the British Government. He was blown away from a gun the same evening.

The five hundred rupees were divided between Smithers and the two men who were the actual captors, the money carrying a sergeant's stripes in the one case, and a corporal's in the other.

The Tell-Tale Handkerchief.

Philip Waring walked along with a quick, nervous tread. His mouth was set determinedly, and a deep flush of red dyed each cheek. Philip had a guilty feeling that everyone he passed knew that his engagement with Gladys Lawton was broken, and that there reposed in his left-hand pocket, to be returned to their owner, one dozen little notes on heavy white paper, monogram G.L., and in his right-hand pocket a diamond scarf pin and six dainty handkerchiefs, with fluffy boarders, essentially feminine. Why Philip defied custom in returning these articles in person the little god of Love alone knows.

A far more imposing array of gifts and love tokens was being collected at the other end of the line, for Phil was a generous soul, and his lady-love most chary of her favours. Letter writing she detested, and the answers to his daily notes were, to his disgust, few and far between. As to the handkerchiefs—thereby hangs a tale, for Gladys was one of those most unfortunate beings—a girl without a pocket—and could be traced anywhere by the dainty squares of cambric and lace she left behind her.

Phil's hand involuntarily tightened over the packet which aroused such bitter-sweet remembrances. One of these dainty articles he pilfered the day they became engaged, and was sacred in Phil's sight, for it had wiped away two happy tears from Gladys' big blue eyes. Another had been put in his pocket for safe keeping one evening, as they were going to see a famous tragedian.

"Keep it for me Phil, for I know I shall cry," said Gladys, fully conscious of her weaknesses.

It was not needed, for the play proved more glad than sad, and Philip added the bit of cambric to his rapidly-growing collection.

Another of Phil's souvenirs had been used one happy night to bandage a finger he had bruised in raising a window.

He smiled to himself as he remembered how many times he had heard an agonised whisper: "Please lend me your handkerchief, Phil; I can't think what has become of mine." This common occurrence had caused Phil, in making his toilet, to invariably add one extra for Gladys and her emergencies.

Phil heaved a sigh that would have been a credit to the stagiest lover, and his honest heart thumped vigorously as he walked up the steps of Mrs. Lawton's house.

"Ah, well, Gladys is the only girl in the world for me, but our first quarrel is to be our last, for she does not care for me, that's evident, fool that I was!"

And he pulled the bell so savagely that Polly, the maid, fairly flew to the door. Phil's eyes dropped as he met the beaming gaze of the maid. Polly, who had opened the door so sympathisingly through all the stages of his courtship; she, at least, would be sorry there was to be no wedding, and Phil's voice faltered a trifle as he asked for Miss Lawton.

"She is in her boudoir, sir," Polly said in her usual encouraging tones.

Phil hesitated to enter her private sanctum, where Gladys received only her intimate friends. He felt that it would be a hard matter to end his engagement in that room.

"I think I will wait in here," he said, going towards the drawing-room.

"Oh, sir, Mrs. Lawton has some callers in there!" said Polly, and led the way to the sacred precincts so familiar to him of late. No one was there, and Waring sat down in a remote corner, feeling ill at ease with these surroundings.

It was a quaint apartment, so full of Gladys' fads and fancies that you felt that you had been taken into her confidence the moment you entered the room. Miniature gardens grew in the windows, the glass bowl on the table was overflowing with roses, and dainty bric-à-brac of every description, such as girls love, were lavishly scattered everywhere.

A fantastic little clock ticked away merrily on the mantle-piece. It had never been known to tell the right time, and Philip had learnt to love it for its happy faculty of insisting it was only ten o'clock, when well-regulated timepieces were mildly hinting it was nearly twelve.

Gladys was studying Greek history and sculpture, and the usual pictures in the room had been removed to give place to her attic treasures. The Parthenon had the place of honour over the piano, and the gods and goddesses were assembled on the walls in almost as great numbers as in the days of old when they had gathered on Mount Olympus.

Phil grew uneasy as a flood of associations rolled over him, and he moved restlessly about. There on the desk was that mummy hand paper-weight which old Marsden had sent to Gladys at Christmas. How jealous he had been of Marsden for the pleasure his present had given! He remembered how cuttingly he had remarked that it was just like his meanness to offer her some other fellow's hand!

On the table was the novel they had been reading together. Phil had used his scarf-pin as a book-mark, and it had been left undisturbed.

Glancing up at the chandelier above his head, he remembered how, that last Christmas eve, it had been adorned with mistletoe, and, as he had stood in this same spot, Gladys—shy, reserved, undemonstrative Gladys—had softly stolen up behind him, and actually——

Phil shook himself impatiently, put his hands in his pockets, and turned towards the window. Yes, Gladys had evidently just left the room—fled, he supposed, when she heard his voice. Drawn up in front of the open window was her favourite lounge-chair, in which she curled herself comfortably, like a cat.

In the depths of the chair a small white object attracted Phil's attention. Mechanically, from pure force of habit, he stooped to pick it up, and a wretched little specimen of a handkerchief it was. It looked as if Telemachus had wept abundantly upon it, and Niobe added her ceaseless tears. It was as damp as a cobweb left out overnight in the dew.

A glad light came into Phil's eyes. Gladys crying—Gladys unhappy! Rapturous thought—she must care for him, after all. Philip drew a long breath that sounded like a sob. There was a light step on the stair, a rustle of drapery in the hall, and she entered.

"Gladys," said Phil, pocketing the tell-tale treasure, "I came to tell you—how much I love you!"

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

Time 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskda e's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, to Harington's sister, Ethel.

Lord Eskdale has very good reasons to believe that France and Germany are meditating an immediate invasion of England. He, therefore, dispatches Harington to London to warn the Premier, and Rodney to warn the British admiral established in the Mediterranean.

CHAPTER III.

The Scene in the House.

Early the following morning it was known throughout London that something unusual was happening.

The lynx-eyed chroniclers of Ministerial movements brought to Fleet Street the intelligence that the Foreign Office had been thrown into unwonted commotion, as soon as it was opened, by the arrival from Paris of a young officer who sent in an urgent demand to see Lord Salisbury or the Under-Secretary.

The Prime Minister was away, but after the messenger had been closeted with the Under-Secretary for ten minutes, a telegram was dispatched to Hatfield, and special communications were sent to the residences of all the Cabinet Ministers summoning them to an immediate meeting. Meanwhile, the Under-Secretary had driven over to the War Office, where, in a short time, he was in close conference with Lord Lansdowne, the Duke of Devonshire, and the Commander-in-Chief.

Wild rumours of every description were soon rife in the city, but the mood of the p blic generally, was one of incredulity. In the absence of certain information it was felt that the importance of these incidents had been unduly exaggerated.

Never had the political horizon been more serene, or the sense of public security more strong. Still, curiosity was sufficiently roused to draw a large number of spectators to the assembling of the House of Commons at midday.

But the aspect of the House was not one calculated to allay anxiety. Its members, as if constrained by a common impulse, had gathered from far and near in full numbers. There was no vestige of the carelessness which is generally to be discerned on days usually set apart for private business. Scattered about the precincts of the House in groups, they were earnestly discussing the occurrences of the morning, oppressed with vague forebodings that presaged a crisis.

Within the Chamber itself the scene was still less reassuring. The front Ministerial bench was absolutely unoccupied, and none but lieutenants kept watch and ward. Even the Opposition leaders were missing, save in two instances, and it was noticed with surprise and consternation that these gentlemen were summoned away almost as soon as they arrived. Excitement grew to a high pitch of tension when it was learnt that a joint meeting of party leaders was then being held in the apartments of the Leader of the House, and that a courier had been dispatched by special train to Windsor.

Alone, amid all this bewilderment, one small body of men sat, grim and unmoved, as if disturbed by no passions but their own, and with minds firm set upon a common purpose. It was the Irish party, who had been fortunate enough to secure first place in the ballot for precedence upon this day, and were seeking to convince their fellow members of the urgent importance of an Act to secure self-government for the county of Cork. Whilst the gravest statements were flying about the corridors of the House, and Liberals and Conservatives alike were thrilled with the sense of a common peril, the Irishmen did not swerve for a moment from their purpose.

The debate had commenced in an acrimonious manner; it had now become tragic. Finding no Cabinet Minister to assail, the Irish members consoled themselves by assailing each other. Mr. Healy had denounced Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. Sexton had denounced Mr. Healy, and Mr. Redmond had fallen on all three. The speeches disclosed a remarkable versatility in terms of abuse which reached its height when Mr. Dillon observed, amidst loud applause, that "the British Lion would have his wings clipped unless he washed his hands in the flames of repentance," and added that "Mr. Balfour had been for five years the hereditary enemy of the Irish."

Conspicuous amongst all was Dr. Tanner, whose crude and elementary style seemed born of the rude shocks of Parliamentary adversity. Twice had he sought to stretch the rules of the House as far as he might without breaking them, and twice had the Speaker called him to order and threatened to name him. The debate had already lasted three hours. Dr. Tanner had got to the length of shaking his fist under the nose of a mild and inoffensive brother who had unfortunately cheered him at the wrong moment, and the Speaker was on the point of rising to fulfil the usual painful duty of bidding him withdraw, when, from behind Mr. Gully's chair, Mr. Arthur Balfour appeared, followed by every occupant of the Treasury Bench, whilst the Opposition leaders also quietly took their places. Upon each face there was an air of gravity which not even the severest issues had hitherto called forth.

A swift movement passed over the House, and in a moment—as though its members had learnt the arrival of Ministers by intuition—every seat was occupied. Rarely had the Second Chamber been so crowded. Excitement grew when it was noticed that Lord Salisbury had entered the Peers' Gallery, and with him the Cabinet Ministers who belonged to the Upper House. There was a dead silence—the oppressive stillness that is less a calm than the momentary pause in the fury of a tempest. Dr. Tanner sat down abruptly, awed by the solemnity of the moment.

Without delay, and amidst a general hush, the Leader of the House rose to his feet. As he advanced to the table it was noticed that he had no longer the languid manner commonly ascribed to him. He stood upright, pale, stern, determined, with an air of resolute pride and the dignity befitting a supreme occasion. There was no need for him to claim, in formal language, the indulgence of the House for interrupting its proceedings on a matter of State of pressing importance. Every eye was directed to him, every ear was strained to catch his opening words.

"There devolves upon me, sir," he began, turning for a moment to the Speaker, and not without a trace of emotion in his voice, "a grave and responsible duty. I have to inform the House that a crisis has arrived more serious and more pressing than any which has hitherto occurred in the history of this country. Without warning and without just cause, whilst enjoying prosperity at home and in apparent peace with all the world, in the fulness of that content and happiness which have marked the reign of a wise and beneficient Sovereign to whom we draw still closer in loyalty and affection at a moment of common trial, we are faced with a danger which calls for all our courage and all our patriotism. Three hours ago there was placed in the hands of Her Majesty's Government a declaration of war from France and Germany."

These words, spoken slowly and distinctly, as if he felt that each syllable was a winged messenger of fate laden with woe and misery unutterable, fell upon the ears of the House in a deathlike stillness. For a moment its members seemed stunned. Mr. Balfour's statement was difficult to credit, hard to understand, and, in the solemn stillness which followed, the House seemed groping in amazement to discover the sense of the phrases they had heard, to realise the terrible import that they bore.

And then a thrill swept through the Chamber—a thrill of horror, of indignation, but not of fear. The House of Commons never looked more dignified, and impressive than when, after its first impulse of surprise, it sat rigid and impassive to hear the full story of this catastrophe.

"When I tell you, sir," continued Mr. Balfour, "that by the terms of this declaration we have not merely to anticipate the attack of two powerful enemies, but that we may expect it now, at this very moment—that, in fact, hostilities have already commenced—this House will realise that the present is not a time for lengthy explanation. It will be enough for me to say that, without previous negotiations, demands have suddenly been made of Her Majesty's Government—demands which were shameful to receive, and shameful to repeat in this House. Our enemies, whom yesterday we deemed our friends, asked nothing less than the dismemberment of the British Empire, and I need not say that it was in consequence of the immediate and scornful rejection of this ultimatum that the declarations of war, signed by the heads of the two combined nations, were handed to us. We," and here Mr. Balfour drew himself up to his full height and turned upon the House, "we needed not the formality of a conference with the Parliament of England to indignantly cast aside the terms of peace, such as they were. We knew that you stood, in equal scorn and unanimity, behind us."

He paused, and in a moment a ringing cheer went up. The House had regained its composure, if it had lost nothing of its excitement, and a wave of passionate emotion passed over it, fusing all parties into one—the party that stood behind all differences and made the English nation.

The Leader of the House then explained in greater detail, how the two Ambassadors had called upon Lord Salisbury, and how the terms they asked had been peremptorily rejected. They had then handed in the formal declarations of war, which dated from midday. Free passage from England had been demanded and granted, and the representatives of France and Germany were no longer on our shores. There was redoubled excitement when he described the prompt action of the Government.

"At such a juncture," he continued, "when England is face to face with two of the strongest nations of Europe—and Heaven grant that this be all!—it is no time for the accentuation of party differences. Two allied countries should at least be faced by a united people. We deemed we should be best showing the indomitable strength and single patriotism of our beloved land if for purposes of national defence, the line of political difference should entirely disappear. It was with this idea foremost, and, secondly, to ally with ourselves the best intellect, and resource of England, that Her Majesty's Government sent for the leaders of the Liberal Party and asked them to assist in forming a Council of National Safety.

"It is, I am aware," he went on, amid enthusiastic cheers, "an unusual course, but our danger is also unusual. It is no time to stand by the shibboleths of form or precedent. It would be almost an insult to add that such assistance was given as soon as asked, and that a Council has been formed by mutual agreement which includes all that is most wise and most experienced in English statesmanship.

"If our enemies have counted upon the acerbities of party warfare as an evidence of a disunited nation, they will learn, bitterly and to their cost, that the tumult of political strife can never disturb, however slightly or remotely, the deep and eternal love that we all bear alike to our native land. They will come to realise that jealousy and rivalry pass away before the dangers that threaten us, and that we stand before the foe one race, one empire, one people, one party."

Mr. Balfour sat down amid a scene of extraordinary enthusiasm. He had struck, nobly and well, the one note common to all Englishmen.

There was a moment's pause, and then Sir William Harcourt rose. His voice was broken with emotion as in brief words he thanked the Leader of the House for giving utterance with fervour so intense to the feelings of all parties. "Sir," he concluded, turning full upon the Speaker, "from this moment there is no Opposition. The very term ceases to exist in the hour that our shores are threatened by a foreign foe. The Government has no supporters more warm than those who in time of peace have been compelled by conviction to oppose its policy."

The nerves of the House were so overwrought that it was perhaps well there should have occurred something in the nature of an anti-climax. The Irish party had given no sign of the feelings that actuated them when Mr. Joseph Chamberlain rose to continue the discussion with a few incisive words. He recalled to the memory of the House some recent utterances of M. Constans in the French Senate.

"That statesman," he observed, "has not refrained from hinting at disunion on our own shores. He has plainly told us that a foreign enemy might look for help from Ireland, but"—and the right honourable gentleman glanced fixedly at the Irish benches—"he went on to say that if the French Government had to deal with similar threats of disloyalty from any essential member of the Republic, they would speedily settle insubordination by sending the ringleaders to New Caledonia."

He was continuing when, to the amazement of the House, Dr. Tanner leapt to his feet, evidently under the stress of ungovernable excitement. Advancing several steps along the floor of the House between the crowded benches of startled members and hastily unbuttoning his frock coat, he exclaimed fiercely;

"Did he say that?"

Then tearing one arm out and exposing a white shirt sleeve, he cried out to Mr. Chamberlain:

"Tell him what I say. Tell him that if he dares to set his dirty foot in this country I'll fight him and his bottle-holders single-handed myself!"

So saying, he flung off his coat into the middle of the gangway and, to the amazement of all and the consternation of those near him, squared up his fists as if he were then and there desirous of tackling M. Constans and bringing him to book in the very presence of the august Chamber.

The re-action had come. Mr. Chamberlain hastily sat down, and the House, in relief after its pent-up excitement, first shrieked with laughter and then exhausted itself in wild applause.

For the first time in his parliamentary career, Dr. Tanner had violated a strict law of the House and remained unrebuked.

It needed but the moment and it had arrived. The Irish party rose by a common impulse, and, standing upon their benches, cheered and cheered to the echo the utterances of their comrade, who, with the feelings of a hero, modestly resumed his seat, half awed by the unusual spectacle of an indulgent House. It was noted afterwards, as a significant fact, that it was Mr. Chamberlain himself who had succeeded in rousing this splendid burst of patriotism from the Irish members.

But the House quickly regained its ordinary gravity when Mr. Balfour again addressed it. He begged members to consider ways and means. They must not imagine that however great the surprise, the country was unprepared. Even at that moment the War Office was in close consultation with the Admiralty and with the authorities at the Horse Guards. He asked them, however, to pass a Bill granting the Government fifty million pounds for war purposes, and he suggested that the Bill might be read a third time and become law that day.

He was busy behind the counter when the strange tidings reached him.

Mr. Balfour passed on, and informed the House that the Government had resolved to reduce the charges on Consols as recommended, thus freeing their hands for further loans, and had already closed the Stock Exchange to prevent a financial panic. Government brokers would be appointed for the transaction of necessary business. "As an evidence of the gravity of the situation," he added, "I may state that during the progress of this debate, I have learnt that every British cable has been cut since midday, and our enemies have only left us in telegraphic communication with the United States, as to cut the Atlantic cable would be an act of war with the American nation."

There was no need for further discussion. Within ten minutes after the reading of the brief Bill which granted the Government fifty millions, it had been passed a third time. Dr Tanner once more found himself popular by his willingness to disencumber the House of business.

"Let it not be said, sir," he declared, "that Ireland is not willing to make sacrifices at a time of peril. We will withdraw the County of Cork Self-Government Bill for six months, and in saying this, I know that the people of Cork are at my back. (Loud cheers from the Irish Benches.) We are the more ready to take this step, sir, because we see before us the prospects of a holy row worthy even of the best energies of the Irish party At such a moment, Cork is in the van" (Renewed applause.)

The House rose at five o'clock. In two hours it had received the announcement of war and had made every preparation in its power to meet the enemy. The Briton is perhaps rightly accused of being stolid. It is certain that the members of Parliament left Westminster with as much sang froid as if they had just given their sanction to a new railway bill, or had resolved to add a shilling to the dog-tax.

But the news had long since spread through London and been flashed to the remotest districts of the United Kingdom. The public at first received the thrilling intelligence with incredulity, but as their doubts were dispersed, an intense desire to be up and doing made itself felt throughout the country and in the Metropolis. Business in London was at a standstill. The streets were crowded with what, at another time, might be regarded as a mob, but was now clearly recognisable as a national gathering animated with one thought one purpose, one enthusiasm.

There needed some outlet for the high-wrought feeling that prevailed. It was fortunately provided by the statement that Her Majesty the Queen had left Windsor, and was on her way to Buckingham Palace to take up her residence in the Capital during the time of war, so as to be near her people and her Ministers.

There was a mighty rush of the excited multitude to Hyde Park, and as the Queen passed through in an open carriage, though the days were still cold, a wild, vociferous

"I'm not dead yet, lads!"

tumult of inextinguishable cheering rose from the vast throng. It was a nation voicing its own patriotism to its visible head.

When Her Majesty reached the Palace, the Mall and Buckingham Palace Road were crammed tumultuously. Distinctions of rank had faded with differences of political conviction, and, without waiting for solicitation, the Queen appeared upon the balcony leaning on the arm of her eldest son.

There she remained several minutes, firm, proud, and erect, whilst her people raised cheer after cheer to assure her of their confidence, their loyalty, and their invincible courage.

The enthusiasm of the citizens of London was no idle boast, for in that memorable hour the citizen army of England was giving its heart's blood for the defence of the country.

CHAPTER IV.

How Major Perkins Won the V.C.

At five o'clock that afternoon, Wednesday, May 3rd 1898, the chief coastguard officer at Worthing telegraphed to London, Portsmouth and Dover: "A vast fleet of ships of the line, apparently French and German, are standing in for the shore. They are now about ten miles out at sea. S.W. by S."

Half-an-hour later he wired again: "Fleet distant five miles. Advancing in four lines abreast. Six cables length between each line. Outer lines thirty-six armour-clads. Inner lines forty troopers, Messageries Maritimes and North German Lloyd steamers. Big flotilla of gunboats and torpedo boats ten miles out. Possibly one hundred. Weather calm."

At 6.15 p.m. he sent this message: "Presume this is enemy announced by telegraph from London. Fleet anchored in same formation two miles out. Troopships and liners crowded with troops. Have counted 109 smaller craft. Preparations for landing being made. What shall I do?"

To which the answer was given: "Go to telephone office. Wire is switched on to Horse Guards. Send constant advice of progress of events."

And the first message which was received by Lord Wolseley at the Horse Guards was to the following effect: "A number of flat-bottomed boats, or floats, each containing some two hundred men, have put off from the troopers; and the Volunteers are lining the beach."

The Commander-in-Chief could not help smiling as an aide-de-camp repeated the concluding words to him, but anxious lines appeared in his face as he glanced at his watch, and saw it was only five minutes past seven.

"I hope the Brighton and South-coast people have kept their words, Brabazon," he said to a staff officer who was standing near the fireplace.

"Well, sir, the traffic-manager meant what he said," was the reply. "I heard him tell the driver of the first train, which left Victoria with the Guards at 6.10, that if he got to Worthing within the hour he drew £50 to-morrow, but if he didn't he got the sack."

"What is the exact disposition at this moment?"

"Fourteen South-Western trains, each containing one thousand men, were ready at Aldershot at 5.30, waiting our telephonic orders, and they have since left at regular intervals of five minutes between each, the first starting at 6 p.m. The London, Brighton and South Coast Company are dispatching trains with regulars and volunteers from Victoria, London Bridge, and Clapham Junction as fast as they can fill them. By eight o'clock we should have ten thousand men there, by nine o'clock twenty, and in the early hours of the morning seventy, with two hundred guns."

"I think we estimated that fifty Maxims would be in position on the sea front by 7.30 p.m.?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well," said the Commander-in-Chief, "we can now look into the Commissariat and field transport arrangements. Every man has a day's cooked rations with him, but we must be prepared for developments at that particular locality, although I fail to see how the enemy can possibly effect a landing if the fleet creates a timely diversion."

At that moment the Channel Squadron, under the command of Admiral Lord Charles Beresford, was steaming east from Spithead at the rate of ten knots per hour. The Admiral's pennant was hoisted on board the Magnificent, whilst the other vessels under his command were the Royal Sovereign, Blenheim, Empress of India, Endymion, Repulse, Resolution, Achilles, and Agamemnon. These, with twenty-two torpedo boats and the gunboat Speedy, were all the available force at his disposal for immediate action, so skilfully had the enemy planned the time and manner of his attack upon our shores.

With the exception of one, or possibly three, the most powerful ships in our Navy were in the Mediterranean, in China, in North America, in Australasia, at the Cape—anywhere on the face of the broad waters save in the English Channel. Lord Charles Beresford had received by semaphore the second of the coastguard's telegrams before he gave the signal for departure, and he knew that he had nine warships to oppose thirty-six of equal or superior class, whilst he realised that the proportion of the enemy's smaller craft to those under his command was equally appalling in the mere point of view of numbers.

But hesitation or doubt in his actions or in his heart there was none. No sooner was the fleet under way than another signal was made from the Admiral's ship, and when the words "Remember Nelson" were deciphered, even the strict discipline of the British Navy could not prevent a great cheer bursting forth from every ship in the line.

These things were noted by the anxious watchers on the shore, and when Sir Evely Wood arrived at Worthing at 7.30 p.m. to take command of the defending forces, he found a telegram awaiting him from Lord Wolseley to inform him that naval assistance might be expected shortly after eleven o'clock. The Admiralty officials who made this calculation could not, of course, know what Lord Charles Beresford's exact plans were, but of one thing they were quite certain—he would attack the enemy as soon as ever he could reach them.

When the combined French and German fleets first hove in sight, the quiet little town of Worthing was naturally thrown into a state of intense excitement. The head constable informed the Mayor, and the Mayor sought the advice of the Town Clerk, who recommended that the fire-bell should be rung. This was promptly done, with the result that in ten minutes every soul in Worthing knew that the town was likely to be bombarded forthwith. The man in charge of the fire-engine got steam up, evidently labouring under the impression that he must do something—and in the result he had his salary increased for the act, as the first shell from the enemy's flag-ship struck and fired the Town Hall, which must inevitably have been burnt down were it not for the prompt arrival of the engine.

The local volunteers, to the number of 211, spontaneously gathered with their arms and accoutrements in the principal thoroughfare, and the resident Major, a most worthy and stout linendraper, placed himself at their head, mounted upon a horse that served admirably for the dual purpose of parade and parcels delivery.

He was busy behind his counter when the strange tidings of imminent invasion reached him. His cheek blanched and his heart beat tumultuously when he rushed upstairs to tell his wife, and that good lady suggested the immediate closing of the shop and a hasty retreat to her father's residence in the country.

But the Major was stout of heart as of body. In a state of high nervous exaltation he sought for his sword and cross belts, saying, as he donned them: "No, Margaret; my place is here. It will be a poor day for England when the first volunteer officer who is called upon to do his duty flinches from the consequences. "Kiss me, my dear. I cannot bear to meet the children, but, God willing, we will all come together again in peace and happiness." And he hurried forth to see to the secure girthing of his horse.

Fortunately there was a very large supply of ammunition on hand with the sergeant-instructor, as the corps was engaged upon its annual target practice, and the men rapidly stuffed their pockets with cartridges until they had over one hundred rounds each.

They then fell in, in two companies, and the Major, Perkins by name, thought it his duty to make a speech, as the circumstances were such as did not, to his knowledge, come within the purview of the Volunteer Regulations.

"Comrades," he said, "our worthy Mayor has informed me that war has been declared against us by France and Germany, and we now know that Worthing has been singled out for attack. Whoa, boy, whoa then," for a shell screamed through the air, passed into the Council Chamber of the Town Hall, and burst there with a terrific report, and the Major's mount was tolerably fresh, as Saturday was his hardest day. The Major managed to retain his sword, observing sotto voce: "I never can sit a horse with a drawn sword in my hand," and continued aloud, "these Frenchmen and Germans are here in their hundreds of thousands, and they do not demand ransom from Worthing, but seek to destroy our town at once. They are worse than highway robbers, as they ask for both our money and our lives. It is our duty, comrades, to resist them to death." (Loud cheers from the crowd, an interlude which the drill instructor utilised to squint down the front rank of one company to see if the dressing was all right). "I am not much good at tactics myself," went on Major Perkins, "but I know what to do here. We must line the shore and let no foreigner set a foot on English soil until he steps over our dead bodies. Companies, form fours—left. By your right, quick march!"

The enemy dropped like swathes of grass.

Arrived on the Marine Parade, the Major and his little host found that six of the enemy's battleships had approached to within a mile and a half of low water mark. They were on the western side of the pier, which they scrupulously refrained from damaging by their subsequent fire, as they expected to find it extremely useful when the active work of disembarkation began. An occasional shot was leisurely fired at the town, not so much by way of serious bombardment as to demonstrate that they were in earnest and would stand no nonsense.

The plan of the allies was now quite apparent. It was their intention to rapidly land sufficient troops and machine guns to hold the outlying portions of Worthing against any possible counter demonstration by the British, until three complete army corps, numbering 150,000 men all told, were concentrated in the locality. This number of troops actually accompanied the expedition.

A murderous fire of shrapnel and small arms rained upon the defenders.

They carried a fortnight's store with them, and by the time a forward movement on London could be undertaken, the French and German commanders estimated that reinforcements of three times the number of the expeditionary force would be at hand, whilst their fighting power would be enormously enhanced by a vast quantity of field ordnance.

Major Perkins extended his men on the beach in single rank with two paces interval. He told them to lie down, to sight their rifles at 400 yards, to aim low, and to concentrate their fire, by order of their section commanders, on particular boats. These dispositions were hardly made before half-a-dozen launches appeared from the seaward side of the six warships, and rapidly steamed, or were rowed, towards the shore, in such fashion as led the onlookers to believe that the occupants expected no resistance.

They were soon b tterly undeceived. Volunteers are, as a rule, excellent marksmen, and bullets poured into the advancing boats at such a rate that the commander of the enemy's advance guard thought it best to retire until the sea front had been vigorously shelled by the batt eships.

At this momentary repulse of the enemy the little defending force set up a great yell of delight, and the stout Major rode up and down the shingle inciting his men to keep up the reputation of Worthing, as though the quiet little watering-place was accustomed to similar murderous proceedings as part of the season's routine.

So far, not an Englishman had been injured, as the fire from the troops in the floats had been uncertain and ineffectual. But now the game was to assume a more desperate character. A perfect tornado of shells swept the sea-front, wrecking every house facing the Channel, and killing and wounding a great number of people of all ages and both sexes, whose curiosity had caused them to watch the progress of events rather than seek safety in flight.

Special attempts were made by the enemy to clear the beach of the unexpected line of defence which had proved its powers so unpleasantly, but it was far from easy to hit men lying down at the water's edge, and the only real living target was the Major on his horse. Both man and animal were in a perfect frenzy of excitement, and appeared to have charmed lives. More than once a time-fuse shrapnel burst right in front of them, but the zone of fire covered by the missiles in the shell left the space round them inviolate, and although appealed to by his subordinate officers to dismount, the Major would not listen to the suggestion.

From his elevated position he could see that a very much larger number of flat-bottomed boats and launches were now gathered behind the ironclads, and when the cannonading ceased, something like 2,000 troops were swiftly ferried towards the shore, with the evident determination to make good their landing this time. Whilst a few of the flotilla made straight for the beach the majority headed towards the pier, and the feu d'enfer kept up between the belligerents on the sea-shore prevented the defenders from noting the undisturbed occupation of the pier-head by the enemy.

A volley from the leading boat brought down Major Perkins and his charger, but the Major arose from a cloud of dust, drew his sword, and shrieked in a shrill falsetto, for his natural voice had gone long since: "I'm not dead yet, lads. Give it to 'em."

But the end was seemingly close at hand.

More than half of the Worthing volunteers were killed or wounded, and the survivors were now firing blindly and ineffectively, being mad with the battle fever and dazed with the singing of bullets and the smash of the projectiles against the stones on the beach.

Already some hundreds of Frenchmen had gained the platform of the pier and were forming up to advance into the town, whilst the leading launch was within a few feet of ramming her nose into the gravel beach, when the Major devoted all his remaining energies to one last yell:

"Fix bayonets! Centre cl se! Double!" and he jumped into the surf, brandishing his sword like a maniac. A big German officer leapt from the bow of the boat to meet him, but his heel turned on an uneven boulder, his lunge missed, and the Major hit him such a hearty whack with the flat of his sword that the German fell stunned into the sea, and was quietly but speedily drowned.

But now a fierce roar of many voices came from behind the straggling group of volunteers. Ere anyone had realised what was happening, two companies of the Grenadiers Guards flung themselves into three of the enemy's launches and gutted them with the bayonet as terriers might clear out rats under like conditions.

Two more companies deployed to left and right of the pier on the Marine Parade, and poured a hailstorm of lead into the advancing French column and their comrades in the boats, and, when the ornamental ironwork gates at the entrance of the pier had been smashed down, a couple of Maxims were run into position, with the result that the enemy dropped like swathes of grass before the sweep of a scythe.

A second time had the attack failed, utterly and disastrously.

Sir Evelyn Wood had now arrived and assumed control of affairs. The 1st Battalion of the Grenadier Guards had been conveyed from Victoria to Worthing, fifty-nine and a half miles, in fifty-eight minutes, and one of the Tommies accurately expressed the feelings of himself and his comrades when he said subsequently that he would sooner "stand and be blazed at for a month of Sundays by forty thousand bloomin' Frenchmen than do that little trip again."

The driver of the train described the journey as "a toss up between fifty quid and Kingdom Come," while the guard, a sober, steady man, was responsible for the statement that he only once in his life wished he was drunk—"when we was crossin' them facin' points at Keymer Junction."

Five minutes later the General and staff, with the 4th Battalion of the King's Royal Rifle Corps, better known as the 60th, reached the station from Aldershot. Sir Evelyn Wood, by galloping bare-backed on a cab-horse to the parade, gained the scene of action in time to witness Major Perkins' last gallant attempt to hurl back the tide of invasion.

During the momentary lull that followed the retreat of the second flotilla, he sent for the Major and said: "If we are both alive to-morrow I shall recommend you for the Victoria Cross, and shall ask the Commander-in-Chief to gazette you as a full Colonel in her Majesty's regular forces. You have behaved most gallantly."

But Perkins could make no answer. He had quite lost his voice. He bowed respectfully, and two great tears coursed down his cheeks.

Twelve-pounders, machine guns, and relays of troops were now pouring through the town from the station, and night had commenced to close in. It took the discomforted enemy some time to gain the shelter of the warship's guns, and the General seized the welcome respite to plant the Maxims and field artillery on the shingle, whilst he ordered the lamps on the parade to be lighted in order to mislead the enemy's gunners. Electric searchlights lit up the scene from the ironclads, many buildings in the town were in flames, and when the shell-fire recommenced it was seen that the men-of-war had widened their intervals considerably in order to concentrate their fire-zone, and several gunboats had approached much nearer the shore than the big ships dared to venture, pouring in a perfectly demoniacal hail of lead.

Considering its volume and intensity, it did not do such wholesale damage to the defenders as might have been expected. The low position of our artillery and Maxims, added to the uncertainty of the electric beams, brilliant though they were, served to disconcert the aim of the gunners, who were themselves the object of a terrific fire belching forth from a very wide expanse of the seashore.

Our losses were heavy, but they were more than made up by the constant accessions of strength in guns, men, and ammunition. The station-master afterwards received a decoration from the Queen for the masterly way in which he kept his station clear of empty trains, using both platforms and goods sidings for debarkation, and returning the empties along the up and down lines respectively towards Brighton and Goring.

At ten o'clock another attempt to effect a landing was made, but the reception given was so warm that the attacking boats were never closer than three hundred yards from the beach. Sir Evelyn Wood took advantage of the retreating tide to move his guns and men lower down and thus again upset the enemy's range.

This third failure induced a further change of tactics on the part of the combined squadron. The fire on both sides slackened off until near eleven o'clock, when the ball was again opened by twenty ironclads, and something like sixty gunboats and torpedo boats. The smaller craft boldly steamed in until they were barely two cables' length from the shore, and forthwith a murderous fire of shrapnel and small arms rained upon the defenders. The reply on our side was undaunted, but it naturally became more uncertain. Every second man in the fighting line was hit in a few minutes, guns were dismounted, Maxims smashed into fragments, and stones and débris hurled in showers over the whole of the Parade.

The General did not dare to weaken his extended front by withdrawing the men to seek shelter, as it was evident that a tremendous attack would shortly be delivered from the numerous flotilla of boats now gathering behind the vessels.

Fiercer and fiercer grew the fusillade, shells hurled through the air screaming like lost spirits, bullets clanged in masses against the ruined houses, and some ten thousand troops crowded into an innumerable company of boats of all shapes and sizes, were about to make a determined dash for the shore, when a sudden outburst of big guns from the sea, a series of tremendous crashes and explosions, and a rapid diversion of the electric search lights towards the south, caused an immediate cessation of fire from both parties.

The British Fleet had arrived upon the scene.

The Evening Bell.

HARK! Do you hear that bell? It is las animas, the bell of souls. Every evening it rings, and it tears my soul! You see this white hair, these worn features? They have not been blanched and chiselled by age, for I am not yet old. They are the hieroglyphics of a terror, an agony too profound for words. Yet listen. I will try to tell you.

A little time ago, I was a happy wife and mother. We lived near Aguasdulces.

We had a little land, and we were the parents of three children, two fine boys and a girl—my darling, beautiful fifteen-year-old Teresita. Yes, we were very happy.

Then came this lamentable rebellion. My husband used to shake his head as he sat smoking in the verandah in the evening, and say:

"Never will I raise my hand against the king."

We heard the echo of the clash of arms from afar. We knew of plantations devastated and villages laid waste, but we had little fear in our neutral ground.

One day some of the negroes came running up, excitedly, crying out that a detachment of troops had suddenly appeared before the mill belonging to Don Fulgencio Casilda, and were attacking it.

Later, the steward of the estate, followed by several negroes, appeared at our door. They were wild with fright. They said the troops had murdered the señores and ransacked the place. They had destroyed everything they could lay hands upon, and were now setting fire to the fields and buildings.

My husband gave them food, but he entreated them to fly farther up the hills lest the presence of our premises should bring us into danger, and they did so. A panic of terror was upon me. I entreated my husband to take our children and fly to the forests, but he refused.

The event bore out my apprehensions. About dark a small party of cavalry appeared coming up the road towards our house. My husband went out with extended hands to greet them. He was met by a line of lifted rifle muzzles.

"Do not shoot!" he cried out. "I am a neutral!"

The only answer was a crackling volley. Without a cry he fell forward upon his face.

The next moments are a hideous confusion in my mind. Moved with the instinct for concealment—flight was now impossible—I hurried my children in to a small rear chamber and locked the door. There we cowered, trembling.

Soon there was a knocking at the door and a cry of "Open!" Then, as we did not stir, the lock was burst in, and the captain, with several men, jumped into the apartment.

"Hola!" he shouted grimly. "Some more rebels! Give them their medicine too."

I had shrunk into the farthest corner, but as I saw the flash of bayonets over my little boys' heads I sprang forward screaming:

"Would you slay my innocent children?"

The captain faced me with a brutal laugh He was about to address me insultingly when he caught sight of Teresita cowering behind me.

"Caramba! What is this? Bring that creature out to the light. She is a veritable houri. Let her alone. She is for me. As for the old one——" He shrugged his shoulders.

But Teresita sprang suddenly and clasped me about the neck.

"If you kill mamma you will have to kill me first."

"Oh, well, never mind," he retorted with a villainous laugh, "let them be. There is plenty of time. Just now I am dying of hunger. See what there is to be found to eat in this miserable hole."

They dragged my boys away, and I never saw them again.

They left us for a brief space, but posted a sentry outside. We could hear his measured pacing to and fro. For a time terror deprived me of all power of thought, but as the moments passed a ray of hope sprang up within me.

We could hear the shouts of the men in the kitchen, and knew they were eating and carousing. The pacing of the sentry had ceased, and instead we heard a raucous noise, by which we divined that he might have fallen asleep. Furthermore, the night had fallen, and it had grown very dark.

There was a window in our room which looked upon a little back yard by the stables. Here all was quiet. Moving with the footfalls of cats, we took the sheets from the bed, knotted them together and secured one end to a ring in the window jam used for an awning.

Teresita slipped out first and slid down. Then I climbed out, I know not how, and followed her.

Up at the back of the plantation there was a grove, the edge, in fact, of a little forest which covered the top of the ridge. We gained this, and when we found ourselves among the tree trunks, we dared to breathe once more. There was an obscure little path over the ridge into the valley beyond, and, striking this presently, we travelled it all night.

Daybreak found us on the farther edge, footsore, exhausted—for women in Cuba are no walkers—but with hearts full of thankfulness for our comparative safety. Below us we could see occasional houses and the dusty trail of a road winding amid the verdure. A sudden idea came to me.

"We will go to San Niceto, my darling," I said. "Your father has an old uncle there, a tobacconist. He will help us."

Teresita was softly crying.

We ate some bananas which were growing wild in that place, and then we lay down among the trees to sleep. Sleep greatly refreshed us, and in the evening we started once more, and thus we went down into San Niceto.

The town was full of soldiers, which much disquieted me, but I need not have been alarmed, for we were both so worn, so dirty, and so tattered that few would have looked at us twice.

We were, however, taken before the authorities, and required to give an account of ourselves. I dared not tell my true story, but represented myself as a widow living beyond the hills who had come to the town to visit an uncle, and they let us go.

But a fresh disappointment awaited us. When we hunted up my husband's uncle, the tobacconist, we found he was dead. Señora Antonia, the old woman who had acted as his housekeeper, told us that he had been carried off a short time before very suddenly by a pneumonia. She was a very talkative, wheedling, sympathetic old soul, and presently offered us a room. As we knew not where to go we took it.

I tried to obtain work, but there was little to be had. I had a few poor little rings, which I sold for a trifle, and we managed to exist.

Señora Antonia was very sociable—too sociable, indeed—for she dropped in frequently for a chat, and was never weary of asking us questions. I only learnt too late that all she cared for was money.

The town was always stirring with soldiers coming and going, full of noise and insolent ways. I kept my Teresita at home by day, and only allowed her to go out of an evening with me.

One day when I was not feeling well, I let her go with old Señora Antonia. The old woman professed a great friendship for my child and was always petting and cajoling her. I do not know why I was so foolish as to trust her, but after the anguish and weariness we had suffered I was glad to lean a little upon this friendship, the only one offered me.

Teresita returned from church excited and distraught.

"Mamaita!" she exclaimed, "I have seen him!"

"Him? Who?"

"That man, that devil, the captain who drove us from our home."

My heart seemed to stand still.

"Are you sure?" I questioned.

"Oh, yes. Sure! I felt his bold, bad eyes upon me as we were passing through the door, and I ran, ran, all the way home."

"You will stay at home night and day," I declared. I could not sleep at all that night. A thousand apprehensions tormented me.

Very early the next morning I went down to the market to get some vegetables. As I entered I beheld a man far off talking with a woman, and I perceived the glitter of money which passed between them. The woman was our hostess, Señora Antonia; the man was the big Captain.

Sick at heart, almost staggering, I crept home to my child, and clasping her to me, wept over her. We spent the day devising plans of flight, but none was feasible.

Several times we heard Señora Antonia rap at the door, but we made no reply, and she went away. Late in the evening she came again.

"Open, dear Señora," she said, coaxingly. "I have here a beautiful supper for the child."

Hunger is a great compeller. My child was exhausted with agitation and want of food, and so was I. I crept to the door and opened it a crack.

Instantly it was pushed wide, and two soldiers roughly entered. One of them seized me, clapped a hand over my mouth to smother my screams, while the other dragged my child hastily away.

I cannot remember clearly what followed. I struggled, I bit, I tore at my tormentor, but he overcame me, bound and gagged me, and, leaving me prone, quitted the room, locking the door behind him. My bonds were not tight, and after a time I loosened them sufficiently to crawl to the door and beat upon it with my hands, calling incessantly upon my child and upon Señora Antonia.

I must have sunk down at last senseless, for the next I knew I was lying upon my bed and Señora Antonia was pouring something down my throat. I used my first consciousness to revile and to drive her from me.

All day I lay upon that couch, exhausted and benumbed. I slept much, too, for my lacerated spirit seemed wrenched to a point where a sort of coma supervenes. I seemed to feel nothing acutely, but only hoped I might soon die.

Later I arose and ate a little food, for I began to reflect that I must rouse myself to go and find my child, although I knew not where. Somehow a little fresh courage came to me, and I lay down more easily to sleep.

In the night I was roused by someone pushing open the door and rushing into the apartment. The moon, which was streaming in through the window, revealed the figure of my child.

"Teresita!" I exclaimed, mad with joy, and flung myself upon her, but she pushed me frantically away.

"Do not touch me!" she gasped in hoarse, strange tones. "Do not touch me!"

I drew back in consternation and contemplated her.

Her eyes were bloodshot and staring, her visage pale and fixed into such an expression of hideous and ferocious horror as surely no girl's countenance ever wore before. I thought her mad.

"Angel mia!" I faltered.

"I have killed him," she said, still in the same unnatural voice. "He was a demon, and I have killed him."

Then I perceived that her hands and her garments were dripping with fresh blood. Involuntarily I recoiled, but she seemed not to care. Desperation had hardened her and changed her nature.

"Let me sleep," she continued. "I must sleep. I am dropping from fatigue."

She flung herself upon the bed whence I had just risen and, strange to say, sank at once into a heavy slumber, while I stood in a petrification of despair and watched her.

Ah, well! There is little more to relate. Of course they came and apprehended her at once. There was no trial. Indeed none was needed, for she did not deny what she had done. They did not even give her time for shriving, but took her at once to the plaza, stripped her and hanged her to the irons of a lamp, just as the bell was ringing out las animas!

"She must be made an example of," the commandant declared.

Ah, Heaven! Are there no others of whom an example should be made, no pitiless scourgers of the land, no brutes masquerading in the shape of men and making a mockery of the names of law and justice?

EDWARD MOORE.

The Wooden Case.

Edward Richardson, the explorer, was my life-long friend, college chum, and now my honoured guest.

At college, Ned went in for dead and hidden things, archæology, and all that: and, after absorbing all that the best schools of this country and other countries could teach on those lines, he started in, digging here, prodding there, until he had punctured holes in the earth's crust in nearly every country on the globe.

Now, after years of this sort of thing, he was back to his native city, with a hat full of medals and decorations, and his fame as an explorer and an archæologist established throughout civilisation.

We had just returned from a dinner given in his honour by a scientific body, and had adjourned to the library for a smoke and a chat before retiring.

Our talk so far had referred to his little speech concerning his latest and most important discoveries in Egypt, and to the effect it had produced upon his hearers.

And now, to my great surprise, he acknowledged that he had intentionally omitted facts of importance bearing upon his work! To put it mildly, it was an eye-opener, and I could only look the astonishment I felt.

After a few thoughtful puffs, Ned said:

"Frank, what really did happen is so strange, so inconceivable, that were I to tell the story to the world, I should be laughed at and told that I lied, or was crazy.

"Look here," he exclaimed, throwing off coat and collar and uncovering the upper portion of his brawny chest and shoulders: "here's a bit of evidence of the truth of my tale, that I always carry with me."

I looked, and on his throat, underneath the heavy beard, I beheld a lot of scars which extending downward, spread out into rows that covered every inch of the body exposed to view. It looked as if some sharp-toothed instrument, like a rake, had gouged out the flesh, or as though the man had been seared by hot irons.

"Good heavens!" I cried. "What beast or thing did that?"

"Aye, you may well put it that way," replied Ned, resuming his garments and seat; "it was a Thing, the most horrible that ever existed on this earth.

"I told you this evening," he went on, "that I had set out to investigate a small pyramid which stood in the desert, a mile or two from the oasis that had been my base of operations while exploring in that part of Egypt. I explained how we spent weeks digging and sounding before success rewarded us; how we finally broke into the tomb underneath the pyramid, and discovered the mummies, and the stores of jewels and ornaments, which proved that the bodies had lain there, undisturbed by mortal hand, since the days they were buried—six thousand years before. All these things occurred precisely as I stated. There was nothing here to conceal.

"You also heard of the attempt made to steal some of our treasures from the building in which they were temporarily stored; how one of my men on guard at the time was murdered, and how I, while seeking traces of the murderer in the camp of a band of roving Arabs, was attacked in the tent of the sheik, and forced to kill that individual to save my own life. That part of the story was true enough, so far as it went, but the most important facts were omitted. What actually did occur was this:

"After working for weeks on the job, and gaining nothing but hard labour for our pains, I became discouraged, and one evening I announced to the men that if the next day or two brought no better luck I would abandon the undertaking.

"I also told them that, in order to be in good trim for what might be our last attempt, they should do no work next day, and suggested that they should go to headquarters at once and take a rest. They were glad enough to have a holiday, after working as they had done.

"Soon all hands were on their way to the oasis, whence my party, with the exception of the native labourers, put up when off duty.

"I remained in camp, and early next morning made a tour of the diggings. I examined every hole and sounding, made careful measurements, and tried to think out some new plan of operation that would yield tangible results. Finally I returned to my tent and was about to make a personal search in front of it, when I happened to see far out on the desert what my field-glass showed me was a caravan. It was a small affair—a dozen camels, loaded, and as many horsemen. It was headed for the oasis, and would come no nearer to the pyramid.

"As I stood watching the travellers, a horseman, riding ahead, left the column, and followed closely by what seemed, at that distance, a child, also mounted rode rapidly towards me, the rest continuing on their way. When they got within several rods of me the pair pulled up, and the man, dismounting, stood quietly while his little companion proceeded to the pyramid and passed behind out of sight, followed by the riderless horse.

"Then the stranger walked forward until but a few yards separated us, when he stopped, and, instead of the usual salaam, made a profound bow. He uttered not a word, but stood with arms folded, as if waiting for me to address him. He was very tall, straight as a spear, and wore the ordinary long white garments of the desert tribes.

"Irritated by the man's silence, I finally cried out, in Arabic: 'Who are you, and what do you want?'

"At this my visitor came up close to me, replying as he did so: 'Who I am matters little; what I want, you will give me in return for the service I shall render you.'

"I was astonished, but ere I could speak, he continued: 'I know you are Edward Richardson, the explorer. I know what you expect to find here, and how you have worked, without avail, until you have become discouraged. How I know these things, concern me alone. What concerns you is the fact that I, and I alone, can show you how to enter the tomb, which is here, as you surmise, and I will do so, provided you give me my choice of what you may find in it.'

"Although amazed at the man's knowledge of me and my movements, and distrusting him instinctively, I determined to force his hand, if possible, and to find out his demands and what he proposed to do.

"Inviting him to sit down on a block of stone at my side, I said:

"'You seem to know so much, and to be so powerful, why haven't you opened this tomb yourself?'

"'Because,' he replied, 'to do so requires engineering skill and mechanical appliances, which it is impossible for me to obtain hereabouts.'

"'What do you require in payment for your services?' was my next query.

"'A mummy,' he replied.

"'Why, these are the things I am most anxious to find myself, and you may demand what is of the greatest value to me,' I said.

"'Listen,' said the man, 'you will find bodies of kings and queens who lived at a time of which man has no record. These shall be yours, together with all the jewels and ornaments buried with them. You will also discover a case in which is a body, but no treasure. This case and contents are all I ask, and I swear there is nothing in them that would be of value to you. As a guarantee that I am not trifling or trying to deceive you, take these.' Saying which, he drew out a small pouch, from which he poured into my hands a dozen or more of the finest diamonds I ever saw. 'If I fail you in any way,' he continued, 'or you do not find everything as I say, these shall be yours.'

"To be brief, I agreed to the proposal, the Arab accepting my verbal promise to fulfil the contract.

"'Now,' said he, when the preliminaries were settled—and here is where the incomprehensible part of the affair begins—'I will fulfill my part of the agreement.'

"With this he gave a shrill whistle, following upon which the little fellow came out from behind the pyramid, and, with the other horse by his side, rode up to us and dismounted. Making a low bow to me, he stepped in front of the other and gazed, without a word, into his face, as if awaiting a command.

"I now saw that, instead of being a child, the newcomer was a dwarf, twenty years old, or thereabouts. He was a handsome, dark-eyed little fellow, with a red fez and zouave-like outfit that became him well. That he was uncommonly active and powerful, I had reason to thank my stars later on.

"At a word in some strange dialect, the dwarf detached from the Arab's saddle, and handed to him a scimitar, the hilt and scabbard of which were covered with some scaly material that I afterwards found to be the skin of a snake.

"Another word or two in the same unknown tongue, and the little man drew back and faced the big one. As he did so, I caught a look of aversion on his face, and his eyes gleamed as if with hatred or defiance. The Arab noticed the look and returned it with a ugly scowl and a growl that sounded like a threat.

"Rising from his seat, he unsheathed the blade, and the next moment the dwarf seemed to be standing in the midst of a rain of fire. The Arab was laying about him with his weapons, and such sword play, I'm free to say, I never saw before, and never shall again while I live.

"The exhibition ceased as suddenly as it began. The dwarf stood with arms folded, and a queer, far-away look in his eyes. The Arab gazed at him a moment, and then, tearing the covering from the hilt, held that part of the scimitar to his face.

"The hilt was of gold, beautifully chased and set with gems. On the end was an immense diamond that blazed in the sunlight like flame, and this was waved slowly before the dwarf's eyes until the lids dropped and he seemingly slept.

"As the Arab sheathed his sword and replaced the covering on the hilt, he said: 'Ali grows rebellious and objects to serving me; he must be disciplined.' Then, producing a sheet of paper and pencil, he laid them on the stone he had vacated, and, stepping in front of his subject, he gave what seemed to be a command in a loud, imperious tone, and in the same outlandish tongue he had used before.

"In a few moments the dwarf made a reply in a muffled voice that sounded as if it came from underground.

"Then, as though interpreting, the Arab said:

"'He tells me a great rock closes the entrance to the tunnel leading to the tomb, but he has passed through it.'

"For the next few minutes not a word was spoken. Then came a little cry from the dwarf, followed by a few sentences in a broken, gasping voice, as of one utterly exhausted.

"At another command, he staggered to the stone, and seizing the pencil, he rapidly drew on the paper what looked like the ground plan of a building. A lot of writing followed, and when this was completed the Arab handed me what turned out to be an accurate plan of the tomb and tunnel, with full directions for entering them.

"As Ali finished, he fell over in a dead faint; but a few drops from the vial, which the Arab held to his lips, soon restored him. Then the strange pair mounted and set off towards the oasis, and that was the last I saw of them for some days.

"In the evening I rode back to camp, where I learnt that the newcomers had pitched their tents on the outskirts of the oasis, and seemed a quiet, well disposed lot.

"I told my associates that the sheik had visited me and given me certain directions for finding and entering the tomb, for which, if they proved correct, he was to receive an ordinary mummy, in case any such were found.

Digitized by Google

"Not until we broke into the tomb and laid profane hands upon its contents, did the sheik put in an appearance at the workings.

"On that momentous day he came, bright and early, accompanied by four of his people, big, solemn-looking fellows. Seeking me out, he obtained permission to enter the tomb with me, and while there, no movement of ours, as we opened sarcophagi and took mummies, jewels, and what not, escaped his watchful eye.

"For a long time there was no sign of the wooden case, but when most of the things had been removed he called attention to a crack in the wall in front of him. A few blows of a pick disclosed a niche, the front of which had been walled up. Upright within stood a covered box, and in this we found, as the Arab had fore-told, the body of a dwarf.

"It was that of a man with immensely broad shoulders, and arms reaching nearly to his knees. The face was hideous, and a ferocious smile had drawn the thin lips apart, disclosing teeth sharp, and gleaming like those of a beast.

"Strange to say, the body was not swathed in bandages, as mummies always are, but was clothed in a loose garment of some peculiar stuff that bore our rough handling without a break.

"Great bunches of muscle covered the frame, and nowhere was there an opening, or, in fact, an indication that an internal organ had been removed, as is always done in the case of mummies.

"The body, with its stiffened limbs, was like that of one in a cataleptic fit or trance, and represented, as I supposed, some strange and wonderful process of embalming, of which this was the only specimen in existence.

"The head rested on an oblong block, covered with a piece of the same material of which the garment was made, and on this odd pillow the Arab's eyes were fastened with the most intense eagerness. Before I could lay a hand on it, he had replaced the lid of the box, saying as he did so:

"'I suppose I may take this now? You have seen how insignificant it is, and I desire to get it to my tent at once.'

"Reluctantly I gave my consent, and his own men carried the case to the surface and placed it in a cart I lent him to convey his prize to camp.

"An hour or two after they left, we found in the niche, under some rubbish, what I took to be a block of bronze. It was about twice the size of a common brick, quite heavy, and on every side of it was inlaid with gold in strange designs.

"I sent it up to be put with the other stuff in the storeroom, and shortly afterwards was told that the sheik was above, asking to see me privately. When, at my request, he joined me in the tomb, he was greatly excited, and his first words were:

"'I have lost a small bronze block belonging to that case; have you seen it about here?'

"'My friend,' I said, 'in return for your services I agreed to give you a certain case and contents. Have I fulfilled my promise?'

"'Yes,' he replied, 'but——'

"'All bronze blocks,' I put in, 'and everything else outside the case belong to me, and I shall keep them.'

"At this the sheik said not another word, but, with a murderous scowl on his face, turned and left the pit.

"Upon quitting work for that day, I went to the storeroom and hid the block of bronze under a pile of tools. Later, when my assistants had gone back to headquarters and the labourers had settled down for the night I called in Sam, my African servant, and one of the native labourers, an intelligent, trustworthy Arab, and arranged with them for guarding the storehouse during the night. I was to take the first and longest watch, Sam the next, and the native the last, which would end when the camp was astir in the morning.

"This plan was carried out, and nothing occurred while either myself or Sam was on duty. When the Arab took his post, I examined the building inside and out, but found the block in its place and everything in proper condition.

"Upon resuming my bunk, where I had slept like a top through Sam's watch, I found that sleep had deserted me, and for more than an hour I tossed about, unable to close my eyes. At last I dropped off into a doze, from which, a few minutes later, I woke with a start. Something had disturbed me, I knew not what, but a faint echo seemed to ring in my ears as of a voice calling for help.

"Jumping up, I made for the storehouse at the top of my speed.

"The moon had not gone down, so that objects near by were fairly visible.

"When close to the building, I saw what brought me up standing.

"The door stood wide open, and someone was moving about inside.

"Approaching close to the opening, I called out the man's name. There was no reply, and the noise within ceased.

"As I stood there, peering into the dark room, there was a sudden scrambling, a horrible, snarling cry, and out of the doorway came something on all fours which, leaping past me like a flash, was out of sight almost before I could move.

"Recovering my wits, which, I confess, were scared out of me for the moment, I was inside the room and at the hiding place with lantern at once.

"The block was gone!

"A hasty examination showed that nothing else was disturbed, and that the door had been forced by pressure from without; the broken lock, and screws torn from the wood, indicating that extraordinary force had been applied.

"Outside, lying on his back close to the building, I found the watchman. The poor fellow was dead. His neck was broken, his face distorted with fear and horror, and upon his throat were deep scratches, from which blood was still flowing.

"Arousing the camp, I had the body taken to the hospital tent, and explained to the men that their comrade had been murdered by a burglar who failed to secure anything of value.

"What it was that did the deed I could not imagine, but I felt assured that the sheik was the responsible party, and determined to visit him at an early hour.

"Soon after sunrise I was standing in front of my tent when, to my surprise, Ali, the dwarf, rode up at a furious gallop. Without dismounting or uttering a word, he thrust into my hand a folded paper and, turning, was off again like a shot. The paper contained these word:

"'The sheik sleeps, and I have stolen away. He has sworn you shall die as did your guard. If you are brave, come to his tent at midnight with axe and knife. The guards will sleep, and I will help you. The block is——'

"Here the note broke off abruptly, as though the writer had been interrupted, and just what he meant by that reference to the block I'd have given something to know.

"That evening I went back to headquarters with the rest, leaving the storehouse in charge of an assistant and armed guards.

"I believed that Ali's note was written in good faith, and determined to act as he advised, but alone, and without the knowledge of any of my people.

"Shortly before midnight I was in the vicinity of the Sheik's tent, which stood near the edge of the oasis, its entrance facing the desert.

"As I cautiously approached the door, the moonlight enabled me to see, stretched on the ground in front of it the body of a man, clasping a long gun. Already one of Ali's statements was verified. The guard slept, and soundly, too, I could see that.

"Just then the Sheik's voice rang out in a sort of wild chant, and I prepared for action.

"Securing the broad-bladed hatchet I had brought with me, to my wrist, by means of a leather loop on the handle, and carrying a stout hunting knife in the other hand, I stepped over the sleeper and peered into the tent.

"A tall screen in front of the door cut off my view completely. Then I crawled through the opening and stood behind the screen.

"Cutting a slit in this with my knife, I could see that rugs and skins covered the ground, and screens stood at the sides, and at the opposite end of the tent, which was large and oblong in shape. In the centre was a table, draped in black, and in front of this, with his back towards me, stood the Arab.

"He wore a black robe that reached from his neck to his heels, and in his right hand was a short, black rod, which he waved from side to side in unison with the chant.

"On the table I could see the bronze block, and beside it lay the beautiful scimitar, its hilt glittering in the rays of the lamp that hung from the top of the tent.

"Neither Ali nor the case was in sight, but I felt confident that the dwarf was near, ready to lend a hand if necessary.

"With weapons ready for instant use, I moved towards the table, and my hand was already on the block before the Arab knew I was there.

"A startled cry fell from his lips as he saw me. His hand flew to the sword, and, quicker than I can tell it, he aimed a blow which, had it reached me, would have split me to the shoulders.

"A leap aside, however, saved me, and before he could straighten himself, I dropped the hatchet and sent in a right-hander that nearly lifted him off his feet. He recovered himself, though, like a prize-fighter, and, with blood streaming from his nose and mouth, he sprang at me again.

"But just then a gleam of light flashed by me and I heard a dull, crunching sound. The Arab's rush was suddenly checked. His sword wavered an instant, and then fell to the ground. The hand that held it dropped and closed convulsively upon something that protruded from his breast. It was instantly withdrawn, and with it, the fingers already stiffening round the haft, came a long, broad-bladed knife, dripping with blood. A dark stream flowed and flowed over the long robe.

"The Arab swayed to and fro several times; then, with a gurgling sound, he fell to the ground, dead.

"As if in response to the cry, and before I could turn to see where the knife came from, I heard a savage snarl, and something sprang upon me from behind. A pair of long brown arms were clasped round my neck, and instantly my clothing was being torn to shreds and my flesh gashed by fingers that were more like claws of steel.

"So sudden and fierce was the attack that I staggered forward and would have fallen, had not my assailant's backward tug kept me on my feet.

"My throat seemed to be the point aimed at, and in its mad efforts to reach this, the beast, or whatever it was, soon had my shoulders laid bare and channels dug into my flesh, from which the blood ran in streams.

"I am a powerful man, as you know, Frank, but in the grasp of this fiend I was as helpless as a child. Try as I might, I could not shake him off, and my utmost exertions failed to prevent his inhuman gouging and tearing.

"I had dropped my knife when first attacked, and all I could do was to hold my head down to protect my throat, and make an occasional futile stroke with the hatchet.

"Soon I began to grow weak from loss of blood.

"I wondered vaguely what had become of Ali, and, in a voice scarcely audible, I called upon him for help.

"As I did so, my head went back with a jerk and the sharp claws sank into my throat.

"Death in a frightful form was very close to me when Ali's shout of encouragement reached my ears, and I felt rather than heard, quick blows falling upon the body of my assailant.

"The pressure on my throat relaxed, the terrible arms dropped from my shoulders, and I was free.

"I fell against the table gasping for breath, but still conscious that another struggle was going on near me and that Ali might be needing help as I had.

"Pulling myself together, I turned to take a hand, when, as I am a living man, Frank, I found myself gazing upon the mummy we had resurrected!

"There was no mistaking that powerful, stumpy body, or those features, now distorted with rage, and more horrible than ever.

Just now it was facing me, making short, savage rushes at Ali, who, knife in hand, eluded the attacks with wonderful agility, driving the blade into the Thing at its every attempt to reach him.

"Stiff with horror and unable to stir, I watched the fight until Ali, in avoiding a vicious rush, slipped, and, ere he could recover himself, was in the clutches of the monster.

"With one long arm it hugged the little fellow close to its body, and the free hand was already at his throat before the power to move returned to me.

"Then, staggering forward, I raised the heavy hatchet and, with all my strength in me, I brought it down squarely upon the top of the ugly head.

"I heard the crash and saw the blade eat its way through the skull to the neck, and then I fainted.

"The next thing I knew I was lying on a pile of rugs and Ali was busy patching me up. So potent were his remedies and treatment that in a little while I was on my feet nearly as strong as ever, and feeling only a trifling pain from the injuries.

"'Where is the mummy?' was my first query.

"'I killed the infernal thing and the men are now burying it,' Ali replied.

"'You and I this night have rid the world of two monsters,' I said.

"'How the Sheik put life into the Thing, I know not. He had strange powers. He knew yon tomb existed, and that in it was the body of one who, ages ago, had been high priest and mighty magician. He knew that with the priest were buried his profoundest secrets—those by which he controlled the elements and even life itself.

"'He knew, moreover,' continued Ali, 'by what dread means the priest had preserved his trance-like existence through all these centuries, and had acquired the formula by which life could be restored to the body.

"'Many of his mysteries he learnt through me by various unholy methods, one of which you witnessed; but his prying into things forbidden was hateful to me, and I often refused to aid him, until beaten into submission.

"'The Sheik was aware that the priest's secrets were contained in a bronze casket, and this, he believed, was in the case with the body. In the thing under the priest's head he was sure he beheld the object of his search, and when he found this to be nothing but a block of wood, he was mad with rage and disappointment. He knew, then, that the casket must be in your possession, and your refusal to give it to him did not tend to lessen his anger. So furious, indeed, was he, that he beat me cruelly, and swore he would get the casket if he had to kill you all.

"'I then swore that I would kill him for beating me.

"'At night the miracle was performed that let loose the evil one, whose first act was to murder your guard and bring back the box.

"'This night he would have opened it and disclosed its mysteries to the Sheik, who, once master of them, would have made the other his, else taken his life for good.

"'Here is the casket,' continued Ali, handing me what I had hitherto thought to be a block of bronze. 'Take it, but never dream of looking inside. The contents would make one who knew, able to secure and use the most powerful of all created beings; but woe to him who would handle them or even attempt to open the casket, without proper knowledge which is now lost for ever. I would bury the unholy thing where none would ever find it, were I not sure it would be safe with you.

"'Take this also, as a token of my regard and as a slight return for saving my life,' and he put into my hand the magnificent scimitar, sheathed, and it its snakes-skin covering.

"'The Sheik,' he went on, ignoring my objections to receiving so valuable a gift, 'claimed to be my father. He lied; but as I am recognised as his son by my tribe, I shall succeed him, and all his possessions are mine.'

"Here I endeavoured to force upon him the diamonds left by the Sheik as a pledge; but Ali refused them, saying that as the Sheik had broken his agreement, the jewels were rightfully mine.

"As to the death of the sheik, that had to be explained, he said, to his people as the result of an attempt of the Arab's to murder me; and having been a cruel task-master, his death caused great joy rather than grief.

"Already the body was being prepared for removal, and in a few hours, the boy explained, they would start for home.

"Where that home was, or how reached, however, Ali obstinately refused to tell me, and from the moment when I rode away from the door of his tent, where he stood motionless, watching me until he faded out of sight, I have never seen or heard from this saviour of my life.

"Such wounds as I was bound to show, I easily accounted for as the result of my fight with the Arab, my version of which was the more readily accepted as that night the strangers disappeared, leaving no trace behind them.

"Thanks to Ali's ointment, my injuries soon healed, and to this day, Frank, you are the only one to whom I have ever told their history.

"Do you wonder at my silence?"

SAVING A LOVER.

It was very quiet, very tranquil, in the barracks that day, and from the deserted grounds, where only a solitary sentry or two paced up and down, none of the usual barrack-room talk, laughter, or singing could be heard. For every soldier, bandman, and officer had been called to the officers' police quarters, where a fellow soldier was being tried for his life by the court-martial.

It was during the revolutionary days, when power was vested in the hands of the military. They had the right to say whether or not Private Santiago Moreno was guilty of murder, and whether, in payment thereof, he should die.

No women were present in the grim, fortress-like quarters; only the soldiers who stood in silent, stern rows round the room. On the dais sat the colonel, the major and some lesser officers; fronting them, straight and erect, with shoulders thrown back, stood the prisoner, Santiago Moreno.

He was a good-looking fellow, and the star on his breast showed that he had received credit for bravery. Not a flicker of an eyelid, not a movement, showed what he felt; there was not even a tremour when the colonel, after long and grave discussion, at last stood up, with the other officers grouped about him, and pronounced the sentence of death.

"That on the morning of the following day, Private Santiago Moreno would be escorted to the plain of San Geronimo, and there be put to death by 'law of fire!'"

That was all. The prisoner drew himself up and saluted, his face no more concerned than that of the men about him, and was taken to his cell.

The soldiers melted away, group by group, some of them displaying sorrow, some unconcern, and others anger. For the slaying of his companion-in-arms by Private Moreno had been a very cold-blooded and more than usually wicked deed, even in a country where wicked deeds are not uncommon.

With deliberate intention, Moreno had waited for the other, after parting with his sweetheart, Panchita, and coolly and methodically bored a dagger straight to his heart. For this deed he had offered no excuse or defence, stating merely that the murdered soldier had "annoyed Panchita; that a caballero cannot allow such a thing as annoying his affianced bride."

In his small stone cell Private Moreno walked about, whistling a gay Mexican dance tune. He wanted pen, ink and paper, to write adios to his sweetheart, he stated lightly to the warder, who was eyeing him warily, one hand on his pistol. Though Moreno might not be armed, he was a man to be watched.

But at the prisoner's wish to write a note to Panchita, the warder's face relaxed, and he offered to find pencil and paper. For Panchita was his own cousin, and every one loved the gay, pretty girl, with her artless, innocent ways that had lured two men on to death.

Poor little Panchita!

Five minutes after the death sentence had been pronounced she knew of it, her door locked, was lying face downward on the cold stone floor, moaning and crying.

It had all been her fault, as she knew—through her two men had come by their death.

After a time she stood up, tottering and moved over to the window.

There was no one in sight; the hot sunshine poured down on the yellow sandy street and the gray adobe walls.

Out in the middle of the road some dogs and small children rolled and tumbled in the dust together in high glee.

It was all so ordinary, so everyday; and yet Santiago was to be shot to-morrow.

That is, unless she could think of a plan to save him.

There was a sudden clatter, and the children scattered rapidly, with many duckings and bobbings of their small, fat bodies, as good Padre Francisco, on his pacing mare, turned the corner and went rapidly down the street. Behind him rode a boy on a heavy horse.

Panchita thought dully that some one at the hacienda of San Juan must be very ill and wanted the Padre for confession. It would be a long ride for the good old man, because San Juan was many miles away. He would be absent from the town for over a day.

Pulling at the strings of his soutane, Padre Francisco rode on, his old black cloak flapping in the breeze.

As the girl watched the retreating figure of the priest, with the well-known shabby attire, a thought struck her and she drew back from the window with a gasp. For now she knew what to do, and Santiago should be saved.

At six o'clock that evening the soldier on guard before Santiago's door admitted without question the thin, stooping form of Padre Francisco, cloaked and hooded in his usual manner, and carrying prayer-book and rosary. The good father was silently telling his beads, and the soldier bowed humbly as he opened the door, speaking no word. For no Catholic is thus privileged to address a priest who is counting his rosary beads—it is a sign that silence is desired.

The cell door opened and closed silently after the Padre, and the watch outside heard a smothered, impatient ejaculation from Private Moreno who was smoking a cigarette and trying hard to write that adios to Panchita. Then the door was locked, for the Padre was going to confess the prisoner, and the guards retired laughing at the idea of confession for Santiago—the wickedest dog in the army of Mexico.

Lounging in the doorway, the soldiers speculated lazily as to what was going on in the condemned cell, it was so quiet. Not even a murmur could be heard, and finally the men agreed that the Padre was praying silently.

It was dark—quite dark—when Padre Francisco came out, with head bowed lower than ever, cloak wrapped disconsolately about him, and fingers still telling his beads. He had been there for an hour, and surely Santiago was either talked down or dead by this time.

"Shall we go and see?" asked a guard.

"No, hombre; let the poor brute alone," said another.

To the men who watched all night for fear that the prisoner might escape, it seemed a century before midnight gave way to the darkness that comes before dawn, and there was a sound of relief when at last the first bugle sounded; it was time to get the prisoner and march. Because a soldier is allowed two privileges—to be executed before dawn, and to be shot in his uniform.

In front of the prison drawn up into line, in the darkness, stood the squad of the Twenty-third (Private Moreno's own regiment), who were to attend to the "law of fire," and in the corridor waited impatiently the two guards who were detailed to walk on either side of him

The prisoner, however, was not ready; and deep disgust and scorn were shown on every face when the warder appeared and stated grimly that the prisoner was weeping like a child, and had begged one moment's grace.

Weeping, indeed! A pretty way for a soldier of the Twenty-third to die! And men who had thought privately that they would aim low in the "law of fire," hardened their hearts—a coward did not deserve such treatment.

That the prisoner, barely visible in the grey dawn, was perfectly calm and composed when he did appear made no difference to them; perhaps he had mustered up some courage, after his weeping, but he had played the coward for all that, and a coward's death was no loss.

Out on the bare, swampy plain of San Geronimo, just where Mount Ajusco rises up, bleak and rock-covered, was the place of execution. The walk was not long for the men, to the sound of the muffled march, but very dreary. As for the condemned man, though he might have played the part of a coward in the prison, there was no sign of fear now, so far as they could see in the semi-darkness.

Here was the spot. And with his back to Ajusco, his feet sinking into the damp ground, and the grey mist of the morning resting like a pall about him, and the prisoner was allowed to stand for a moment, while the Captain made a brief address, concluding with the statement that only because the prisoner was a soldier, the "law of fire" would be put into effect; when the word uno was pronounced he was to run for his life. On the craggy side of Ajusco he might find shelter, perhaps.

Uno—dos—tres would be counted; at tres the squad would fire. Therefore he would have to hasten—otherwise, Heaven have mercy on him.

"Attençion!"

The soldiers stood on guard.

"Uno!" was counted slowly.

The prisoner stood stock still, and the man nearest swore that there was a smile on his face.

"Dos!"

Was he paralysed, that he could not run, even to save his life?

"Tres!"

Motionless, horrified, the men had watched. Still the prisoner stood there, head up and shoulders back. At the sound of the tres, however, muskets were lowered, and every hammer pulled.

Out thundered the salute of bullets, a veritable hail of them, and the solitary, pathetic figure tottered, then reeled over, face downward, in the damp grass. Dead, of course—how could it be otherwise?

The captain should have looked to make sure, but he wanted his breakfast and some cognac. Merely glancing casually at the body, he gave the order, and with the march once more ringing out, the men tramped back through the light of the coming day to the barracks and breakfast, leaving the dead man alone on the plain.

The next day Private Santiago Moreno himself, whom we have seen shot and left dead on the San Geronimo plain was there at sunset, pale, mad with grief, and holding in his arms a dead body in the uniform of a soldier, but with the sweet, peaceful face of a woman who had offered up her life for a friend.

When the sun went down, his lifeless form remained, still clasping—even in death—the other body that had been thought his.

PART III.

CHAPTER III.

The Meeting with Marcen.

News came in thick and fast when the army had been gone some weeks, of the gathering of the Goths and their allies, and their uniform success in all parts of the country. Province by province and city by city Totila wrested back the conquests that the master-hand had gained, and at last word was brought into camp by a scared-faced Hun that the enemy was concentrating his force upon Rome. Rhesus' first thought, seeing how many men he had lost by desertion, was to give up the post and fall back towards the capital, but it was fated otherwise.

The country round was still tolerably peaceful, though many were flying before the coming storm, but having been much annoyed by the guerilla warfare of a band of robbers from the near hills ever since the departure of the general, Rhesus determined to march out and teach them a salutary lesson before retreating.

His Huns and Greeks were eager for action and adventure, so they sailed forth in high spirits, and pursuing a straggler, came upon the main body of the robbers before the evening of the same day. These, although nearly equal in number, took to flight. Keeping well in front, knowing the country better, they led the soldiers a long way beyond their first desire. But Rhesus was hot on the scent and in no mood to be shaken off. He flung discretion to the winds and went on recklessly. The chase went on for days, the fugitives heading towards Florence, by the side of the highway; but midway there, at the foot of the huge rock plateau whereon the Etruscan ruins of Urbs Vetus gleamed in the sun, they were run down.

They dismounted at the base of the steep slope, under the shadow of the great, embrasured wall, and there to the astonishment of Rhesus, threw down their weapons and yielded. As he galloped to the front and demanded the reason, their leader stepped out from the ranks and confronted him. The face that he saw under the broad-brimmed helmet was the face of Marcen—Marcen, his enemy!

With a cry of rage Rhesus leant over in his saddle, upraising his sword to strike. The agony of the years of toil and infamy, of long-cherished revenge, came darkening into the sunlight of his careless mood, and but that Marcen stood weaponless, helpless and seemingly neither surprised nor afraid, he would have struck without mercy.

"It was not your wont, Rhesus," said the other sadly, "to kill in cold blood. Least of all a man at your mercy as I am. Though I grant that you have just provocation."

"Why should I not make an end of you now, villain?" cried Rhesus furiously.

"Because I have repented of my past wrong-doing, Rhesus. Because I would make what recompense I can. Because I have saved your life."

"What mean you?" Rhesus asked, incredulous. Then scornfully: "What new treachery have you afoot that you dare to put yourself in my clutches?"

"The treachery is past and gone, Rhesus. You will understand my meaning better when I tell you that these men are merely adventurers in my pay. I have employed them merely for the purpose of bringing you out of the circle of death. You would never have escaped of your own will. This chase was merely a stratagem, long planned, to lure you away from Rome while there was time."

"And why should I be kept from Rome?"

"To save your life, as I have said. Already the vanguard of Totilla's Army will have passed your out-post. The ends of his crescent array will have penned the city in. If you had not been killed in the seige, Rhesus, nor beheaded at the Gothic triumph, there are still prisons in Rome. Dead, or in the lower chamber of the dark Tullianum where Vercingetorix died and the accomplices of Cataline perished, how would you see Eutasia again? Those who have gone down those 'Steps of Sighs,' friend, have seldom returned."

"And what is that to you, traitor?" Rhesus was yet angry, half-believing, half-doubting.

"Much," said the other. "Though she vowed to wed me if I spared you from death at the trial of Nika, she denied me when I claimed the promise. She was so good and gentle, yet so firm in her refusal, that I could not press my power. I came instead to regret my folly and sin. I promised to seek you out and bring you back. By chance I heard your name mentioned by a sick soldier who came home in the first week of the war, and set sail at once. I was delayed by various causes on the way, and seeing, on arrival, how Totila was advancing, devised this plan to bring you out of the struggle. It has not been without risk to myself, Rhesus, as you know. Do you still doubt my good-will?"

"In truth, yes," answered Rhesus bitterly. "I cannot forget the past so easily as you wish, knave. You were ever plausible. What have you done with the secret treasure—if, indeed, you have obtained it?"

A strange expression, an anxious fear, and a subtle smile intermixed, nearly betrayed Marcen, but he recovered in time, and replied:

"That I have not the treasure none should know better than yourself, Rhesus, who have the secret. I have hope that if I help you to gain it and to win Eutasia and to keep you from the notice of the Empress, you will share it with me. I have suffered much for it already. Theodora suspected me of treachery when I reported that it could not be found. She swore to pull down the remains of the burnt convent before she would be baulked. She even cast me into a dungeon because I refused to reveal its whereabouts. In the end, as I always meant, I feigned to give way, saying I had feared the vengeance of accomplices. I led her to the secret passage, to the great rock door—and of course we found the passage empty. She was mad with anger at first, but having had my house searched and my friends questioned to no purpose, let me go. Then it was that I sought Eutasia's hand secretly, faring as I have told. But you still doubt my word? Come with me."

The place was deserted, so bidding his men follow, Rhesus went with him up the steep rock and through the ruins, until they came to the great well of the fortress, near the old burial-ground of the past and gone Etruscans.

"Let me command my men a moment," said Marcen, "and I will prove my faith in you—and to you."

Wondering, beginning to believe, Rhesus consented. The other bade two of the men bind him to the cord that hung from the crude wallow and then lower him until his hands, at utmost stretch, could not reach the brink of the well. Then he spoke to the soldier.

"You have a sharp sword, Rhesus. You know how to use it. If you think I am still your foe, if you imagine that I am yet a traitor, strike at the taut cord with all your force and have your revenge! It is an easy thing to do, Rhesus; not dangerous to yourself at all. If I am indeed your enemy it will pay you well!"

"It is a coward's challenge!" cried Rhesus, relenting. "I cannot do it, though I cannot quite believe your honesty."

"Then strike!" came the voice from the well. "Strike hard and quick, so that it may be over! Surely you will never regret it!"

Rhesus said he believed him then, despite an undercurrent of suspicion, and sheathing his sword, bade the men draw Marcen out. Surely no common man, be he saint or sinner, would have so put himself in the power of one he had wronged unless his purpose was honest? He could not deny him after that!

"So you believe me at last?" he cried, when he came up, "You are hard to convince!"

His teeth chattered, his face was deathly pale.

"I must, and I suppose I must forego the revenge I have cherished through all these dark years," said Rhesus. "But it was a desperate hazard, man. My fingers itched on the sword-hilt! But you will find Rhesus the Roman as good a friend as he is a stern foe. I will go back with you to Constantinople now, since I cannot get to Rome, and if you will help me to gain Eutasia, why, one half the treasure is yours. That is, if we can come at it."

Marcen started, as with fright.

"If?" he repeated. "You speak in riddles. If you have not the key, you know its place. When I went down the passage after your trial I saw the writing on the rock."

Rhesus was surprised at this, and that he should talk so glibly of the key, when he ought not to know of its existence; but kept his countenance and said drily:

"If you tell me the words of the writing, I should have some proof of the truth of your story."

"It was but faintly scratched, and after I read it I chiselled it out, leaving no trace. It was simply 'The key is found.'"

In spite of his self-control, Rhesus was visibly amazed at this, and Marcen seemed still more perplexed. But the former passed the matter off with a laugh at his own invincible scepticism, taking care not to mention it again afterwards.

"So!" he said. "If that is found, all is well. That it is in the capital is evident; where, you will find when we arrive—not till. Till then, we are friends and co-adventurers. Is it not so?"

"Nothing could be better," cried Marcen, well-pleased. "I am already finding the straight path of honesty more profitable than the way of deceit."

So they called the men together and put it to them whether they would go back to the east or remain and join the Goths, for mercenaries have no enduring loyalty or preference, save for the lightest pay—and some thought one way and some the other. In the end they rode away from Urbs Vetus with about a hundred sober fellows who had pleasant memories of home, and struck out for the coast. They met with no opposition, save from the villagers whose hoards they plundered for their daily needs, so thoroughly had Totila drained the country and massed his forces. Coming upon the Appian Way, they kept along it to Dyrrachium—from Rome, a full forty days' journey. There they got a small rowing vessel and put off with favourable weather; and to be brief, came without a mishap of a serious nature to the Golden Horn. They went ashore in the morning and sought out an unassuming inn to lodge at, and that being settled, parted until night.

Rhesus went out into the city as he had done the first time he landed. But this time he was alone. He was an outlaw walking amongst pitfalls and snares, albeit he was wearing the badge of blue instead of a band of green. He trod the familiar streets with an unfamiliar step; noting the familiar places. The new Church, the more numerous drinking-booths, the ruins of the convent where Proclus had fallen to save him, the silent arena, the deserted gladiatorial quarter—he marked them all; and as the past rushed over him, marvelled more and more at Marcen's repentance. The lingering doubt that his daring hazard had not quite dispelled took fresh hold of Rhesus. It grew in force, disquietening him with its persistency. He began to regret that he had not made an end of the traitor when he hung in the well.

Busy with these memories and thoughts, he ranged the city until nightfall. On his way back to the inn he came in sight of the spires and battlements of Theodora's palace by the shore of Propontis. He suddenly remembered how he had once ventured into the garden in search of Eutasia. He went cautiously down a narrow way by the side of it, and scaled the wall.

CHAPTER IV.

In the Garden—and the Chase.

The casements of the palace were luminous squares of light. The sound of many voices and soft laughter came floating to Rhesus through the groves as he dropped upon the ground and stole silently forward. He reached the shelter of a wide-branching aloe unperceived by the few courtiers and lackeys who strolled along the quiet walks. In the shade he crouched and waited, for what he scarcely knew. Some unexplained impulse had led him there; the same mysterious influence bade him stay and wait.

The love-makers mooned along in the gloaming, the guards made their rounds in easy confidence, all were oblivious of his presence. The air was wondrous still and pleasant, yet merry withal with the subdued murmur of thoughtless gaiety, the tingle and splash of fountains, the chirping of insects, the carillons of singing birds. The dusk deepened. In the pale sky shone some of the brighter stars. His vigil seemed purposeless. A little longer, and then that for which he waited came, and he had his reward.

She was one of a group of beautiful women, the fairest amongst them, who came laughing and talking low right under the shade of the tree behind which he was hidden. She stood so near to him that he could have touched her had he stretched his arm through the leafage, but he dared not. He listened to their idle chatter and feminine jests with ill patience, feasting his eyes the while on her beauty. A great longing, a maddening desire, arose within him. She was not a girl now, but a woman. A woman in every graceful curve of limb, and every flash of the sweet blue eyes. Older, truly, and with a shadow of sadness on her face that he had not seen before, but more lovely, not less, therefore. There is an added age that is but added charm. In everything on earth that is beautiful is the tracery of grief.

Presently the gay group passed on, leaving him alone. Rhesus thought he must be going, but she came back, solitary, and stood near him again, gazing in silence at the palace. He longed to speak, to move, but even when she sighed he could not break the spell. And while he hesitated some one came swiftly up and the two fell to earnest talk The newcomer was a man.

Rhesus could not see his face at first, nor recognize his voice, though it was strangely familiar to his ears. He listened intently to their conversation. It related, queerly enough, to himself. Yet that caused him no amaze compared with what he felt when the man turned, showing his features, and Eutasia pronounced his name.

"You are late in coming, friend," said she. "You have not yet told me what you discovered in your last search."

"Something of greater import has delayed me," said the man. "Something that makes it needless to tell you how I fared in the search. Cannot you think, Eutasia?"

"Have you learnt where Rhesus is?" she cried excitedly.

"Better than that, in one way; yet perchance worse in another. Rhesus is here, in this city. He landed this morning, in company with Marcen."

"And where is he now?" asked Eutasia. "where is he now, Proclus? Why don't you bring him here to me—or take me to him?"

"Because I cannot trace him far after the landing," said Proclus. That moment he turned his head so that Rhesus saw the profile of his face.

It was Proclus in very truth—Proclus, whom he had deemed dead those many years—Proclus, his cynical friend—Proclus, who had been left in the black Hall of Waters, under the falling walls of the blazing convent—Proclus in the flesh, strong, well, undeniable!

Rhesus forgot his caution. He gave a cry of wonder, missed his footing, slipped through the veil of leaves, and went stumbling before them. Eutasia stifled a shriek when she saw him, then ran into his outstretched arms with a sob of sudden joy. Proclus stole some distance away.

Rhesus pressed the dear form close. He showered the hoarded caresses of many hopeless days upon the sweet red lips. He looked into her tear-filled eyes and read there the charter of his full possession. The flattery of the Court, the favours of the Empress, the persecutions of Marcen, the fear that Rhesus was lost to her for ever, had not once impaired her affection. She was his now, his wholly, as she had been that far back day when first he kissed her saucy lips.

"The time is going, Rhesus," she said at last. "We must be careful here, and we have much to say. Come closer to the shade of the tree, and tell me how you have fared this long, weary time."

"It is a long story," said Rhesus. "I must be brief in my telling, but this is the pith of it."

And clasping her waist in the shadow he told her his adventures as well as he could. She wept for his miseries and laughed at his boldnesses, and smiled at his good-fortune until he came to the end. But when he spoke of Marcen her eyes lit up with an angry fire.

"You need say little more of him," she cried. "There lives no meaner, no cleverer, no more unscrupulous rogue! I believed in him long, deceived by his cunning words and ways. I sent you away from this very place with a sore heart because of him. For your sake I promised to become his wife, thinking him a friend. But I overheard him talking with the Empress one day not long after your exile, and I knew then how I was deceived, how I had wronged you. I refused to marry him, and when he threatened me with his revenge, I went to Theodora. She had some misgivings also, and sent him to the dungeons because he would not divulge the secret of the treasure, of which Proclus has told me. He was liberated shortly, however, and has persecuted me often, since, venturing as high in the palace circles as he dared after his debasement. A year ago he went away—it seems to get you in his clutches and wrest from you the key he believes you to possess."

"I see it all now!" cried Rhesus. "The consummate wretch! I see it all now. It was Proclus who wrote on the wall "The key is found." Proclus has the key now!"

"That he has, friend," said the cynic, coming rapidly towards them, "though you thought him stabbed to death and then drowned! The gods, you see, are loth to let those die who find no joy in living!"

"You are bitter as of yore against the Fates," said Rhesus. "But how came you to escape? It passes my comprehension. I surely saw you killed."

"Not surely, eh? It is very simple. That fellow's knife went into me, 'tis true, but it missed a vital part. As for the water, I am a good swimmer. When you had gone I crawled up the steps, and when the ruins had cooled down somewhat, got out into the city and found friends. Being thus to all good purpose dead to the world, I took a fresh name and became a courtier. Eutasia alone knew me again in the disguise I have since worn, and for her sake as well as my own I have sought you far and wide. I heard but this noon of your arrival in the city, and here, indeed, you are!

"But if I mistake not, we have yet a hard task before us. We must act quickly and strike ruthlessly if we are to circumvent this Marcen once and for all and get away with Eutasia and the treasure. For I take it, Rhesus, that you have done with your ambitions—that you will be glad to be back in fair Sicily, where society, if not so learned and besotted, is at least less rotten!"

"It is a cruel thrust, friend risen from the dead!" said Rhesus, "but I grant you the victory. I have done with this accursed city and all its people—save you two. But what is it? Why look so strangely at each other?"

"Tell him, Proclus," said Eutasia, averting her face. "I cannot."

"It is hard to say, friend," said Proclus, "but such things must come to all of us, I opine, and are best met and faced at once. In my journeyings in search of you I went to Sicily; to your home. The house was silent. The farmlands were untilled save a little patch round the herd's cottage. Your father was dead, Rhesus; buried beside your mother. Only the old servitors who tended the home lands and the flocks remained, strong in the faith that you would return. I left gold to ward off the avaricious offers of your neighbours, telling them that you would surely come back. I came away, leaving them well content. So you cannot go too soon."

The blow was heavy, and more so because unexpected. Rhesus stood awhile silent, looking away from his friends. Then he took Eutasia's hand and his eyes sought hers.

"It seems my home is waiting for me," he said, keeping back the tears. "Will you come and share it with me, dear, and leave this gay life? If we cannot give you equal wealth and flattery, our sunny land can give you peace and plenty, and smiling goodwill. Say, dear, shall we go together. . . .?"

She clasped his hand tightly, and raised it to her lips with a tenderness he had seen in no other woman, and that was new even to her, and said:

"Why ask me, Rhesus? Where would not I go with you?"

That was enough, and he turned to Proclus.

"And you, too, friend? Will you not come with us? The strain of your satire will temper our foolish young joy, perchance!"

"Perchance," answered he. "We shall see. But we must be going now. To-morrow we will arrange our plans."

"Till to-morrow, then," they said. Eutasia sped away down the garden path in the dim night glimmer like a fleeing shadow. The friends made for the portal in the wall, where the cynic's name got them through.

No one was in sight in the narrow way as they emerged from the darkness of the arching stone, so they stood in converse awhile. Rhesus asked his friend two questions that had been on his lips a dozen times.

"Why did you not get the treasure for yourself when I was gone and you had the key," he said. "And where did you find that?"

"It was the first thing that my hands touched when I crept out of the water. You must have dropped it and trailed it along the ground with your foot as they took you away. It was red with blood. As to the other matter—why, Rhesus, for all my city veneer, I trust that I make a true friend. And I have given up the idea of securing it all. As much as we two can carry away in one journey will enrich us for life. Then we can throw the key away and let him get the rest who can."

"You are right," said the other. "I care not for too much, so that we get safely away. Why not go to-morrow?"

"It is not possible," said Proclus quickly. "If I go with you I have matters to arrange that cannot be settled until the day beyond. But on second thoughts, Rhesus, in case we should not see each other until late, these are my plans. In my name and character I have good influence and ample opportunity. A well-fitted galley, swift, and manned by a crew of stout fellows bribed to secrecy, will be waiting for us at the foot of the palace steps, where the imperial ship lay ready on the night of Nika. We must not fail in meeting there. You must go back to Marcen now, keeping up pretence of friendship and putting him off with various pretexts. But what noise was that? There is something moving in the shadow yonder! Quick, Rhesus, with your javelin; you used to be a good thrower."

The short shaft left his friend's hand as he spoke. It sang in a bright curve towards the moving form. The form leapt sideways into the semi-light, and the dart fell harmlessly. Then, as the friends unsheathed their swords, a dozen figures started into life along the wall. More barred the outlet of the way, and a group sprang up behind.

As they closed, with drawn weapons, Rhesus recognised in the face of one the passion-distorted visage of Marcen. The friends were caught in a trap.

As the hired accomplices of Marcen closed upon them—they were gladiators, hungry for all and any sort of work now the arena was closed—Rhesus felt the wild frenzy of deferred revenge leap up strong within him. He was fighting against the wall, for life and all that made life dear; and before him was the man whose cunning had been his ruin and whose fate he had had in his hands three times already and yet foolishly spared. He was roused.

"This time," he said to Proclus, as they hewed at the foe in unison, "the traitor shall not escape!"

Though outnumbered ten to one, they resisted stubbornly, and after the first rush, the ardour of the assassins cooled somewhat. Marcen drew them off, and tried to make terms. Rhesus would not have listened, but Proclus said why not rest awhile, and had his way.

"I thought you a man of your word, Rhesus," said Marcen. "When in fairness you promised me one half, I thought you meant it. But I deem it best to make sure of any man, so I followed you here. Growing suspicious, I made bold to learn your business with this fellow whom I thought we had done with long ago. I have heard your pretty scheme in detail. It was well that I came prepared for all emergencies. But to save further killing and unseemly riot, and to avoid the attention of the city guards I will make you a peaceable offer. I will give you one third of the treasure if you will put down your blades, come with me, and unlock the door."

Rhesus laughed disdainfully, telling him to make such terms with a coward or a fool.

"You are in my power," he replied sullenly.

"This is truly an amusing affair!" cried Proclus. "Here we are in his power, and he cringes to us for a secret! Come, let us be going home!"

"If I betray you to Theodora—what then?"

"Why, you would not be long after me to the galleys or the gibbet, man," laughed the cynic. "But make way, there, we are in haste!"

The mention of the galleys stirred up an evil memory in Rhesus, and together the friends dashed forward at the ruck, Rhesus making the traitor his mark. The blow caught him, but their attack was so sudden that he could not stay to make sure. The gladiators were taken by surprise, and hurling three to the ground, the friends got through and tore down the street, the others following in hot pursuit.

It was almost too dark to see their way. The dogs that snarled over the offal in the gutters came near tripping them often. But they both knew the city well, and down this alley and that, across this square and through that deserted arcade, they dodged and ran. Their lives hung on their speed, yet those behind dogged them stubbornly, and gradually gained. Rhesus found that he had lost the staying power of his younger days. The rowing hold had done its evil work too well. At last, in the middle of the long street before the great church, he began to flag, and bade Proclus go on.

"Save yourself!" he said. "I can run no farther."

"But you must come some way," cried Proclus. And he lifted the other to his shoulder with a strong effort. Sundry arrows flew past as he ran on again thus burdened, and the pursuers quickly drew up. This was not to Rhesus' liking, and he felt relieved when he heard the rumble of a chariot and Proclus set him down. The latter had almost run into the tardily-moving vehicle. They were not slow in taking advantage of its opportune appearance. A bishop, going home late from some synod or other drunken feast, sat alone in it, asleep. His charioteer had evidently left him to his own devices. His plump hands were locked on his fat paunch, his head thrown forward, his chin half buried in the wine-sodden folds of his costly robe. They had neither pity nor respect for him, and while Proclus held the horses, Rhesus roughly bundled the pious sot into the road. They sprang in and seized the reins; and as the pursuers came panting up, cracked the lash and shot away.

The startled steeds, cheated of their quiet amble, dashed forward furiously, and so, shouting defiance to the baffled foe, the friends tore on, rattling and plunging, through the dim and peaceful streets. Some of the folk, ever fearful, threw open their lattices and shrieked for the soldiery, others ran after them a little way, and once a group of night watchmen, emerging, reeling, from the friendly shelter of an illicit inn, tried to stop them. But they still held on madly. They heard behind a rolling rattle that was not the echo of their own swift-turning wheels, and knew that Marcen had found a friend in need and was not yet shaken off.

"We shall get out here—I know the place well," said Proclus, as he pulled up before a great, grim house. "I have long had this ready for emergencies."

Rhesus followed him, and left the chariot standing empty by the doorstone. As Marcen's car rolled into view, they lifted the latch and passed into the house, bolting the door on the inside. Passing through many rooms and long passages and strong doorways, they came to a stable facing the street beyond. Here a horse stood harnessed, with a light car bright and greased, and an attendant ready attired. A few seconds and they were in, and off again, flying swiftly and softly, like the wind. This time they were unpursued, they thought, and threading their way through many obscure alleys, made for the ruined convent of St. Conan, under which lay the gold so coveted, so hard to obtain.

RAPID METHOD OF BANISHING
SUPERABUNDANT FAT.

Astounding Success in the Treatment of Obesity.

GOOD NEWS FOR STOUT PERSONS.

Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month, with the greatest posible benefit in health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight 11lb. or 21b. daily, as the weighing machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an undoubted success; and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring recorder. The treatment aims at the actual root of obesity, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For their information we may say that on sending three penny stamps a book, entitled "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing a reprint of Press notices from some hundreds of medical and other journals—British and foreign—and other interesting particulars, including the "recipe," can be had, post free, from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.

The following are extracts from other journals:

MARVELLOUS RESULTS IN CURING CORPULENCY.

We find a writer in a recent issue of that excellent publication the Penny Illustrated Paper, says: "The corpulent will be glad to learn how to lose two stone in about a month, with benefit to health, strength, and muscle, by a comparatively new system. It is a singular fact that the patient returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive organs and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto; yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight one or two pounds daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. The book, 'Corpulency, and the Cure' (256 pages), containing the 'recipe' can be had gratis from Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., by sending cost of postage, threepence."

We had the curiosity to send to this specialist, and found to our surprise that he had discovered a simple herbal remedy most pleasant to the taste, which entirely disposed of the necessity of starving one's self if he wished to be rid of all superfluous matter. An interesting point, which goes to prove that the almost magical compound is beyond doubt harmless, is that in prescribing it in a tentative way to lean persons, or rather to those who carry no superfluity of fat beyond that which is required as fuel for Nature's furnace, the medicine is absolutely inoperative, attacking only that unhealthy disease-creating waste accumulation which is the burden of the fat creature's existence. In many cases where people take decoctions, reputed to be new medical discoveries, to cure some specific disease, they may recover by the action of the medicine, or Nature may have effected her own cure. In the case of corpulency, if a simple remedy undertakes to reduce a person, say 7lb. in a week, all that one has to do is to get weighed, and thus prove it conclusively. So it is with Mr. Russell's compound, but he asks you to prove it in twenty-four hours only.—Rochdale Star.

TWO POUNDS OF FAT REMOVED IN TWENTY-FOUR HOURS.

A Mr. Russell, author and specialist in obesity, has experimentally tried the effect of administering large doses to moderately lean persons of his well-known herbal discovery, which is so marvellously effectual in reducing superfluous fat, with the result that there is not the slightest alteration or diminution of weight recorded, thereby proving conclusively to our minds that it is only the unhealthy adipose waste tissue which is destroyed, for after dispersing a few fluid ounces of his remarkable vegetable compounds he succeeds in destroying the diseased fatty mass at the rate of from 2lb. to even 12lb. in seven days. There can be no ambiguity about it, for any person can test this for themselves by standing upon a weighing-machine. He explains that all lean persons carry a certain amount of fat necessary for the natural production of heat in the body; but Nature has only stored up her requisite stock in the healthy system, which she most zealously guards, and thus declines to part with an ounce to the persuasions of Mr. Russell's vegetable tonic, however immoderate the dose may be, which testifies abundantly to to the fact that it is only a chemical solvent of insalubrious adipose tissue. There is no doubt that the inventor of the composition must have possessed a profound vegetable knowledge in selecting this simple but peculiar combination.

Those who resort to the pernicious products of the mineral kingdom, or even the deleterious sections of the vegetable world, doubtless can decoct something powerful, but injurious in its action; such, however, require no laudatory commendation. But Mr. Russell (we herewith append his address: Woburn House, 27 Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., the author of "Corpulency, and the Cure," 256 pages, price threepence, stamps, post free), makes no secret of the simplicity of his treatment, and avers that the decoction can be drunk as a refreshing summer drink, pleasant to the palate, yet having sufficient effect, although perfectly harmless, to remove generally 2lb. or more in twenty-four hours. We think stout persons would do well to send for this book, which can be obtained at the address given above.—Leeds Times

SHORT TRUTHS.

O. P. T.—Stout officers are unknown in the United States army, for the simple reason that no man weighing over one hundred and sixty pounds can join a cavalry regiment, while officers in the general service are likely to be retired for obesity.

T. C. has the misfortune to be cross-eyed, and wants me to tell him of a remedy.———If the squint is at all pronounced, I'm afraid there is nothing for it but the usual operation for squint. As he tells me he has worn glasses for two years, under medical advice, without effect, I am afraid nothing but this would meet his case. He had better consult his doctor as to the expediency of going to an eye hospital.

N. T.—No two birds fly in exactly the same manner. The style of their flight depends upon the texture and form of their wings, feathers, and tail.

W. A. D.—Yes, sardines are becoming alarmingly scarce, and this circumstance is most calamitous to the fishing population on the coast of the Bay of Biscay. It is supposed that the waters of the Bay have become colder, and that the sardines have, in consequence, migrated elsewhere. A very large proportion of the fish sold as sardines are, in reality, Cornish pilchards.

T. M.—All Ambassadors have the same rights and privileges at the Courts to which they are accredited, and precedence only follows the notified priority of arrival.

H. W. asks: "How is opium obtained from the poppy?"———By cutting the capsule of the flower with a notched iron instrument at sunrise. The next morning a drop or so of juice will have oozed out. It takes a great many poppies, however, to make a pound of opium, and it goes through a number of processes before it is ready for the market. In its liquid state it looks like dark strawberry jam.

R. D. S.—A locust is rather a dainty morsel to eat, especially the female, which tastes of green wheat. Both sexes are edible when fried in butter, or salted, or sun-dried, or "plain boiled." In parts of Beluchistan, they are munched raw.

Smythe asks: "Is it absolutely compulsory for every Britain to have a Christian name?"———Certainly not. There is no law to that effect. So long as Society is constituted as it is at present, however, you may be sure that human beings will be known by Christian names, whether they are bestowed upon them in the ordinary manner or not.

I am so often asked by my readers to tell them of a cure for stammering, that I am sure the following simple cure which has recently come under my notice will be of interest to many: The sufferer must fill his lungs by a strong inhalation before beginning to speak. This simple plan will often cure the most obstinate of cases.

K.—The Russian sceptre is of solid gold. It is three feet long, and among the precious stones with which it is studded are 268 diamonds.

C. P. T.—On the whole, asphalte paving wears better and lasts longer than either macadam or wood. It has been found that on a busy street macadam will wear at the rate of from five to six inches a year, while asphalte wears only one-fifth of an inch. Wood pavement will wear from five to six years in a busy street, and twice this length of time in less-frequented streets, while fifteen years on a granite road will not wear it more than two inches.

Ostler.—It is a mistake to suppose that a trotting horse has always one foot on the ground. Instantaneous photography has proved that a horse at full trot has all four feet in the air at certain points of its progress.

W.—Many people in this country believe that the kind of summer we shall have is forecasted by the weather on March 21st, and the winter by that of September 21st. In other words, those two days are miniatures of the summer and winter respectively. In Central and Eastern Switzerland the peasants pin their faith to "Gallus-Tag"—the festival day of their British apostle, St. Gall, October 16th. "As it is on St. Gall's Day, so it will be through the winter." "A dry Gallus-Tag foretells a dry summer next year." Those are two of the many sayings of the peasantry concerning the great day.

P. P.—The words put in italics in the Bible have been added by the translators in order to make clearer the meaning of the passages in which they occur.

"Do members of the Royal Family pay rates and taxes?" is the question put by Democrat.———Sometimes. It all depends. All their property which belongs directly to the Crown is exempt from taxation of any kind. For instance, all the royal estates and those lent by Her Majesty to her children are free; but they must pay for their private property in the same way as other people have to do.

Amateur—The green-room of a theatre was so-called because it was originally painted or decorated with green to relieve the eyes of the actors from the glare of the footlights.

D. H. W.—It takes three minutes for all the blood in the body to pass through the heart.

R. M.—The income of the Czar is two and a half millions a year.

Messenger.—The best carrier pigeon is the Antwerp or Belgian Voyageur, which can fly five hundred miles in twelve hours, if the weather be fine. One hundred miles is considered a long flight for London carriers; but the foreign flying matches are usually over distances varying between two hundred and five hundred miles.

"How is it that gold retains its colour when other metals tarnish?" is the question put by Roberts.———Because gold is not acted upon by oxygen or water. It is the moisture in the air which causes other metals to tarnish. Water contains a large amount of oxygen, as you know, and it is the oxygen in the moist air combining with the surface of the metals that covers them with tarnish. Pure platinum is another untarnishable metal.

R. H. J.—In our Parliament the length of speeches may be limited, but not arbitrarily. The Speaker can exercise a right of closure if he deems fit when a question under discussion has, to his mind and to that of the rest of the House, been sufficiently debated. This, however, is a special rule, and only occasionally enforced.

Mabel.—The "peculiar little shuffle" to which you refer as being characteristic of the gait of a Japanese girl is not due to the high wooden clogs she wears, but to the curious sort of bandage which compresses the lower part of the body and the hips, thus making the legs only really moveable from the knee downward.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 503.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending August 20th, 1898.

IN THE DAYS OF NERO.

"GOOD day to you, signor."

I turned and saw my latest acquaintance, Father Ignatius, whom I had met under such interesting surroundings a few days before, when I had been in the same church.

"I was wondering when you would come and see me again," he remarked, when I had formally saluted him. "You promised to come and go through some of the old MSS. in the library. The invitation for you to do so was a real one."

I explained to him that I had been almost a prisoner owing to a slight attack of fever.

"Then why not have sent for me?" and he smiled.

"Oh, it was not so bad as that," I laughingly rejoined, but I could not for the life of me say whether his remark was in jest or earnest. "I am only too anxious to get at these MSS. of the past. This is my first day out, and as soon as I get into your delightful church, I see something to arrest my attention, and set my imagination to work."

"What is the mystery to-day, signor?"

"This," and I pointed to an inscription cut round the base of a marble pillar:

VALENSSACERDOSET. . . . . R.I.P.

Some name has evidently been erased; one can readily see that time has not been the eraser, but the hand of man. The remainder of the sentence is so distinctly cut into the stone."

"Well, signor, you have at once opened the way for the strangest of stories. For a long time that blank with the remains of letters puzzled me, for one can see, as you say, that the name has been deliberately obliterated which was meant to be commemorated together with that of Valens. I knew that tradition said that Valens was the first priest and founder of this church, and that before becoming a priest he had served with the colours under Suetonius—not unknown, I think in your own country," and he turned to me. "But come, take one more look at the inscription, if you care, and we will go into the sacristy, and you shall hear the story, if you wish."

I expressed my great pleasure, and he left me, returning quickly with a dusty bundle of parchments.

"Would you care to go through the MSS. yourself?" he asked, as he undid the tapes which bound them together.

"I would rather hear the story from you," I answered. The fact is, though I am a fairly good Latin scholar, I was not so sure about the abbreviations of monkish Latin. Another reason was, I knew my clerical friend sufficiently well to know that I should get the pith of the story and all that was worth hearing without the trouble of wading through superfluous matter. He was a critic, too, of no mean order, and would call my attention to doubtful parts.

"This," he said, "is not, of course, the handwriting of Valens, but it is the history of him written by one who had spoken to those who had talked with Valens. There is, I daresay, much that is exaggeration, but I am inclined to believe that the greater part contained here is genuine and authentic," and he turned over the parchments, evidently in search of some particular passage.

"Here is the part which refers to that inscription you noticed," and he read:

All rights reserved.]

"'And Valens dying did strictly charge Gaius and Marcus that they should pray for the soul of Camilla, whom he had loved, and he made them take oaths thereto.'

"Then there is another passage, further on, which gives the very inscription:

"'So in accordance with the wish of Valens, Amicus, the stone worker, did inscribe VALENS SACERDOS ET CAMILLA R.I.P.'

"Once knowing the name, it is easy to see from the remains that the missing word in the church is Camilla. Did you notice the remains of some of the letters?"

"I was sure the first letter was C," I replied.

"Yes, this leaves no doubt. So I will begin the story. But first will you have some wine? No! Well then, smoke if you wish. I do not use tobacco myself, and therefore can offer you nothing, but I like to see other people enjoy it."

I thanked him, and lighted a cigar. "Now for Valens," I said, as I settled myself comfortably in the chair, and Father Ignatius sat up to the table with the MSS. and some notes of his own before him.

"Valens," he began, "was a young scion of one of the patrician families of the city in the days of the empire. As a child he was the intimate friend and playmate of Camilla, the only daughter of Servius Galba, who was then in charge of the legion of the Rhine provinces."

"Who afterwards became Emperor?" I interrupted.

"The same; but he came to the purple too late to help his daughter," he replied, and went on with the story.

"It was owing to the absence of the father that the mother of Valens received his little daughter into her own house on the death of the child's mother, and, being a widow, I suppose she looked forward to the little girl's company when Valens adopted the profession of a soldier. Not much is recorded of those early days, simply the dry facts. The luxury and elegance of the capital, and the manner of life of its nobles, apparently had no attractions for Valens, who, at a very early age, was placed in one of the military academies, and at the very earliest opportunity he was sent on into Gaul to serve under Suetonius, who, I believe, was related to him.

"Being a lad of good parts, and not spoilt by luxury, as were many of our youth at that period, and possessing a good constitution, the hardships endured in Gaul and Britain, where, for a time, he was with Aulus Plautius, were not long in making him a seasoned soldier. The bravery of his race was all there, and he rapidly won promotion. Soon after the accession of Nero, Valens was chosen by Suetonius as the bearer of the congratulations of the legions serving under him. He also carried a letter of recommendation to the Emperor, in which Suetonius spoke of his young protégé as 'one of the men who won the victories for the immortal Nero.'

"Cæsar received the young man graciously, and appointed him to a post in the palace. It may have been, perhaps, this special favour from the Emperor which prompted the young soldier to match himself against Burrhus, who was then Prefect of Rome, and about whom opinions differ.

"During the time of his sojourn with the legions, many changes had taken place. His mother was dead, and Camilla, the playmate of his boyhood, was not only grown up, but engaged to marry the prefect Burrhus. This was the bitter part to young Valens. Knowing of their former friendship, he received a message from the prefect that any attentions on his part to the lady of his choice would meet with the disapproval of her lover. To this, and in fact to all his friends' entreaties, Valens gave no heed.

"He at once sought out Camilla, who was then one of the ladies attached to the court, and in spite of her engagement to the prefect, paid violent court to her. At first he reproached her for consenting to marry such a man as the prefect, who, although a Hercules in strength and as handsome as Apollo, possessed a heart as black and as base as any in Rome. His name was the synonym for the deepest vices and the grossest cruelties.

"Valens made no secret of his intentions. He meant to marry Camilla, and lost no opportunity of pressing his suit. All this was well known to Burrhus, who no doubt would have dispatched the young soldier at once, but the ardent lover was a great favourite at court, and the prefect had to be careful. However, he laid his plans with subtlety and bided his time.

"Meanwhile, the young soldier had so gained the affections of Camilla, that she, far from repelling his advances, encouraged him and asked Burrhus to release her. This he refused to do. Valens was warned that his life was in danger, and urged to leave the capital, but he laughed and calmly went on with his love-making.

"People wondered how it would end, for the prefect was not a man to be trifled with. Three times attempts were made to assassinate Valens, and each time the assassins answered for their audacity by their lives. Burrhus would have fought his rival gladly, but he feared the Emperor, and besides this, his plan was a better and safer one.

"At that time the blessed St. Paul was a prisoner in Rome, and this MSS. states that he and Valens often conversed together. It may have been. It is well established that the apostle was allowed considerable liberty, and that he made numerous converts in Cæsar's household.

"However, the love-making of our hero was cut short by his suddenly being arrested as a convert to this new superstition, as it was called. The writing says that he was dragged from the presence of Camilla by Tigellinus and Petronius Arbiter, favourite officers of the Emperor, and intimate friends of Burrhus.

"Camilla appealed to Poppæa, but this celebrated wife of Nero had not the influence then that she had in after years. However bad she may have been, there are many acts of kindness which should be remembered to her credit, and certainly she did her best for the prisoner; but the crafty prefect was too subtle for her.

"After two months of confinement, during which time various influences were at work on each side, the doom of Valens was pronounced. He should fight for his life with the gladiators at the next spectacle to be held in Nero's garden.

"Poppæa promised Camilla that she would be present when the fight took place, and stop the gladiator from killing Valens outright.

"This was one of the privileges possessed by the Empress at the public sports, and it was frequently exercised. Through it many noble lives were spared to years of usefulness.

"But here again the machinations of Burrhus were at work. Whether he had heard or anticipated this last resource of the Empress the record does not say, but certainly he was prepared for it.

"The distracted maiden was mad with grief, and in order to stay her marriage, feigned illness, and threw herself on the protection of Poppæa, who, to her credit, did battle nobly for the poor girl.

"Through her she was able to have one interview with her lover before the day appointed for his death. She had dispatched messengers to her father, Galba, but they had always been waylaid and slain by those in the pay of the man she hated.

"So the fatal day arrived, and the people assembled in the grounds of the Emperor to witness the sports; Valens was only one among many who were called upon to offer themselves as targets for the hacking of swords of the gladiators. The lust of blood which had prompted the ancestors of these Romans to deeds of valour, now urged them on to deeds of atrocious cruelty. The Christians on these occasions rarely made any effort to defend themselves; it was simply a massacre, and a torrent of blood.

"After some minor shows—a fight between a lion and a tiger, and the exhibition of a Gaul who fought without any weapon with a wolf that had been kept from all food for three days—the arena was cleared, and amidst the plaudits of the mob, and the flourish of trumpets, the condemned Christians were marched in, and placed in position. Among them was Valens.

"It was a cruel sight to see the form once so strong and handsome now so wasted with hunger and suffering, and the narrator dwells at length on his emaciated appearance. For a moment he seemed dazed with the fierce glare of the sun, so the old chronicler tells us; then he seemed to recover.

"A short sword was put into his hands, similar to what was given to the other Christians, and he immediately turned towards the Emperor's box, and made the usual salutation of a Roman officer. Some slaves came out, and sprinkled more sand over the ground, and insisted upon the Christians taking up their swords, for most of them had thrown them on the ground.

"One man threw his weapon in the direction of the imperial box. There was a cry immediately of 'Christianus ad leones!' and amidst the yells of the people, he was dragged off, and reserved for a more horrible fate, which I need not mention.

"Then a hush of expectancy fell on the throng as the gladiators marched in. It was noticed immediately that there was a new one among them. Contrary to custom, he wore his helmet closed, so that his eyes and nose were hidden, and he was in full armour. The stranger caused great excitement in the minds of the vulgar, and when he took up his position in front of Valens, whose fate excited most interest, the name of the unknown was eagerly inquired, but no one could, certainly no one did, get any answer. 'A Hercules!' 'A Pollux!' the people shouted. Alongside of Valens, who was tall, the newcomer looked a giant. However, the signal was given. Valens made a desperate effort to break his chains."

"Surely," I ventured, "they did not fight in chains?"

"Yes, they did. Chains were attached to their ankles and their wrists, sufficient to allow the free use of the arms, but still placing them at a great disadvantage, for it was not meant that the Christians should escape or defend themselves with any chance of success, but just sufficient to add interest to what was really a massacre. The manuscript says that when the combat commenced Poppæa hid her face behind her hands, and never looked up till all was over.

"None of the other Christians attempted to defend themselves, and they were ruthlessly hacked to pieces. Much to the surprise of everyone the lover of Camilla resolutely gripped his sword, stood on the defensive, and occasionally gave a thrust; but he was greatly hampered with his chains, though they were not heavy. They are still kept among the relics of this church. I can show them to you afterwards. Remind me when I have finished."

I nodded, rather impatiently, perhaps, for I was interested in the narrative.

"Well," he went on, "the people shouted with delight, pleased at their citizen soldier showing spirit, Christian though he was, and cheers rent the air as the two closed with clash of swords. Everyone felt it was only warding off his death for a moment or two, but again and again

Digitized by Google

Valens exhibited exceptional skill in the way he received the savage blows of his mailed antagonist.

"'Well parried, by Bacchus!' they shouted. 'By Pollux, if the Christian were not hampered with those chains, the gladiator's pay would go to his next of kin,' shouted another. It is easily seen from the MSS. how the old Roman spirit of the Christian writer is stirred by these recognitions of courage.

"Still, there was no doubt in the minds of the spectators as to the ultimate victory of the gladiator. 'He but plays with him,' cried one. 'By Bacchus, that was a near one,' as the sword of the stranger flashed for a moment over the head of Valens, and here the chains saved his life, for as he threw up his sword to guard, they acted as a shield to his head.

"For a moment they paused for breath; then the gladiator opened with a quick succession of passes, but gained no advantage. Their blades clashed and rasped.

"Valens was now acting purely on the defensive, and appeared to be fighting with greater coolness since his narrow escape.

"His eyes burnt, and there was a set, determined expression on his face. He seemed to know exactly where each blow would fall, with a prescience which the very desperateness of his position no doubt brought out. You see, he could not lunge at his antagonist, for, with the posture which he was constrained to adopt through his chains, he was not free to balance himself, and a fall was fatal.

"Still the fight went on.

"He skipped about more nimbly than his opponent, whose armour was every moment becoming more of a disadvantage by reason of its weight and the intense heat, and he would have done better without it. Valens, in spite of his privation, was showing less of fatigue. The shouts had ceased now, and the people gazed in silence at the desperate struggle in which the odds were becoming more even; if anything, they were in favour of Valens, but as yet he had not succeeded in drawing blood from his enemy, as far as could be seen. It was hot work. The two combatants lost no breath over words. Neither had spoken since the fight began and they had now been at it fifteen minutes. The gladiator would gladly have had a pause, but as soon as he showed signs of relaxing, Valens plied him so savagely with his quick thrusts, that he had to keep going or succumb.

"The physical condition of Valens was now manifestly superior, and if he could keep it up, the gladiator must go down through exhaustion. This he evidently grasped as well as the spectators, for he now threw all science to the winds, and bore down on Valens with a wild, desperate cry of vengeance.

"Suddenly there was a yell, as the sword of the unknown caught and shivered that of the Christian into a dozen pieces; but, quick as lightning, before his opponent could recover his balance after the sweeping stroke he had made, Valens sprang in upon him, and brought his chains down behind the neck of his antagonist, and the two rolled on the ground together. The gladiator was uppermost, but before he could shorten his sword to give the final stab, the chain was tightened about his neck with desperate, merciless strength, and Valens rose from the deadly embrace, victor.

"The great Emperor leant forward from his box and clapped his hands. Petronius and Tigellinus rushed forward to see to the vanquished man. When they succeeded in removing the head-gear, which had crumpled up like a piece of cardboard with the strength Valens had used upon it, the gladiator was found to be none other than Burrhus, who had managed, through Tigellinus, who was responsible for the organisation of the shows, to take the place of one of the official gladiators, so as to be sure of his vengeance upon the man who had stolen the heart of the beautiful Camilla, and his cunning had over-reached itself.

"He was not popular, and there were few to mourn his death. Nero, who had manifested the keenest delight during the struggle between the two, now loaded Valens with substantial marks of his favour, and certainly he managed to preserve his life through those troublesome times, which is truly wonderful when we remember the edicts against those professing the creed of Christ, and the relentless cruelty of the measures adopted to exterminate them.

"Soon after his desperate fight with Burrhus, he married the playmate of his youth, Camilla, with whom he was permitted to have, for those days, a long period of uninterrupted happiness.

"For many years he was a prefect in your own island of Britain, where his rule was distinguished for its tolerance.

"While there, Camilla died, and he returned to Rome and sought Holy Orders. He is supposed to have been the founder of this church, but there the authority is legendary. Possibly the congregation to which he attached himself took possession of the old home of paganism here, and turned it into a Christian place of worship; but that must, I fancy, have been years after, when happier times had come upon the church. That is one of the original pillars of the older edifice where you noticed the inscription."

"Why was the name of Camilla obliterated?"

"That was done in later times. Probably it was a concession to the strict rules of celibacy when it laid hold upon Christendom. Another point is—there is no absolute proof that Camilla did become a Christian, and it would be repugnant to all ideas of ecclesiastical order to have the pagan inscribed inside a consecrated building. Come into the library and I will show the chains which Valens wore in the memorable fight. There is no reason to doubt their genuineness, as they are mentioned in our records hundreds of years back. It might be worth your while when you go back to see whether you can discover any memorials of him while he resided there."

A BARRISTER'S FEE.

HILLTHAM had been a residence for gentry when London was small. As the metropolis had spread out its octopus arms and had embraced Hilltham, some of the gentry had left; but those who had stayed formed an exclusive set and looked upon the newer comers with contempt.

Every family of the exclusive circle could boast of its descent. They had not all lived in Hilltham since the days of the Tudors and Stuarts, but they had been there for three or four generations. They had managed to keep the old houses—most of them now modernised—in their exclusive possession, except one. But for that blot they would have been happy.

A mere nobody—a Mr. Davis, dealing in iron or something in the city—had bought the best of the old houses, in their very midst! And this man was a parvenu; his father had been a grocer in a small way in a provincial town. The man had absolutely no family traditions, no ancestors. It was terrible.

His son, Robert, was a rising young barrister, a man who would undoubtedly make a mark in the world, and quite a gentleman. But even that did not soften the exclusive set.

Such being the state of things, just imagine the dismay of Mrs. Cone, one of the leaders of the exclusives, when she discovered by chance that Robert Davis and Elsie Cuyler, the descendant of an old Dutch family which had settled in England a couple of centuries ago, had fallen in love with each other! Just how it happened she did not know; probably at some ball in town.

The lovers had just learnt that she had discovered their secret, and were discussing the subject in a palm-screened corner of Mrs. Martin's great ball-room.

"You are quite sure it has got about?" asked Bob for the twentieth time.

"Sure! Mrs. Cone will be over by to-morrow to condole with mamma. Goodness knows why she hasn't been before—she must have had an attack of something—for nothing but illness could keep her away."

"There's nothing for it, then, but to see your father in the morning," said Bob, gloomily.

"There couldn't be a worse time," said Elsie. "He's so put out about that lawsuit of his; there's a hitch somewhere, and yesterday he heard that his lawyer, Mr. Bull, was ill, and couldn't conduct the case; he's in a terrible way about it."

"It's a great pity about Bull," said Bob. "They are afraid it is softening of the brain. It was sad news to me, for he's been a first-rate friend of mine, the dear old man! I have always thought, though, that he took the wrong view as regards that man Hatch. I suppose that is where the hitch you speak of comes in, for there's a hitch somewhere."

"Why, what do you know about it?"

"Well, the truth is, I have been working up the case a little on my own account," said Bob. "It's rather out of the ordinary run, and interested me, and then in a way, it was your case, you see. Bull and I have talked it over several times. I told him I thought he was wrong about Hatch."

"This suit has been father's one thought for years, almost," said Elsie. "I don't know what he'll do now, I'm sure."

"Well, I'll see him to-morrow," said Bob.

"It won't be a bit of use," sighed Elsie. "Oh, Bob, if I could only give you a few dozen of my grandfathers! Goodness knows I don't want them! It does seem to me so ridiculous that I can't marry whom I please, just because two hundred years ago some Cuyler or other founded the family—as they call it! Just as if he had popped up ready-made like a mushroom! Why didn't that Cuyler die young and leave us unfounded?"

Elsie made her absurd little speech with a laugh, but the laugh was almost a sob.

"Can't you see me at fifty, Bob," she said, "prim and faded, and mildly dejected, with a taste for tea, and gossip, and good works; and not even a cat for company, for I hate the sight of them! Can't you see me, dear Bob?"

"You will be my dear wife long before that," said Bob, taking both of Elsie's hands in his. And there was so much quiet determination in his tone that she felt quite comforted.

"I made a vow that I'd win you," went on Bob, "and win you I will, if you'll only be true to me, Elsie."

"Bob," said Elsie, "I can't promise to marry you without their consent, but I'll love you, and I'll wait for you all my life, dear, dear boy."

It is an easy thing to vow vows. Nothing is simpler—an impulse—a breath, and it is done—but oh, the keeping of them!

Bob had sworn, glibly and hopefully enough, to win his true love in spite of all. It was easy to be hopeful while music throbbed and swayed, and his sweetheart was at his side; but later, when the lights were out, and the music silent, and his sweetheart away, things assumed a different aspect.

Win her? Yes! In that resolution he never faltered, but a great impassable "How" rose up before him and blocked the way. Night, however, brings counsel, and when Bob had finally turned in, though his head, indeed, was a whirl of chaotic ideas, light beamed over chaos; the creation of his plan had begun.

"Are you training for a walking match, Bob?" asked his father at breakfast. "You kept me awake half the night tramping over my head. Next time you have a troublesome case, my son, do, at least, in mercy to me, take your boots off. Was it a troublesome case, my son, or a bad conscience?"

"Neither," said Bob; "it was a troubled mind this time. The fact is, father, I'm going to be married."

"Well, you're frank at least, and certainly there is something refreshingly sudden about you, Bob! When is it to be? To-morrow?"

"In about twenty-five years' time, father, I should think," said Bob, gloomily.

"I'm glad you give one time to get used to the idea," laughed Mr. Davis. "You quite took my breath away. Who is she, my boy?"

"It is Elsie Cuyler, father," said Bob.

Mr. Davis sprang to his feet.

"Look here, my son, haven't you more pride than to let one of that family play the fool with you? A girl with no more heart—no more truth——"

"Don't, father, please," interrupted Bob. "I can't let even you say a word against her—I love her too well."

"But, Bob, my boy," stammered Mr. Davis, "I tell you I know what they are! They are all alike, root and branch—they are all alike heartless and false; I ought to know—I suffered enough at their hands!"

"Not Elsie, father," interrupted Bob again.

"And prouder than Lucifer."

"But not Elsie," said Bob.

Mr. Davis groaned.

"Now, my dear old father," said Bob, throwing his arm caressingly over his father's shoulder, "nothing you can say will shake my faith in her. She has the pluck to stand out against any Cuyler or anyone else."

"Well," said Mr. Davis with a sigh, "have your own way, Bob. I won't stop you if you think you are right. I don't see how you are going to get her, though."

"I've got a plan in my head," said Bob. "I'm going down to see Bull about it."

The immediate result of Bob's visit to Mr. Bull was two notes. One, addressed to Peter Cuyler, Esquire, was as follows:

DEAR CUYLER,

Come to my house, if you can, some time either to-day or to-morrow; I am forbidden the office. I want to see you about the suit. Robert Davis has just been in, and he struck me as just the man to take it. He has the whole case at his fingers' ends; has been studying it very carefully. I verily believe he has hit on a solution of the Hatch difficulty—cleverest thing I ever heard. I don't think you could get anybody better to carry the case up for you. He is young, of course, but his law is sound, and he is wonderfully keen, and a brilliant speaker. If you think well of it, I will have him meet you here at any time you name, so the sooner something is settled the better.

Yours very truly,
J. BULL.

The other note ran:

MY LITTLE SWEETHEART,

Just a little line to tell you that I shall not see your father this morning, after all. I have a new plan which I will explain to you to-night at the Freemans'. Meantime, suppress Mrs. Cone. Until to-night, my darling, good-bye.

Hastily, but ever faithfully, BOB.

While Elsie was still poring over Bob's note, she was hastily summoned to her mother's room, where she found Mrs. Cuyler in tears, a telegram in her hand.

"Your grandmamma, my dear, your poor, dear grandmamma," sobbed Mrs. Cuyler. "Your Uncle Richard has just telegraphed me to come at once—and I'm afraid it is the end. She is so old; ninety-five her last birthday."

Whereupon Elsie, although her grandmamma had known neither her nor anyone else for ten years, was quite conscience-stricken to find that her keenest feeling was one of rejoicing in that her mother, for a time at least, would be out of reach of Mrs. Cone's tongue.

Immediately all was bustle and confusion in the Cuyler household.

Just as the footman was putting Mrs. Cuyler's travelling-bag in the carriage, Elsie, glancing out of the window, saw Mrs. Cone standing on her doorstep.

"She is coming," thought Elsie, with a sinking at her heart.

"Dear mamma, you will lose your train!" she cried; and straightway she hustled slow, stout Mrs. Cuyler, breathless, but still expostulating, bodily down the stairs.

And just as Mrs. Cone reached the door the carriage rolled rapidly away. And Mrs. Cone simply said good morning to Elsie and walked on.

"What an escape!" gasped Elsie, sinking exhausted into a chair. "In another minute she would have suggested driving down with mamma; I am positive she would. Poor mamma," she added with a little tardy compunction; "I hope she won't have very long to wait at the station!"

Bob threw himself heart and soul into the study of the intricate, puzzling case, which had dropped from Mr. Bull's failing hands into his strong grasp. For Mr. Cuyler had taken Bull's advice and given the case to him.

The case at the time of its first trial had made quite a stir in the legal world. Consequently, could he only lay his finger on the weak spot which he felt existed in the enemy's defences, and succeed in reversing the decision of the court, his name was made. He would then, he felt, be in a position where he could more confidently urge upon Mr. Cuyler the request for his daughter's hand in marriage.

The case was expected to come on in August, and until then it was decided to keep Elsie's parents in ignorance, if possible, of their daughter's revolt against family traditions.

"It isn't exactly like deceiving them, you know," said Elsie somewhat casuistically. "It isn't as if we were going to see each other all the time; as long as we aren't, there certainly can be no use in making everybody unhappy."

"No use at all," said Bob, decidedly. "Of course, I would rather fight it out fair and square. I hate concealment and all that, but when it comes to fighting a lot of ghostly grandfathers, why, I don't see that there is anything for it but to meet them on their own ground, as it were."

Fate had conspired with these young lovers to keep their secret from paternal ears. Mrs. Cuyler, after her mother's death, decided not to return at once, but to have Elsie join her, and to go across immediately to the Riviera for a few months' rest and change. Mrs. Cone therefore, had found no opportunity to enlighten Mrs. Cuyler as to those tell-tale glances and hand-clasps.

This was to be the last meeting before Elsie left.

They had strolled away together in the sunshine under the soft, feathery elm branches. Everything about them thrilled and throbbed with life and hope and gladness; and their hearts thrilled, too, in unison.

Time passed. The case was reached and heard, and the judges were to give their decision in a fortnight.

Bob had fought his fight well, and had made two or three telling points in his argument.

Little thought those learned men, sitting so solemnly, that romance was masquerading before them in legal array; that a bride as well as a decision was being asked at their hands.

The decision was given. Bob had won!

Old Cuyler's enthusiasm knew no bounds, and he offered to make an addition to the fee.

"I am glad to have been of service to you," said Bob, and after a while he named the price of that service.

"The fee I ask is possibly an unusual one," he said. "But you have been good enough to speak of my services as having been of great value to you."

"Eh!" interrupted Mr. Cuyler, sharply.

"Your very kind appreciation, therefore, emboldens me," went on Bob, undisturbed, "as does my knowledge of the importance of this decision to you——"

Mr. Cuyler fidgeted nervously.

"And leads me to hope that you will not think my demand unreasonably great."

"Well, well, out with it! You make as much preamble as though you were asking—asking for a fortune!"

"Mr. Cuyler, I ask as my fee your daughter's hand," said Bob, calmly.

"What, sir!" cried Mr. Cuyler, his red face aflame, "You—you——!"

"I have loved her for years," said Bob.

"You—you nobody! do you dare tell me!" stammered Mr. Cuyler, fairly speechless with indignation.

Bob bent over the peppery old gentleman, holding him down in his chair with one strong, young arm, and looking him full in the eyes.

"Now, Mr. Cuyler, listen to me," he said quietly. "Marry your daughter, I will, either with your consent, or without it, as you please. I will take your consent as my fee. If you refuse it I must, of course, express my demand in pounds, shillings, and pence; and I warn you I shall not insult your daughter by naming a paltry sum as her equivalent.

"You said addition to my fee; but no fee was named!

"I shall then, as I said, marry her without the consent you refuse. I swear I will! You have your choice. Don't answer me now—take till to-morrow to decide; talk it over with Elsie. Possibly you may conclude that to accept my proposition will be the wisest and pleasantest arrangement that you can make, as it certainly is the best from a financial point of view."

"You are a clever young dog! I'll say that for you," fumed Mr. Cuyler.

"Thank you, sir," said Bob pleasantly. "Think over my suggestion, will you? Good-morning. I'll see you to-morrow."

That evening the Cuylers' man-servant actually went up the Davis steps, and pulled the Davis bell handle. Mrs. Cone saw him do it. He left a note, which Bob tore open breathlessly and kissed a dozen times. She saw him through the Davis window. Mrs. Cone was terribly agitated. She hungered and thirsted after the knowledge of what that note contained.

It said:

Oh, Bob, dear Bob, it's all right, they have given their consent at last, and I am so happy! Come over at once; they are expecting you. Don't look for an over-cordial welcome, though. I have tried to impress upon them that 'he gives twice who gives quickly,' but it doesn't seem to affect them. There has been a battle royal, but we have won the day, and nothing else matters, and oh, Bob—I love you—love you—love you.

Yours for ever,
Elsie.

And so, when spring again came, there was a wedding over which discussion waxed fast and furious among the exclusives. All the matrons shook their heads, and all the maidens applauded. The presents were superb. Mrs. Cone herself sent a lovely set of dear little devotional books, bound in white vellum, with such a sweet little note.

The wedding itself was like all other weddings, except that perhaps the bride was prettier than some brides are, and that the bridegroom looked more radiantly triumphant and happy.

A Lost Identity.

"ADAMS is a good man," said the detective-inspector. "He is persistent, and has ideas of his own. We've about given up the Foster murder, but Adam still sticks to it."

"Where'd you get Adams?" asked the chief of police.

"Volunteered; said he'd just come out of the hospital after a short illness—was a stranger, and had nothing to do; had been reading accounts of the murder and wanted to try for the reward, so I let him go ahead. He had done detective work before. He claims to have two clues—a broken iron seal and a torn piece of coat lining. Here he is now."

A man of about thirty-five entered the room where the two officials were sitting.

"Anything new, Adams?" said the inspector.

"Yes, sir," replied the newcomer, emphatically. "How could we have missed it? Look at that!"

Carefully he took from his pocket a large, white envelope stamped and post-marked. It was partially torn, but this much of the inscription remained:

"Mr. William Dryden, Fairfi——"

The inspector examined it curiously and then said, rather contemptuously:

"Why, Adams, we found a bushel of old envelopes in the dead lawyer's office. You haven't abandoned the seal clue?"

He winked merrily at the chief, but a moment later he bit his lips with vexation at his own stupidity.

"I have abandoned nothing, sir," replied Adams with some heat. "We have accounted for every person we know of who entered the lawyer's office the morning of the murder. We have missed this man Dryden. Examine the post-marks on the other side, that of Fairfield of August 15. Dryden received that envelope on the morning of the murder, came straight to the city and went to Foster's office with it. How else could it have got there? Dryden killed him, and I am going to get Dryden."

The following morning Adams was on the way to the suburb of Fairfield. During the long sleepless hours of the night the name of Dryden had haunted him. He had tried his best to recollect who it was of that name he had once known, but at last he gave it up with a gesture of wearied resignation.

Notwithstanding his loss of sleep he was feverishly awake. He was on the eve of solving the great murder mystery. There was no one to divide with him either the honour or the reward, not even Jackson, an envious detective. What better avocation could he have chosen, and at a time, too, when the future had seemed so hopeless?

It was but a short ride to Fairfield. Adams went at once to the little hotel. As he inquired for a room he looked up at the portly landlord and casually asked:

"Got many people here?"

"A few, sir. The Bradburys, the Gillespies, old Mr. Dundon, and young Mrs. Dryden, poor thing!" replied the host in a way that indicated that these people were known to everybody.

"Why 'poor thing'?" asked Adams, catching at the words.

He tried to conceal his anxiety in the question, and felt he had failed. But the landlord was stupid and loquacious.

"Didn't you hear of it, sir? Her husband left here the middle of August and has never been heard of since. Some thinks he's dead, but his wife don't. He was only here once—I was away at the time. She never leaves her room now, except to go to the post office every day."

Adams was at the post-office the next day at the time when Mrs. Dryden usually went. He kept in the background, for he wished to see without being seen. Already he felt ashamed of himself. The idea of spying upon a broken-hearted woman and laying a trap for the one she loved, was something more than merely distasteful to him.

She came at last—a fair, golden-haired woman. Even at a distance he knew that it was she before he made an inquiry. As she drew near he retired behind a recess in the post-office and watched her with staring eyes. Slowly and with seeming reluctance she left the counter after her futile errand. In her face there was an expression of infinite sadness, yet in her eyes still flickered the light of hope.

Adams stood there long after she had disappeared—stood there knowing well that his mission was at an end. Never through his efforts would her husband be captured. Short as was the time he had seen her, he knew that he loved her. In his heart he felt there had always been just such an image of a gentle face.

Out of the post-office he drifted aimlessly. A number of people were coming from the railway station, where a train had just arrived. Suddenly his face flushed in anger as he recognised among the number his fellow-detective, Jackson. In a sort of frenzy he rushed at him and grasped him tightly by both arms.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded.

"I came at a request——"

"Go back at once. I am going. There is nothing in it. Foster requested that the letter be returned to him immediately. That is the investigation of the envelope. I have seen Dryden and investigated everything. The man had nothing to do with the murder. Are you going?"

"Yes; but——"

"Then go!" screamed Adams, beside himself with impatient rage. "I will join you at the station. A train will be due shortly. Stay there or I'll—strangle you!"

Jackson looked at him in amazement, hesitated a moment, and then turned and walked back to the station. Adams watched him until he saw him enter the building, when he wheeled round and strode rapidly to the hotel. He would see her again, perhaps speak to her.

He entered the room which served as a sitting-room. There was no one there. He then walked out to the desk. The little dog-eared hotel visitors' book caught his eye.

With an exclamation of impatience at not having thought of it before, he was at once engrossed in the book. Page after page he went back over the names with his finger until he stopped as if checked by an electric shock. The little clock on the wall above him ticked off five minutes, but still he stood there, his eyes glued to the page and his finger at a name. Then he hurriedly tore the leaf from the book, and crushed it into his pocket.

A moment later, Jackson entered the hotel and started back when he saw Adams. But in the latter's eyes there was no longer any anger. Instead, he regarded the other detective calmly, but steadfastly. Jackson felt reassured.

"Adams, old man," he began, "what is the matter with you? I'm not here on your job; I'm here on another matter altogether. Show me up, landlord."

The two ascended the stairs. Adams waited awhile and then followed them. At the first landing he found himself in front of a room used by visitors to receive friends more privately. The door stood ajar. It was impossible not to have seen within, and he saw there the woman to whom his heart had gone out, conversing with Jackson.

Not long after that he was in his apartments in the city. He got out the broken seal and the torn piece of coat-lining and placed them upon the table. Then he sent for a doctor.

The doctor found him in a state of excitement, bordering on fever. But he was surprised to learn that he had not been sent for to prescribe for his patient.

"Doctor," said Adams, endeavouring to control himself, "when you treated me for my wound at the hospital, was there any scar left after it had healed?"

"Why, how did you learn it?" the doctor broke out involuntarily. "It is impossible for you to see it yourself without artificial means."

"I understand that. Was there anything peculiar about the scar?"

"There was, Mr. Adams; although I have never mentioned it before. The scar is in the shape of a Maltese cross. But you must not think of it."

The doctor never knew how it happened exactly, but he had hardly disclosed his secret when he found himself ushered out of the house and dismissed.

Adams went back to his room trembling, his forehead damp with perspiration.

"Heavens!" he exclaimed, "what made me think of it? What made me examine it?"

Then he snatched up the detached broken arm of the seal and brought it down heavily upon a pad of paper. The impression formed was a Maltese cross.

"Here! Here is where it is," cried the distracted man, as his hand clutched the back of his head. He staggered back as if to fall in a faint, when his distended eyes rested for a second on the piece of lining. A newly-born, unnatural energy seized him.

With the piece of lining in his hand he bounded to his wardrobe and tore down his clothes like a madman. He was not long in finding it—a light overcoat, with a part of the lining gone, which the piece matched and fitted. With clenched hands he raised himself to his full height and then fell upon the bed in a heap.

They found him there the next day at noon—Jackson and the lady from Fairfield. When they entered the room his eyes were like those of a man suddenly killed. At the sight of her, life seemed slowly to kindle in them, the eagerness, then struggling recognition, and then the light of a joyful awakening. As the wife threw herself into the arms of her husband, the veil lifted through which his memory had so long and vainly tried to peer. In the fraction of a second it all came back to him; his visit to the lawyer who had tried to ruin him; the murderous pistol in the hands of the other and his successful struggle to secure it; the cruel blow from behind with the broken seal: the renewed attack by the infuriated scoundrel; himself dazed and lapsing into unconsciousness, yet battling for his life, and finally the indistinct vision of a man beneath him, whose throat he grasped with tightly closed hands. Then he vaguely remembered staggering through the street.

Often again the hideous vision came before him, but he told no man or no woman what he saw. For his conscience had acquitted him.

Untold Tales of the Indian Mutiny.

By H. HUNTER.

III.—THE MYSTERY OF THE RUPEE NOTES.

I TELL the tale as I heard it told.

It was in a pleasant verandah overlooking the goomtee at Lucknow, three-and-twenty years after the incidents narrated had become part of the unwritten history of the great Sepoy Mutiny.

"Yes, India has made many, but it has marred some," observed a retired member of the Bengal Civil Service, who was revisiting the scene of his former labours. "I can recall one, a good soldier, an honest fellow, a thorough gentleman."

We waited for the story, and presently it came.

"Lucknow had fallen, the Kaisarbagh was a wreck, the Court was in flight. Captain Sterling, attached to the 4th Panjabese, covered with dust, grimed with powder, a blood-stained handkerchief bound tightly round his sword-arm, and his tunic cut and hacked to ribbons, wiped his streaming forehead and prepared to follow the orderly.

"He was standing amidst the débris in the Palace gardens, endeavouring by voice and presence to curb the savage fury of the looters, who were smashing whatever they were unable to carry away, when a message from the General summoned him to headquarters.

"Sir Colin was not great in strategy, though he laid his plans skilfully at Lucknow; as a commander he may probably have deserved the sobriquet of 'Crawling Camel' which was given him; but he was a good fighting man, and ever prompt to recognise the quality in another. A display of dogged pluck, a fine contempt of danger, coolness under fire, and a grand capacity for hard hitting—these were the things for which the General kept an open eye, and were the shortest roads to favour in Sir Colin's division.

"At the assault on the Shah Nujif, Sterling had led the Panjabese, who supported the Highlanders under McBean; and now, at the attack on the Begam Kothi, the Captain had again shared the honours with the Scotsmen.

"As they raced up to the walls, neck and neck, Sterling had noticed a lot of bamboo poles, such as natives use for hut-building, lying by a heap of stones near a ruined summer-house. He had no ladders, and thinking the poles might come handy, Sterling ordered his fellows to bring them along. It proved a happy thought. The bamboos were laid against the walls, and the men swarmed up like monkeys till, the poles breaking under the strain, the Captain, who was first man up, was left with only a handful of his own Panjabese and half a dozen kilted laddies, to negotiate matters inside with a thousand-and-odd Jack Pandies. And a very good account he gave of them. How many fell to each man's share 'twould be hard to say; but when the rest of the party got into the place, just fifteen minutes after Sterling had mounted the wall, the rebels were lying about thick as flies round a sugar-cask.

"The incident at the storming of the Begam Kothi was not the only brave deed done by Captain Sterling at the taking of the Royal city of Wajid Ali; but it was the only one which happened to be personally witnessed by Sir Colin himself.

"When Franks had got possession of the Kaisarbagh, and the capital of the Kings of Oudh was practically in the hands of the English, the General sent for Captain Sterling and thanked him publicly for the splendid service he had rendered; assuring him of speedy promotion and promising to consider him for the 'Cross.'

* * * * *

"Roy Sterling was the son of a clergyman in a manufacturing town in the north of England—the only boy in a family of five; a hard worker and devoted to his profession.

"By favour of the County member, a commission had been procured for him in the Bengal Army of the Hon. E.I.C.; and he had landed at Calcutta determined to win promotion and earn distinction. The Mutiny had given him a chance. He was coming rapidly to the front, but—Roy loved a woman!

"Mary Eastman was the daughter of an Englishman who had come out to India in the personal suite of a former Governor-General, and having subsequently obtained service in the establishment of one of the native Princes, had decided to remain.

"Until the outbreak of the Mutiny, George Eastman had been on the extensive Civil List of the King of Oudh. The stables and stud of the luxurious monarch, who had as many horses as wives, had been under the control of the 'cute Yorkshireman. The emoluments were large, but the pickings made them larger. Eastman was reported to be nearly as 'warm' as old Johannes, the Portuguese merchant, who traded in everything—State secrets included, and was said to know more of what went on, both inside and outside the walls, than any half dozen others—black faces or white.

"Of the unmarried 'regimentals' who came out to India in the pre-mutiny days, three out of five would have jumped at Mary Eastman and her handsome little 'dot' as a prize well worth the capture.

"The railways, the big ditch at Suez, and fast steamers, have made India to-day quite another country for Europeans from what it was before '57.

Digitized by Google

"The number of marriageable white girls in the three Presidencies was then comparatively few, and the chances of a run home, unless for the 'bigwigs,' were too fine to be counted upon. Men went to India in those days to stay. Many never returned till they went back for good. Some made their homes in the country and lived out their lives there.

"The fact that Mary's father was in the pay of the King of Oudh, and probably without any scruple about shaking the Pagoda tree, would not have weighed a melon seed with men, most of whom suffered from chronic impecuniosity, and whose principal object in exiling themselves for an indefinite period was to rake in the rupees and retire.

"Mary herself was a finished little coquette — bright, piquant, attractive. She belonged to a class well-known in India—a class which has wrought a good deal of mischief, and ruined not a few promising careers. Greedy of admiration and fond of exercising the fascinations with which she was liberally endowed, she had no sense of prudence, and was unrestrained by domestic influence and healthy example. She had a soft, seductive manner, eyes which she knew how to use, a wonderfully well-shaped hand, and a voice which could either melt or thrill.

"As became her father's daughter she was a splendid horsewoman, and for all her winsome ways was absolutely fearless in the saddle. Wherever she appeared a crowd of men courted her. Her admirers could be counted by the dozen, her followers by the score.

"But the houses of the upper division of the Covenanted Service were closed against the daughter of the King of Oudh's Englishman, consequently the men who gravitated towards Mary Eastman were mostly of the military class and of the adventurer type.

"The European entourage of Wajid Ali Shah was composed chiefly of Portuguese, Italians, and a few crapulous Frenchmen—the offscouring of their respective nations. Above these George Eastman towered, metaphorically, by half a length; but he had touched pitch, and for that and other reasons was not acceptable.

"Lucknow in those days was quite the wickedest city in all India; and the Court, the wickedest quarter in all Lucknow. Mary had lost her mother before she was seventeen, and the atmosphere in which the girl had perforce to live was deadly. That she was no worse than fickle, flighty, and foolish, should stand to her credit.

"Amongst Mary Eastman's many admirers were two who had some reason to suppose themselves particular favourites. They were Captain Sterling and Lieutenant Rodgers. Both were a cut above the best of the bunch which usually gathered round the lady's saddle. Sterling was a poor man with no expectations; Rodgers had a competency and fair prospects. Neither properly came under the description 'adventurers,' and each had a family reputation which rested with him to maintain.

"The men were open rivals for the lady's hand, but it would have been hard to say which had the better chance. The scales were held so evenly between them. Fond of fun, fond of flirting, fond of having her slaves at her feet, Mary played them off against each other, probably without intending any harm, and thinking only how jolly it was.

A very good account he gave of them.

"Then came the rising at Meerut, the massacre at Delhi, the murders in Lucknow itself; and life suddenly assumed a more serious aspect, while all the joy and gaiety went out.

"After the first relief, under Havelock, Mary Eastman, who had found refuge with a friendly native in a house in the narrow streets at the back of the Kaisarbagh, seemed to have made up her mind that if ever she got out, Roy Sterling and no other should be the man of her choice.

"When Captain Sterling, wearied with the fatigue of four days' fighting, threw himself on his string bed on the night of the 15th March, 1858, to snatch a few hours slumber, it was the happiest moment he was to know in life.

"He had been personally thanked by the Commander-in-Chief, and had learnt that Mary Eastman was safe and well in the heart of the city. From the hand of a native who had inquired for Sterling sahib, up and down the camp, he had received a message from Mary herself. She was anxious, she said, to be assured of his safety. She was well, had adopted the dress of a woman of the people, and would come into the English lines as soon as it was safe to venture into the streets.

"Two days later an English lady in native costume came into Grant's camp on the Sitapur road, and inquired for Captain Sterling, giving her name as Mary Eastman. Roy, who was with Outram's division, did not see her.

"On the same day, Sterling received through the hands of the friendly native who had brought him the first message, a packet containing ten 100 rupee notes, together with a few lines signed 'M. E.'

"The writer begged he would accept the notes as a contribution to the commissariat, or hospital funds; 'or make use of them in any way you think fit. If you love me, Roy, you will find a pleasure in expending them for me.'

"Lieutenant Rodgers had looked in on Sterling at breakfast, with a bundle of I. O. U's—innocent looking bits of paper representing fifty pounds—money lost at cards, and pony matches, for sport, and love, and war, went on merrily side by side.

"'If Sterling could make it convenient to pay, the Lieutenant would be eternally obliged.'

"He was being 'pressed' by Captain 'Fourspots'; and Sterling, who had his own reasons for disliking 'Fourspots'—there had been a serious quarrel between the two twelve months before, over a disputed bet, and the Colonel had recommended 'Fourspots' to exchange. The chances of war, however, had brought the men together again. Sterling had promised to let Rodgers have the 'ready' after mess. He hadn't a notion when he made the promise, where the money was to come from, but he knew that 'Fourspots' would willingly sacrifice a few gold mohurs to secure a handful of his I.O.U's.

"When he opened Mary Eastman's letter and saw the ten 100 rupee notes—the rupee was then worth two shillings—Sterling's first feeling was one of relief. He had an uncomfortable notion that 'Fourspots' was seeking to possess himself of the I.O.U.'s held by Rodgers. Any qualms he might have felt about using the notes to discharge his gambling liabilities, vanished when he thought of his 'paper' in the hands of 'Fourspots,' and the use the man would probably make of it. Mary, herself, he felt sure, would think no worse of him. Her standard, perhaps, was not very high; but, having the wherewithal to put himself beyond the reach of his enemy, she would certainly consider him a Quixote to allow any silly scruples of honour to prevent him.

"Half the money would suffice to set him on his legs again, and in future he would take his Major's advice, and give no I. O. U's.

"'Put the cash on the table, my boy, at the beginning, and when the money's done, stop playing.'

"That was the Major's advice to the 'subs.,' and it was common sense.

"When he saw Mary he would tell her what he had done, and had no doubt what her answer would be.

"He took five of the notes, folded them, put them in his waistcoat pocket, and, passing them across the mess table to Rodgers, received back his I.O.U's in exchange.

* * * * *

"Eighteen-fifty-eight was drawing to a close, the back of the Mutiny had been broken, and the country was gradually becoming tranquilised. Captain Sterling, however, had heard no more of his promised 'step,' or of the V.C. for which he was to be recommended.

"Mary Eastman, he had heard, was staying with friends in Calcutta, but a letter which he had addressed to her had failed to bring a reply. The various columns and detachments were continually on the move, and the army post-office arrangements were very imperfect. There was nothing for him to do but—wait. Waiting has always played a large part in affairs Indian.

"At this time ugly rumours were flying round. An inquiry had been ordered by the Chief Commissioner for Oudh into alleged dealing in rupee notes by civil and military officials.

"Numbers of wealthy natives, who had taken no part in the Mutiny, had complained that rupee notes to very large amounts had been obtained from them by Englishmen for sums in cash that were insignificant beyond imagining.

"Notes for 1,000 rupees had been parted with for less than 50 in silver. The English buyers had spread it about that all 'paper' found in the hands of natives be would repudiated.

"Robbery was even alleged on a pretty extensive scale, as the Englishmen would buy 'paper' of any low caste native, who for a few annas would sell notes of the value of 100 rupees.

"Johannes, the Portuguese merchant, was reported to have identified many of the notes, which had passed through his hands more than once. The old dog took pay from both sides indifferently, and lined his pockets thickly. He professed to recognise every one of the notes which has been inclosed to Sterling. He had paid them away to certain traders for goods received, and these men now swore they were stolen from them to sell to English buyers.

"Captain Sterling, when asked to say how the notes came into his possession, declined. His motives were prompted by chivalry, but his refusal laid him open to suspicion. Not for one moment did he dream that Mary herself had obtained the notes by knavish duplicity; but he was not sure about Eastman. It was just the sort of thing that George Eastman might be likely to do. He had no particular reason for shielding

Eastman, who had returned to Lucknow to look after his property there; neither do I think the personal side—the acceptance of the girl's money—weighed with him a featherweight. But her name was dear to him, and at any risk he would keep it out of a discreditable business.

"Life in India, however, is lived with doors and windows wide open. Privacy is practically unknown. Captain 'Fourspots' and another—besides any number of black faces—had seen a native hand a packet to Captain Sterling on a certain day; the native, indeed, was produced, and told an artless tale about a native woman, which didn't help the Captain. On the evening of that day Sterling, who had acknowledged he was 'short,' had discharged certain debts with rupee paper—being the said notes.

"Captain 'Fourspots' himself had received five, through Lieutenant Rodgers.

"Well, as Roy refused to open his mouth for Mary's sake, there was a strong circumstantial case made out against him.

"The thing dragged on for months, and eventually four men were declared guilty of illegal dealing in rupee notes, one of them being Roy Sterling.

"Many a good man said many a good word for Roy, but from Mary Eastman he heard nothing.

"The authorities were divided over the case of Captain Sterling, but early in '59 orders came from Calcutta, and Sterling was officially informed that the Government of India had no further use for his services, and was instructed to report himself in London by a date mentioned.

"At Bombay, some senseless idiot told him that Captain 'Fourspots' and Mary Eastman were to be married in March.

"I saw him for a few hours before he sailed, and was impressed that I should never see Roy Sterling again.

"One night, when the ship was in the Red Sea, there was a splash heard in the water. Next morning Captain Sterling was missing.

"Poor Roy had 'gone over.'

* * * * *

"The mystery was never properly cleared up. Years after, the native who brought the notes to Sterling, confessed that he had received the packet from 'Fourspots,' who had also instructed him how to act; and later, had coached him and others, for examination before the Commissioner's Court.

"The communication which Sterling received from Mary after the storming of the Kaisarbagh, I think was genuine. The letter which accompanied the notes, I take to have been a forgery.

"'Fourspots' had known the Eastmans for some bit. George Eastman was just the sort of man to attract 'Fourspots'; and likely enough the Captain had sundry specimens of Mary's handwriting in his possession; while forgery is a fine art in India.

"Probably the white rascal had seen the black deliver the first message, and knowing the Indian character had determined to use him as a tool.

"What yarn the beggar pitched to the girl you may guess. She, of course, would put Sterling down as guilty. The 'crime' itself wouldn't shock her, but the consequences of being 'found out' would.

"Rodgers always said that he believed 'Fourspots' was responsible for Sterling's ruin.

"A braver gentleman, a better officer, India never saw, but the end was shame and disgrace, through mistaken loyalty to a woman who was unworthy."

THE FOUR ARROWS.

A LEGEND OF OLD SYRACUSE.

THE jealous rage of Simetha, the sorceress, is the most powerful poem of antiquity; Simetha, who was betrayed by the Myndian Delphis and could not, by her charms, lure him back to her, had by this been made an implacable enemy of mankind and a blasphemer of love.

She had pursued for ages the impious works of witchcraft, and kept the island entirely under the spell of her sorceries. She was formidable to travellers belated on the shores, and was without mercy to the shepherds who guarded their flocks on the hilltops that were redolent with thyme.

In a cave whose murky depths were relieved only by the dull gleam of mother-of-pearl, whose entrance was almost obscured by the intertwining of briar bushes and the prickly thorn, and was only opened by the magic of a charm, dwelt the sorceress. On all sides of this uncanny cave were hung skeletons of symbolic beasts, and baleful herbs were drying in grinning skulls. There, when the shadows lengthened like the trail of serpents, and the moon was at its full, she brewed her magic poisons.

At her harsh cry, when the shore was dark, all the wicked spirits awoke, and there was a whirring of wings through the air, a crunching on the sands, and a furious crackling among the branches. Then they crept and crouched about the fatal door, awaiting the commands of the sorceress.

Simetha then became like an ancient sybil, her hair bristling like a flight of silver arrows, her face wrinkled and her sunken eyes glowing like embers. Her long teeth knocked together at each hissing breath, and above her shaggy eyebrows played phosphorescent lights.

In her three favourite beasts were imprisoned the evil spirits of the air, the earth and the water. These surrounded her, all impatient for the word of command that should let them loose.

The vulture, with his blood-stained beak, spreads his gigantic wings to sail through the air and cast a blight upon the harvest and a shadow upon joy everywhere.

The wolf bounds forth with open jaws to prey upon the bleating lambs across the plain.

The dolphin, with quivering fins, waits for the signal to plunge into the foaming sea and wreck some boat upon its tranquil course, when he appears upon the surface and sends forth from his nostrils spouts of water in his triumphant joy, beating the waves with his sinuous tail.

And these things happened, for they were transcribed from an old book of undeniable authority, a short time before the beginning of the era of mercy in which we live. The original manuscript having been destroyed at the burning of the library of Alexandria, a literal history cannot be given, only a rude sketch of this strange story.

Simetha was not alone with her evil spirits in her mysterious cave, where the penetrating incense of philters mingled with the rank odours of the mummies of animals and the savage breathing of her three companions, the vulture, the dolphin and the wolf.

Before the despised love for the Myndian Delphis had crazed her, widow as she was of one of the most honourable citizens of Syracuse, she had had two daughters, in whom her power had preserved their youth, at the same time maintaining the equal distance of age between them.

The elder, Thestylis, was the living portrait of her mother when in the full bloom of her once vaunted beauty. Thestylis was tall, and with the wealth of her luxuriant dark hair and the wonderful radiance of her beautiful eyes, was the living image in her marble whiteness of the Venus Victrix, made for the adoration of the helpless.

She had inherited in every way the diabolical nature of her mother, and Simetha had no more bitter and wicked counsellor than this superb creature, who smiled at suffering and danced to the unhappy wail of her victims.

Her hair floating like a fury's, she seemed to spread a darkness round her, and when from the promontory she gazed upon some shipwreck, or looking inland beheld the devastation of a burning field, the wreck of the harvester's toil, her flapping draperies seemed to cast a sinister shadow against the sky.

Unlike her (if anyone was ever like her) was the second daughter, Lilia, whom neither her mother nor her sister could draw into the orbit of their evil doings; as sweet in the virginal flower of her charms as they were inexorable in the fatal evolution of their destiny; made of the brightness discarded from the shadows of their souls, and of all the gentleness shut out from their being. She was a flower of purity in this garden of evil.

More slender than her sister, she was in the purity of her race the incarnation of all that was lovely and feminine, and inspired the sympathy of the good and the wise, for she was like a dream of perfect loveliness, upon whom the poisoned arrows of perversity could make no impression. And in reality she was a thousand times better even than she appeared to be, as her soul was more perfect than its radiant setting.

Even as a child she obstinately persisted in trying to rescue the victims that had fallen under the enchantments of her mother and sister, and often in the night when the sorceress had unchained the fierce wolf, Lilia might be seen, by the light of the stars, hastening toward the distant pasture to warn the shepherd, who, wrapped in his dark mantle, slept peacefully on, unconscious of his danger, with his sheep gathered round him. Or, standing on the edge of a cliff, she would signal to the venturesome sailor who was approaching the rock-bound coast, at the moment that the dolphin disappeared beneath the blue wave. And again she would go toward the mountain which lovers were ascending hand in hand, to put them on their guard before the devouring vulture had spread his great wings to descend like a thunderbolt on their heads.

Thus robbed of their prey, the rages of Simetha and Thestylis knew no bounds. Therefore, to prevent her interference in their machinations, when the hour for their dark deeds arrived, Lilia was imprisoned in the gloomiest corner of the cave, bound hand and foot with hempen cords, and in this prison, in her rustic chains, the child slept the sweet sleep of innocence, and wore upon her lips the smile of sweet dreams.

But when the sun was high, she was free; free to follow the flight of the butterfly, and listen to the songs of the birds.

Wandering through the meadows in her garments of white, she often stopped to listen to the rippling of the brook, which was as clear and pure as her own soul.

It was nearing the break of day.

It was the sweet and mysterious hour which frightens away the shadows of the night, and when the petals of the convolvulus tremble before opening.

Simetha and Thestylis had not yet finished their fiendish work; on the contrary, they were making haste to accomplish their dark deeds with feverish fingers, feeling that the hour for enchantments was slipping away.

Lilia was still imprisoned and was lying on her couch, pale and beautiful, with her hair loose and flowing, blending softly with the warm flesh tints of her arms, and contrasting with the harsh colouring of the hempen cords which bound her.

As the sorceress was watching for the first approach of the dawn, a flame of light in the eastern sky made them cry out with rage. But there were no rays from this light, as of the morning sun, and as the light drew nearer they saw it was a boat of gold, which was quickly ploughing the waves and making for the shore.

Simetha and Thestylis howled with a savage joy, like the osprey hovering above its prey. The boat was not empty, nor was it drifting, for a man stood at the helm and directed its course.

Soon they realised that it was from the brow of this mysterious sailor that the light came which illuminated the golden bark.

Suddenly, at a sign from Simetha, the monstrous and impatient dolphin, spurred on by the eager Thestylis, plunged into the blue sea, only a foamy crest indicating its track. Its approach to the boat was shown by a deep ruffling of the waters, which surged and swelled round it, while the vulture, let loose at the same time, darkened the sky with its great wings.

Soon a gigantic wave lifted the fragile craft, and, half opening, clasped it in its immense unfurlings. Then the dolphin appeared upon the surface, to gloat triumphantly over his evil doing.

But the wonderful sailor seemed to fear nothing. Standing at the stern, he drew from an invisible quiver an arrow of flame and pierced the monster between the eyes. With convulsive quiverings, it sank beneath the water, leaving a trail of blood upon the surface. Suddenly the sea became smooth and caressing, and hardly moved the boat which a moment before it had been ready to destroy, and the vulture, who thought that the fiendish work had been accomplished, with a flap of its wings returned to the earth.

The sky at once resumed its usual calm and suddenly were the colours of the rosy dawn mingled with the copper tints of the east.

When, with swelling sail, the boat approached, Simetha and Thestylis were filled with astonishment at the sight of the audacious stranger, who only smiled as he neared the shore.

He was young, with golden hair; his face was without beard, and he had a strange light in his eyes. He was clad in a robe of lily whiteness, the folds of which looked like the unrolling of petals.

Feeling that they were confronted by a superior being endowed like themselves with a mysterious power, Simetha resolved to meet him with stratagem. She composed her deceitful face, and from the lips of Thestylis came a sweet, weird song, like that of a syren, as they approached the stranger quickly to bid him a treacherous welcome.

The morning was already advanced, and the last stars were melting in the cerulean depths like the points of arrows burying themselves in newly-made wounds. Emerald tints blended with the purple of horizon and were lost in an azure mist.

The hour of enchantments was over, and the powers of darkness had passed. They must now wait for the coming of the night to attack the daring one.

And as the stranger alighted from his boat and made it fast to the shore, his tread upon the sand made it scintillate with light like falling stars.

Simetha received him with silent grace, for probably he spoke a language unknown to her, or he thought it useless to speak, as no word had as yet passed his lips, which still wore the same enigmatical smile that seemed to mirror his thoughts.

In the meantime a strange thing had happened. Thestylis, who, for a moment, had left her mother's side, returned transformed. She was not the same Thestylis; with coquetry she had bound her wealth of hair high upon her head and placed thereon a beautiful blood-red rose, and her sombre drapery had been artistically caught up on her shoulder and high on her hip, artfully disclosing the lines of her perfect form and the whiteness of her shoulder, as if the desire to please had for once overcome the desire to harm.

And Simetha admired her for the ruse she had employed to detain the stranger on the island until night, if not by the sentiment of love, at least by the sentiment of admiration.

But Simetha was deceived. Thestylis was sincere. She had obeyed a true feeling, and one new to her. Her soul more than her body was changed. Into her heart, withered by hatred, the smile of the stranger had entered, like a sea troubled and calm at the same time.

She already loved him of the long white robe, and struggled not against the sweet power of love which had thus suddenly been revealed to her. She longed to save him now, and for him would give up her life.

When Simetha withdrew to allow Thestylis to exercise her wiles upon the stranger, she, with an impassioned voice, broken by sobs, told him of the dangers that surrounded him, at the same time imploring him to stay. A woman's sacrifice is never complete.

He listened to her recital without showing any emotion, and it was certainly not from fear that he followed at her bidding, and it was not because he had misunderstood her warning, for only his serene smile and wonderful eyes answered her words.

Following a road which led to the cave, they entered, thus avoiding Simetha, who meditated his destruction, thinking that in this Thestylis was aiding her.

The stranger must be hidden until evening, thought Thestylis, who, taking him by the hand, led him through paths under the rocks known only to herself; but he had seen, through an opening in the granite rock, the sweet form of the sleeping Lilia, in her rude prison, which was closed imperfectly by brushwood from the light of day. Simetha and Thestylis had not awakened her at the accustomed hour, fearing that she might try to save the stranger.

As soon as Thestylis had brought him to a place of safety, she told him to await her there, while she should go in search of fruit and wine. It was necessary to divert Simetha's attention, so Thestylis departed, turning many times, with a graceful movement of her supple neck, like the stem of a flower, to look back at him.

No sooner had she disappeared, than the stranger retraced his steps until he arrived at the door of the cell where Lilia slept. He tore aside the network of brambles, and, kneeling beside the young girl, he contemplated her in her innocent sleep. The sweet rhythm of her breathing seemed like the music of the oar upon the waters that bears one to the land of dreams.

With tears coursing down his beautiful face, he long and earnestly gazed upon this lovely image; then, with only the breath of a kiss, he awakened her.

A great joy shone in the eyes of Lilia. It was as if she had only changed her chains, to enter into the depths of an unknown gulf, a palace of peace.

Enveloped by a mysterious power, she obeyed the smile of the ever-mute stranger, and when he showed her by a gesture—a gesture full of tenderness and authority—the road that she must take along the shore, and then beyond the sea, she felt her yielding footsteps bearing her onward, and she closed her eyes that she might retain this sweet dream, far sweeter than any before.

She lost consciousness, and when her eyelids opened again her bright eyes looked like an icy brook which had been melted by the spring. She found herself in the fields, he who accompanied her walking by her side and taking her in his arms when obstacle barred the way. Thus the day passed, Lilia not knowing where her footsteps led her.

When the night came they saw a great fire blazing on the shore. It had been built by Simetha and Thestylis, who, in their fury, were trying to burn the boat, the one from rage and disappointment, and the other from a broken-hearted jealousy, and the mountains echoed with their angry clamour.

But the boat was of gold and could at most only become a molten mass, to spread its purple and yellow veins in every direction.

Simetha and Thestylis, certain that the fugitives had not been able to reach the shore, let loose the wolf, who, bounding over the plains with open jaws, caused a panic among the flocks. But this time the flesh of the stupid sheep was not what he wanted, nor did he even turn to look at the frightened shepherds, who, cowering, seemed like swallows flying low before the storm. The prey he sought was the two white figures clinging together at the noise of his approach.

The wolf saw at once his double prey, and with eyes glowing like balls of fire, crouched for the final spring.

Then the stranger quickly sent from his invisible quiver a second arrow of flame, which stretched the monster dead upon the plain. And it seemed as if in the death of the creature a great joy had fallen upon the earth.

The wandering sheep halted to bask in the warm moonlight, which, coming through a rift in the clouds, seemed to cast long white rays which crossed in their path a flight of moths, whose wings glistened as if of powdered silver. The shepherds, leaning upon their staffs, bowed their heads in thanksgiving. Then they all went forward to greet their liberator, to kiss his hands, and the white robe of Lilia, who, like a broken reed, leant upon her companion.

But the stranger, still pointing onward, bade farewell to the shepherds, and, with a signal that they should not follow him, he and Lilia began to ascend the hill.

Beneath them stretched the blue sea in its grandeur. The cool grass refreshed their burning feet with the evening dew, and over the fields came the faint aroma of wild flowers. By the light of the stars they beheld in the distance sleeping Syracuse, and upon the air came the hum of its night sounds, like the murmuring of the ebbing tide.

Lilia clung to her companion in the innocent outburst of her gratitude, and his answering smile brought peace to her soul, and his eyes seemed brighter to her than the brightest stars.

Suddenly a whirring noise was heard overhead, and at the same time the shadow of the vulture fell at their feet in the pale moonlight.

Sent by Simetha and Thestylis, it flew like a rocket through the air, uttering its hoarse cries.

On the horizon were gathered together clouds in nebulous groups, and the moon was slowly descending from its zenith, when again the stranger drew from his invisible quiver a third arrow of flame, which, darting through the air, struck the ill-omened bird. Wounded, it fluttered downward, flapping its wings against the rocks, and then, with a few convulsive quiverings, remained motionless for ever.

And as a silver-lined cloud, loosened from the mass, floated towards them, the stranger, with the dreaming Lilia in his arms, mounted it, as if it were a horse bent to his will.

The cloud, with its burden, floated on and on through space, higher than the mountain-tops and beyond the luminous spaces of the Milky Way.

It was at that hour when the constellations were blazing in their splendours, that the stranger, still clasping his precious burden, craved admittance of the stars that guarded the portals of heaven, to keep out from those blest abodes the evil-doer upon earth. But not one was opened to him; they all pleaded the inflexible command of the Creator, and the eternal law of the universe.

On they went, far beyond the vapoury clouds, and even beyond the stars, until the skies seemed like a glorious and gigantic gem of lapis lazuli, against which their flight would be broken.

Then the archangel Azrael, for it was he, drew from his invisible quiver the fourth and last arrow of flame, and shot it into this inflexible azure, which opened in a golden wound a path through which they entered.

Then throughout all Heaven the shout arose "Azrael! Azrael!" and the triumphant hymn of seraphim and cherubim re-echoed and re-echoed.

But the wound in the sky was never closed again. Another star appeared in the firmament to astonish the wise men of Chaldea.

By the light of this new star the shepherds whom Lilia loved and with whom she had left a part of her beautiful soul, were shown the mystic road to the manger of the new-born Christ.

In a darkened corner of the island, Simetha and Thestylis, checked in their crime, under the new order of things, still send forth their wails at the rising of the moon; and this is why the sailor dreaded that smiling but treacherous sea that washed the shores of Sicily, cradled the idyls of the sweet poet of Syracuse.

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

TIME 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskdale's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, to Harington's sister, Ethel.

Lord Eskdale has very good reasons to believe that France and Germany are meditating an immediate invasion of England. He, therefore, dispatches Harington to London to warn the Premier, and Rodney to warn the British admiral established in the Mediterranean.

An attempt to land at Worthing is made by a combined French and German fleet of 36 ironclads, 40 troopships, and 100 smaller boats. The local volunteers hold them in check till the regulars arrive from London.

CHAPTER V.

WHAT THE FLEET DID.

AT eight bells in the second dog watch, the look-out on board the Magnificent announced the hour in a stentorian voice, adding with true nautical vigour: "Selsey Light about five knots on the port bow, nor'-east by north. A fine night. All's well," which meant in ordinary English that at eight o'clock p.m. the Channel Squadron and its attendant torpedo-boats were some six miles off the coast in the neighbourhood of Selsey Bill, with a clear sky and smooth sea, and everything in order in the disposition of the fleet.

On board each vessel there was the utmost activity, and, to a landsman, the most hopeless disorder would have seemed to prevail. The ships had been put into fighting-rig hours earlier, but still there remained much to do in the shape of finally testing steam-pumps and hydraulic machinery to see that everything was in working order. Ammunition had to be drawn from the magazines, and placed in proper positions for use, watertight doors in protective bulkheads needed careful examination, appliances for extinguishing fires required overhauling, and, last but not least, the cooks were busy in preparing a solid meal for all hands, as a useful preparation for the labour of the night.

Jack's personal arrangements were soon made. If his occupation kept him below deck he divested himself of blouse, shirt, boots, and socks, belted his trousers tightly round his waist, and chewed a contemplative quid as he set himself to the manifold tasks which still lay between him and supper—for the British tar loves to go into a fight half-naked, as did his progenitor of the days of Trafalgar and the Nile.

Shortly after one bell in the first watch, that is to say, a little after 8.30 p.m., the Admiral signalled half-speed, and and called all captains of ironclads and commanders of smaller vessels on board the flagship. They were soon assembled in the wardroom, as the Admiral's quarters were too small to accommodate so many officers, and were, moreover, being adapted to the requirements of additional hospital space.

Lord Charles Beresford explained that he had brought them together in order that each officer should clearly understand not only his own duties but the general plan of attack, and it would be the duty of commanders individually, through their subordinates, to make the principles of his intentions known to every member of each ship's company.

"I take it, gentlemen," he went on, "that few of us, if any, will survive this affair, as we are hopelessly outnumbered. But it is our glorious privilege to do all that lies in our power to injure the enemy before we lose our lives or our ships.

"I have asked myself how we can best serve our country at this juncture, and it appears to me that we should endeavour to destroy the French and German transports and thus lighten the labour of the army in resisting any attempt at invasion. You all know the disposition of the allied fleets as outlined in the last message signalled from Gosport, and I have no doubt that a similar formation has been preserved in anchorage. Some of the enemy's ironclads and a considerable number of their gunboats will have ranged themselves broadside to the beach to shell the town and defending forces, whilst the attention of the remainder will be keenly directed towards the efforts of the troops to effect a landing.

"There is no moon, and if I mistake not, a fresh breeze from the sea and the clouds coming with it, together with the noise and excitement of the bombardment, will render it comparatively easy for us to approach unobserved, as a sharp look-out to the south is hardly to be expected under the conditions. If they expect a naval attack from any quarter it will be from either east or west.

"That being so, I purpose making a detour and striking in from the southward. Battle-ships will form in two divisions, the Magnificent leading the starboard and the Resolution the port attack. Torpedo-boats will follow in the same formation until the moment of impact with the enemy. It is probable that the enemy's gunboats and torpedo-boats will be present in considerable numbers on the weather-side of the fleet, but it will be the duty of the two divisions of battle-ships to smash right through them, depending upon rams and quick-firing guns only.

"It will be the object of both divisions to intervene between the enemy's battle-ships and his transports, and to screen our torpedo-boats by endeavouring to draw the enemy's fire upon themselves. The torpedo-boats on reaching the fighting-line will incline inwards, the leading pair endeavouring to sink the first two of the enemy's transports. The second pair of torpedo-boats will pass the first, and attack the next transports in the line, and this manœuvre must be repeated by the whole twenty-two boats, each one rigidly directing all efforts towards the single object in view, namely, the destruction of the enemy's land forces and matériel.

"When this task has been accomplished, gentlemen, I leave you to your individual devices to do the utmost amount of damage in your power to the enemy's fleet, and when you find your vessels in danger of sinking, you should endeavour to run them ashore to save the lives of the remnants of your ship's companies. The sole alternative to this course is to go down whilst destroying an opponent."

There was silence for a moment when his lordship finished speaking. Then the commander of the gunboat Speedy said: "I presume, sir, that I take on as many of the enemy's smaller fry as I can gather round me?"

"No Commander Hardinge, I am sorry to say I cannot meet your views in that way," replied the Admiral with a smile. "It will be your business to send round a launch in an hour's time to collect private letters from the fleet—opportunities will meanwhile be given for writing them so far as is practicable—and you will then observe operations from a safe distance, subsequently making off to Portsmouth or Dover, as you may think fit, and reporting to the Admiralty all that has happened."

The officer thus addressed turned scarlet with indignation "Do I understand you, sir," he said passionately, "that the Speedy is to be turned into a post-office, and I and my crew——"

"Commander Hardinge, silence!" said Lord Beresford. "Obey my orders, or, by God, I'll court-martial you in the next world!"

After this explosion the Admiral calmed down a little and explained, in kindlier tones, that the Speedy was doing absolutely necessary, if disagreeable service, as the Admiralty must be placed in possession of the facts, there being no certainty of survivors reaching the shore, or of events being correctly observed from that quarter.

"And now, gentlemen," he concluded, addressing the entire gathering, "I have only to say that all external lights must, under every circumstance, be extinguished, the best efforts being made to preserve correct distances. Fresh orders, if indispensable, will be made by trumpet-call from the flagship and repeated down both lines. It remains for me to insist upon the need of every man in the fleet understanding the plan and object of the attack, and to wish you all good-bye and God-speed."

The officers silently saluted and trooped out of the ward-room. Hardinge observed in a sarcastic undertone to Captain Blake of the Repulse: "This is a jolly fine arrangement for me, isn't it?"

"Well, you see, old chap," began the other sympathetically, but Hardinge growled:

"Oh, yes, I see well enough. Anyhow, he left me to decide what 'a safe distance' means."

By nine o'clock the squadron was steaming at full speed again, and the course was altered a point or two towards the south.

True to the Admiral's anticipation, a stiffish breeze from the Atlantic put a curl on the waves and promised to bring up a choppy sea next tide. Some light cirrus-clouds spread themselves over the sky, dimming the stars, and lending obscurity to the horizon. Confusion had now given place to perfect order on board each ship in the fleet.

By the Admiral's instructions an extra ration of grog was served out all round, and general permission to smoke was given, as he felt that the exceptional circumstances of the case justified this departure from strict naval custom. He would gladly have sanctioned the use of the ship's bands, too, were it not for the fear of being detected, and as a matter of fact, the French torpedo-catcher, Belle Etoile, did unknowingly pass the squadron about half-past ten o'clock at some two miles distance, being then on her way to Brest to announce in grandiloquent terms the occupation of Worthing by the allies, as General de Rosny thought the attack was practically over when the Frenchmen had once gained the pier!

The mere fact that they had been promptly swept off it only served to assure him that in the more determined effort being made whilst he wrote his dispatch they would be successful. Besides, the Paris morning papers must be able to state that perfidious Albion was in the grasp of the combined forces.

On through the night steamed the silent and ghost-like fleet, noiseless, save for the throbbing of the screws, which was hardly discernible in the soughing wind, weirdly indistinct in the unrelieved gloom, seeming like some procession of terrible and gigantic spirits of the deep passing swiftly over the waters to avenge the wrong being done to the Queen of the Seas.

At last the course was abruptly altered by a wheel to the north, and half an hour later the look-out in the foretop of the Magnificent reported the flashes of gun-fire and the steadier glare of burning houses right ahead.

The nervous tension throughout the fleet now became almost unendurable.

"Bust me if I can stand this 'ere waiting," said No 1 of the forward barbette 12in. 46-ton gun confidentially to his butty, No 3, and he hummed: "Oh, would I were a bird, that I might fly to thee."

"You'll be there soon enough, Jim," said the other. "I wonder which way we'll go, up, or down, or in pieces?"

"Stop that talking there, or I'll report you after the action," said a warrant officer sternly.

"Who to, Nosey?" said a voice. "To Old Nick?"

At this sally there was a general snigger, in which the lieutenant in charge of the barbette joined.

Men were thrown into the water by tens of thousands.

Every man in the fleet knew that he was going to practically certain death, but that was of slight import—delay alone was irksome.

The progress of the events on shore was now easily distinguishable, and Lord Beresford's face became brighter than it had been for some time when he found that the enemy had not yet effected a lodgment. The allied fleet was plainly silhouetted against the glaring background of light, and the Admiral, who knew every ship in the French navy by sight, said to the captain of the Magnificent: "We are in luck, Drysdale. The farthest vessel in the enemy's starboard line is La Gloire, the French flagship. She is just about our fighting weight, and we must endeavour to reach her, if possible."

Astonishing as it may seem, the foremost ships of the British fleet had crashed through the outer fringe of gunboats, sinking four of them outright and crippling several others, before their presence was observed by the enemy's battle-ships. The majority of these were swinging to their cables at the moment of attack, and were consequently in the worst possible position for using their guns, and no sooner had the English ships entered their opponents' lines than they commenced firing with tremendous energy and precision.

In less than two minutes every ship was hotly engaged, and the fight became the fiercest ever known in the history of naval warfare. Never before had such vessels or projectiles been used under such conditions. The noise of the battle was plainly heard at Chichester, Arundel, Horsham, and other towns even more remote from the scene of action.

This surprise was complete. This gave the attacking fleet a very considerable advantage, so they succeeded in cutting off the transports from the ironclads before the latter could make any effort to get under way.

It was only when the British torpedo-boats commenced their career of destruction among the crowded troopships and liners that the allied fleets perceived the frightful predicament in which they were placed, and how their fire was being drawn by the battle-ships to permit complete destruction of the invading force. Throwing every other consideration to the winds, they then endeavoured, by closing in and concentrating their fire, to sink the torpedo boats by sheer weight of metal. But it was too late. Even where they succeeded in their object they as often as not had done quite as fatal damage to one of their own unarmoured vessels by misdirected shots, as a Messageries Maritimes or North German Lloyd steamer sank like a cracked teapot when struck between wind and water by a shell from a 10in. or 12in. gun.

Although the British torpedo boats were literally swept with showers of lead from the troops on board each transport, they grimly persisted in their work of death. Ship after ship was blown up and sunk, the terrible crash of the torpedo attack passing into the roar of a second explosion as the water reached the furnaces. It was a fearful scene of death and disaster. Men were thrown into the water by tens of thousands, only to be engulfed in the maelstrom caused by some sinking ship, to be smothered by the ever-rising waves, or to be crushed into mangled atoms by the swift torpedo-catchers and gunboats darting in from all quarters to the rescue.

Incredible as it may seem, not a transport or cargo-ship was left in the allied fleet. In those few minutes of wholesale holocaust and carnage, 120,000 Frenchmen and Germans, with a fabulous quantity of cannon and munitions of war, had been swept away into the deep waters of the English Channel.

Lord Charles Beresford, perceiving that his apppointed task had been accomplished with a success beyond his wildest hopes, now devoted himself to the comparatively simple task of selling the lives of himself and his men as dearly as might be. Rapidly changing his tactics, he rammed a second-class French cruiser which was crossing his bows, and split her in twain as though she were a rotten stick. This left the path open towards La Gloire.

Imitating his example the other ironclads entered into a general action all round. Numbers and weight of metal of course now began to tell, and in fifteen minutes all that was left of the British Fleet was one battle-ship stranded on Worthing beach, and the dispatch vessel Speedy, which was hurrying off to Portsmouth with her bows smashed in, with a bullet through the fleshy part of her commander's left forearm, and a broad grin on the face of that worthy officer, who seemed to have completely recovered his good temper.

But the British Fleet had gone down in good company. The eight ships of war were accompanied by seventeen of their enemies, whilst the twenty-two torpedo boats had accounted for all of the allies' transports and thirty-one of their own size. And the shattered remnant of this new Armada made off from this unequal contest, steaming slowly through the night to Brest and Bremerhaven, with rage and shame in their hearts, and sore wounds in the bodies of both ships and men.

In a word, the destruction of the British Fleet had entailed the most terrible and crushing disaster that the enemy could have encountered.

Meanwhile, how came the Speedy and her commander to stand in such urgent need of repairs?

When Beresford ranged up alongside La Gloire he contrived to give that redoubtable battle-ship such a warm salute that she rapidly presented almost as damaged an appearance as did the Magnificent, notwithstanding the previous experiences of the latter vessel. An artillery duel at pistol-shot distance between two such monsters must mean the utter annihilation of one or the other in a very few minutes, and, to make sure of the result the German flagship Fürst Bismarck proceeded to cross the bows of the Magnificent, pouring in her broadside as she did so. As a last expiring effort the Magnificent, whose engines were intact although she was perceptibly in a sinking condition, rammed the Fürst Bismarck with such hearty goodwill that the lesser German vessel forthwith heeled over and sank. The Magnificent quivered and staggered from the effects of the blow, and for a little while her steam-steering gear was thrown out of order.

The incident was taken advantage of by La Gloire. She started upon a sixteen points curve which must have brought her steel-shafted nose into the quarter of the British ship, but now the diminutive but irrepressible Speedy appeared upon the scene.

When subsequently threatened with a court-martial for disobeying orders, Commander Hardinge explained to Lord Charles Beresford that owing to the smoke and confusion it was impossible for him to learn what had happened unless he ventured right into the midst of the combatants, and at that identical moment, seeing the predicament of the Admiral's ship, he felt bound to interfere, so long as he ran no great risk himself. At which the Admiral laughed contentedly, for he had, on the previous day, recommended Hardinge for the command of a new cruiser fitting out at Milford Haven.

But to resume. Hardinge realised the desperate plight of the Magnificent, and was for a second half-mad with his own comparative helplessness. Suddenly an inspiration seized him, and he ran his little vessel at full speed ahead, into the stern of the French ship. By this trick, the object of which was not perceived until it had been accomplished, he smashed both the rudder and the propeller-blades of the ironclad, which drifted away powerless on the tide, to cross the path of the sinking torpedo-boat Alert, and to be blown up by the last Whitehead torpedo discharged from its tubes. In fact the tiny assailant was the first to go down.

Lord Beresford saw the whole incident, and was commenting on it to Captain Drysdale when a splinter from a random shell knocked him senseless. The commander of the Magnificent then turned the vessel's head to the shore, where he succeeded in beaching her at low water mark. She was drawing five feet more than her wonted depth of water, and must have sunk in another couple of minutes after the time she ran ashore.

A few officers and men from other ships managed to save their lives by swimming to deserted or overturned boats, and some were picked up clinging to wreckage hours afterwards by search parties of fishermen, who proceeded from Worthing to the scene of battle.

The incoming tide cast up a ghastly legacy of the fight in the shape of hundreds, if not thousands, of corpses. It was in this guise, and in no other, that the army corps of France and Germany effected a landing upon British soil.

CHAPTER VI.

The Prince and the People.

England was in a wild ferment of joy on the following day. From all parts of the kingdom came accounts of special thanksgiving services in the churches and chapels, and of hastily convened meetings of Corporations, to give representative assurances to Her Majesty the Queen, and to the Government, of enthusiastic loyalty, and ungrudging support, no matter what might be the trials in store for the nation.

An hour before Mr. Balfour had made his great speech in the House of Commons, the Adjutant-General had issued telegraphic orders for the calling out of the first-class army reserve, and the mobilisation of the Militia and Volunteers. Regimental districts had been hard at work all night in making the necessary preparations, and the consequence was that when every man in the United Kingdom learnt in the daily papers of the dispersal of the allied fleet, he also became aware that his services were needed if he had ever borne arms.

Digitized by Google

The result was most gratifying to the authorities.

From every military centre came intelligence of men flocking to headquarters before the official notice demanding their presence had reached them, and in one instance, that of the 29th Regimental District, at Richmond, in Yorkshire, no less than eighty per cent. of the Army Reserve had rejoined the colours before Thursday evening. It may be remarked, in passing, that when the roll was called a few days later, prior to drafting off the troops to their regiments, it was found that in this locality, which was typical of most other places, the magnificent total of ninety-seven per cent, of effectives had been reached.

At Manchester and Birmingham the volunteer battalions set a splendid example to their comrades elsewhere by unanimously deciding to place themselves at the disposal of the Government for service abroad, whilst in Ireland, where there are no volunteers, some amazement was created at Dublin Castle by an offer from the Mill Street district of Cork to supply a complete regiment of armed patriots. Scotland rose to a man, and the Welsh miners promised to supply the fleet with enough coal for a year, and then take their places in the ranks.

The Press in London and the provinces not only inspirited the people by magnificent reports of the attack on Worthing and the way in which the British Fleet had maintained its unsullied reputation, but strengthened their courage and resolution by the calm dignity with which the atrocious action of two apparently friendly Powers was discussed.

"Never," said the TIMES, "has England been face to face with such terrible odds; never has she looked with more prophetic serenity to the golden era of renewed peace and prosperity when the battle-clouds shall have passed away. Our most venerable statesman has told us that it is our duty to 'earn anew the gratitude of the world,' and we would fain believe that the unfortunate peoples of France and Germany will not stand aloof from testimony in this regard when the demons of greed and vain glory shall have ceased to blind their eyes to the horror and misery into which they have temporarily plunged a large portion of humanity."

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH meant well in writing a glowing eulogium of the Worthing Volunteers, but in dealing with the disparity of numbers between the allied troops and the Major's stalwart band of riflemen, happened to quote Byron.

> Of the three hundred give but three
> To make a new Thermopylae, with the inevitable result that Major Perkins was christened Leonidas for the rest of his life. And he rather liked it.

Of course the PALL MALL GAZETTE also broke into rhyme, of broader vein, heading its leading article thus:

> Thrice is he armed who hath his quarrel just,
> But four times he who gets his blow in fust.

But it was reserved for Mr. T. P. O'Connor in M. A. P. to give a graphic personal touch to the crisis by thus describing the scene in the House of Commons:

"Men gazed at Mr. Balfour through a mist of horror—a mist of blood I had almost written—and so it seemed to me at that supreme moment in the history of the mother of parliaments. Pallid, dumb, stricken though we were—physically and intellectually palsied with the fearfulness of the announcement—yet were the Irish members keen to notice the rancorous venom with which Mr. Chamberlain plunged, aspen-like, into the debate. When the rough nobility of my friend, Dr. Tanner, showed itself in its shirt sleeves to an astounded House—to be cheered with a frenzy that not even the bitterest partisanship had hitherto evoked—I looked at the Colonial Minister to note how the fierce tumult of the scene affected that sphinx-like and malignant nature. He was to the careless glance outwardly unmoved—frigid, keenly observant, utterly passionless—but to me, versed as I am in every mood, in each hidden emotion of this enemy to the Home Rule cause, there was clear and convincing proof of the tornado that raged within.

The Prince moved forward in front of the brilliant staff.

His eye-glass dangled on his breast, and his orchid had fallen unnoticed to the floor!"

Lord Wolseley, who at 2 a.m. had lain down on a couch in his room at the Horse Guards, rose at 5.30, and by seven o'clock had made all arrangements for a grand review of regulars and volunteers in Hyde Park.

The parade was fixed for two o'clock, and the early editions of the evening papers announced that T.R.H. the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke of Connaught, the Duke and Duchess of York, and other members of the Royal Family would attend in State.

The Commander-in-Chief knew exactly what he was about in ordering this seemingly unnecessary pageant. No man in England better realised the tremendous extent of the struggle upon which the country must now embark for self-preservation. It was above all things needful that the spirits of the people should be buoyed up by every resource, and a fine military display, in all the pomp and circumstance of glorious war, was a prompt and fitting sequel to the thrilling news flying hourly across the length and breadth of the land.

Londoners of all ranks crowded into the Park.

Great ladies were there in their carriages, representatives of every class and section of society came to gather inspiration and hopefulness from the spectacle. Not that there were many troops present. A selection rather than an absolute assembly of the forces at the time within hail of the Metropolis had been made by the Commander-in-Chief. The Blues, the 1st and 2nd Life Guards, two battalions of the Coldstream Guards, four squadrons of the Scots Greys, the complete regiments of the 17th Lancers, the 8th Hussars, and the King's Royal Dragoons, two batteries of Horse Artillery, and about eighteen guns of the Field Artillery, together with some twelve thousand Infantry, both regulars and volunteers, made up the parade.

The sun, shining down upon this brilliant assemblage of bright-coloured uniforms, with steel cuirass and glittering accoutrements sparkling in its rays, almost robbed the gathering of its fierce significance.

Public enthusiasm, too, knew no limits. As regiment after regiment filed on to the parade ground, cheers were raised for them, and although some of the battalions were better known to the crowd than others, there was no discrimination in the heartiness of the applause accorded to each.

When well-known officers began to arrive there were further manifestations of cordiality from the thousands of onlookers.

The advent of the Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by their daughters, the Duke and Duchess of York, the Duke of Connaught, and a brilliant suite, caused such an outburst of popular enthusiasm that the progress of the Royal party through the Park to the saluting point was purposely made slow.

Even then it seemed as if the people were unable to give complete utterance to the tumultuous feelings of loyalty and national pride which actuated them. It was rapidly noticed that the Princess of Wales and the other Royal and distinguished ladies in the party were simply attired in English, Scotch and Irish products of the loom and mill. Not a single inch of foreign ribbon or lace was visible on their garments, and the people quickly saw that if example could achieve it, Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, with her ever-ready tact and accustomed good judgment, had given the initiative to a movement on the part of the women of England to wear only home-made fabrics during the progress of the conflict in which England was now plunged.

On reaching the saluting point the carriages were drawn up in semi-circular form, and the Prince of Wales, who wore the uniform of a colonel of the 1st Life Guards, quitted the barouche, where he was seated by the side of the Princess and mounted a handsome charger that was in waiting. The Duke of York, the Duke of Connaught, and such members of the suite in waiting as were military officers, followed this precedent.

The parade was for inspection purposes rather than for the practice of manœuvres. In fact, it would have been impossible for any general to move his troops to any extent over the Park, owing to the dense crowd of citizens of London which on all sides surrounded the battalions now drawn up in line.

Sir Redvers Buller was in command, and it was noticed that after the troops had gone through a few movements in the manual and firing exercise, a communication made to him by the Prince of Wales caused General Buller to so dispose the line that the troops were massed in a hollow square, of which the open side was occupied by the carriages of the Royal party. When the necessary quarter column formation for this change had been effected, the Prince of Wales moved forward in front of the brilliant staff by which he was surrounded, and it was quickly seen that he was about to address the gathering.

Disappeared into the crowd in charge of his escort.

Such an unprecedented incident appealed so strongly to the dramatic unities of the moment, that a marvellous silence fell upon the thousands of people who witnessed it.

In a strong, firm, and evenly-balanced voice, which reached to a very considerable distance, His Royal Highness then spoke as follows:

"Sir Redvers Buller and officers and men of the Garrison of London. In addressing you briefly to-day I depart from established custom in order to utilise this favourable opportunity of conveying to you, and through you to the people of the British Empire all the world over, the sentiments of Her Majesty the Queen at this supremest hour in the history of Britain. Her Majesty charges me to say that she recognises with a delight intensified by life-long conviction, the indomitable faith and loyalty which characterise the English-speaking people at a moment when such qualities are in the most urgent demand.

"The tremendous nature of the struggle into which we are forced by the action of two great countries, but yesterday deemed our friends, is as well known to Her Majesty the Queen as to her subjects. Her Majesty is beyond all things gratified to perceive that in this hour of stress and terrible danger her people are as steadfast to themselves, as true to their convictions, as faithful to the traditions of their forefathers, as Her Majesty has ever believed and has ever known them to be in times of difficulty or peril."

His Royal Highness paused for a moment, and a low murmur of applause and of keen appreciation swept through the multitude, which would not cheer so that not a word of the speech might be lost.

With even greater vigour of voice and animation of gesture the Prince of Wales continued:

"The dispositions made by the authorities for the defence of England against invasion, and the protection of our highway through the world—the sea—will be made known to you as rapidly as circumstances may permit. Meanwhile I am enabled by the courtesy of the Commander-in-Chief to acquaint you with the fact that preparations are now being rapidly pushed towards completion for the purpose of landing two strong expeditionary forces on the shores of France and Germany."

At this announcement a tremendous outburst of cheers came from the crowd, and, if the truth must be told, the assembled soldiers were as ready to join in the demonstration as anybody else, whilst their officers were themselves too keenly interested in the momentous statement made by the Prince of Wales to take any definite steps towards checking such an unwonted military solecism as cheering in the ranks.

After an interval of some minutes' duration, order was sufficiently restored to enable the Prince of Wales to proceed.

"It is only," he said, "in consequence of the urgent recommendations of Her Majesty's ministers that I have been restrained from taking my place in some responsible position with one or other of these army corps. For reasons of State, however, it is felt to be imperatively necessary that I should remain in England. No such galling if needful restriction are imposed upon my son, the Duke of York, and my brother, the Duke of Connaught, and both these direct representatives of Her Majesty will fill their fitting positions as English princes at the head of British troops fighting for their beloved country."

Another great wave of emotion passed over the crowd. Men yelled themselves almost into a frenzy of excitement, women wept hysterically, some fainted, and the onlooker, unconscious of the cause of this high nervous tension, might have fancied himself in the Bois de Boulogne rather than staid and orderly Hyde Park.

"And now," said His Royal Highness in conclusion, "there remains for me to say to you all: 'Be of good cheer.' I believe that we shall emerge from this struggle a greater, grander, and more powerful nation than we have gone into it, if that be possible. Whatever of effort, whatever of self-denial may be necessary, will be given by all of us, from Her Majesty the Queen down to her least significant subject. In this matter we are a united and determined people, and I have yet to learn that there is any combination of armed force existing in this world which cannot be swept out of the path of Britain when she is aroused. Again, I wish you all God-speed."

With this His Royal Highness waved his hand to the people and the troops, and there came back to him the appreciative cheers of thousands upon thousands of voices.

The Royal party now made preparations for returning to St. James's, and the Prince again seated himself by the side of the Princess. They proceeded very slowly through the Park, acknowledging cordially the vociferous acclamations from the living lines of people through which their carriage slowly forged its way.

Turning out of the Park at Hyde Park Corner, the escort and vehicles were about to move off at more rapid pace, when suddenly a man sprang from the crowd, dodged a policeman and mounted life-guardsman who endeavoured to intercept him, and jumped on to the step of the carriage in which the Prince and Princess of Wales were seated.

With a look of intense entreaty in his eyes, he said to the Prince, speaking with desperate earnestness: "Will your Royal Highness hear me for a moment?"

Although naturally startled by the incident, the Prince of Wales was quick to prevent two members of his escort from cutting down the daring intruder, as he perceived in a glance that the man had no evil intentions in thus abruptly thrusting himself forward.

"What do you want?" he said to the stranger, who still clung desperately to the side of the carriage.

"I am an inventor, your Highness," was the answer, "and I have discovered a weapon which can be rapidly turned to account, and which I believe will be sufficient in itself to save England even in the face of the odds against her. I am a poor man, and of no consequence. No one will listen to me with sufficient authority to take really practical steps towards rendering my invention of value. I thought that if at the risk of my life I could get speech of your Royal Highness, I might succeed in obtaining your sympathy. I want no reward or self-aggrandisement of any sort. I am above all else an Englishman, and I hope that this fact will be sufficient excuse for my action at this moment."

He uttered these words with such absolute conviction in every tone, and yet with an air of decision and self-reliance that could not fail to be impressive, that the Prince of Wales was strongly disposed to hear him further.

"You know," he said, "that at such a time as this every moment of my life is taken up with important business. Do you feel justified in demanding half an hour from me to listen to you under these considerations?"

"I do, your Royal Highness," was the reply.

The Prince turned to the amazed commander of the bodyguard, who was standing near the carriage ready at a word or a sign to run his sword into the unfortunate inventor should he turn out to be what he looked like, namely, a dangerous lunatic, and said: "Captain Duncombe, kindly take charge of this man and bring him to me personally at Marlborough House at five o'clock. Tell the attendants that it is my express desire you should both see me in person."

The officer saluted, and the inventor, with a look of utmost gratitude and satisfaction on his face, quitted his hold on the carriage and disappeared into the crowd in charge of his escort.

Punctually at the appointed hour Captain Duncombe and his companion, who had meanwhile made himself known as Henry Thompson, an electrical engineer in the employ of the City of London Electric Lighting Corporation, presented themselves at Marlborough House.

The officer had accompanied the man to the latter's lodgings in order to obtain a working model of the device which he wished to exhibit to the Prince of Wales, and before allowing it to be packed up had assured himself that it contained nothing in its essentials harmful to human life, however harmful to that commodity it might prove in subsequent operation.

The Prince of Wales not only listened to Mr. Thompson with the utmost care and appreciation for more than half an hour, but astonished the Commander of the Royal Guard by requesting the loan of a magazine rifle. Some experiments were forthwith made in a coach-house, the doors and windows of which had been closed.

As a result of these strange proceedings, Mr. Thompson was brought back into the Royal study whilst a messenger was dispatched for the Commander-in-Chief. Lord Wolseley arrived five minutes later, and the whole matter, whatever it might be, was gone into again with him.

His lordship appeared to be quite as much impressed with Mr. Thompson's invention as the Prince of Wales himself had been, and the remarkable outcome of this poor and unknown electrician taking the desperate step of forcing himself upon the attention of Royalty in such unpromising manner was that on the following day he found himself at the head of a vast electrical manufactory, with practically carte blanche instructions from the War Office and Treasury to turn out as many duplicates of his invention as was possible by working day and night.

The influence of this episode upon the subsequent character of the struggle between England and her enemies became evident later on.

Hide and Seek.

"Five years ago to-day," said the Marquise de Kermel, smiling sadly, "my husband and I started upon our wedding journey. Heartily tired of the regulation routes to the Alps, the Riviera, and the blue skies of Venice, laid out by our world for the guidance of newly-married lovers, we turned our steps to the Morbihan, that nearly forgotten corner of weirdly-picturesque Brittany.

"At Vannes one of our relatives suggested to us, among the many other local curiosities, to be sure and visit the old manorial castle of Ker-pen-hir, situated near the Pion-har-ney, not far from those celebrated and mysterious megalithes that they have named the 'Karnac Alignment.'

"A very ancient, half-ruined old castle of crumbling, moss-covered stone, with, nevertheless, in its intricate galleries and ghostly old chambers, remnants of costly tapestries and princely furniture, ravaged and colonised though they were by worms and rats. For concierge or cicerone, as you please to call her, there was an equally ancient old peasant woman, withered and brown as a witch; she had no companion in her caretaking but a tame crow answering to the name of 'Tête Noir.'

"'My good monsieur and madame,' said she, 'this manor was last inhabited by M. Yvon, the last born of Ker-pen-hir. A terrible fighter was he, monsieur, and kept up the war on the enemies of the King long after that which they called the "Pacification of Brittany" took place. Though they hunted and chased him from morning till night, they never caught him, for he had a knack of vanishing whenever it suited him, and they could never find him.

"'One day he disappeared like this, and from that hour till now he has never been seen again. Some think him dead in foreign lands, others here in his own manor, spirited away by the evil one—who helped him, people say. The good curé himself, even, wouldn't come to this place for an empire after the night had fallen.'

"'And you, my good woman,' queried my husband, 'what do you think has become of this singular baron?"

"'Mon Dieu, monsieur; how do I know any more than I know where that crow of mine goes for a bed every night? For go he does as soon as dark arrives, to sleep in some place in this old building—the Lord knows where! But, see; here are the keys, take them and go where you please. It will amuse you more than to have me with you, and my old legs carry me badly.'

"Enchanted with the latitude allowed us by this unusually amiable guardian, we received the keys and passed to the inner court, once a handsomely-paved square, but now a wilderness of grass and weeds, in the right-hand corner of which rose the donjon-keep, the staircase leading to its turret being in a dangerous, crumbling state.

"'We'll go up, all the same,' said my husband, 'the view must be superb from that height.'

"But I refused, pointing to the danger of the climb, and my husband went alone, laughing at me for my cowardice, whilst I entered the château and began to wander aimlessly about the great vaulted rooms and echoing corridors.

"Soon I heard my husband coming after me, and the childish notion struck me to punish him a little for his stubbornness and for laughing at me, by giving him a good fright. Laughing with glee, I darted into a corner and squatted down beside an enormous black oak cabinet seemingly pushed there to be out of the way. I would spring upon him as he passed and give him a fine scare!

"I crouched down, I say, and the space being narrow, pressed heavily against the wall. All at once something gave way, something like a panel that yielded under my weight, and before I had time to know what had happened to me I found myself tumbled backward into some sort of pitch-black opening, while the door swung to behind me with a strange whirling grind.

"Startled by the accident, I began to feel about me. Each side of me were walls, glacial, stony walls. Before me, a wooden surface, covered with a ragged padding, through which I felt something like an entanglement of some sort of mechanicism.

"The ramblings of the old concierge flashed into my mind, and the strange disappearance at will of the missing baron. Had he managed to construct unknown and mysterious hiding places in his stronghold at Ker-pen-hir? Such concealments were common in the days of the revolution. Could it be possible that I had fallen headlong into one of those queer secret places?

"The fancy gave me a thrill of romantic pleasure, quickly succeeded by a shudder of deadly terror. Suppose I could not reopen that door? Suppose I remained there to die of fear, cold and hunger?

"Nonsense! I had only to cry out loud enough and they would hear me. But I had lost all further desire to frighten my husband! And then I began to call aloud, to call still louder, to scream at the top of my lungs.

"Not a sound responded, and I was conscious myself that my voice made no more impression in that padded cell than if I had been screaming for help in a subterranean dungeon.

"A poisonous, choking odour of mustiness, too, stifled my breathing; the cold froze me to the soul, and I heard under my feet a suspicious scampering.

"Maddened, bewildered, I threw myself upon what I was sure must be the door, clawing, pushing, seeking a spring, a knob, a projection of any kind that would enable me to open it. Nothing! Nothing! The cell of the baron still guarded its secret!

"Nevertheless, my eyes, growing accustomed to the darkness, began to vaguely distinguish that which surrounded me. I moved forward cautiously, and saw before me the first steps of a narrow staircase, built in the thickness of the wall. Perhaps at the bottom I might find some issue! I descended the steps. Ha! I could see better now.

"I was in a sort of vaulted and very high rotunda; what light there was flittering, after a fashion, through a narrow opening in the roof, contrived, possibly, in some out of the way corner of an inner court, and veiled by vines and brambles. Hope revived in me. Bare walls of greyish stones surrounded me; to one side, an old black Breton bed; a couple of chairs; in the centre of the floor, a square table covered with a tattered green serge; on the table, a sword and writing materials; beside it, a huge armchair and—did I see aright?

"Had I lost my senses?—in that chair—a man? Yes, a man whom the high carved chairback had until now hidden from sight; a peasant from the dress he wore, the broad-brimmed, flapping hat, and the embroidered waistcoat.

"Some friend of the concierge's, perhaps, slipping in here for a quiet nap—I was saved—I should soon see daylight. With a scream of joy, I spedto his side.

"'Monsieur! Monsieur!' I cried, and touched his shoulder gently.

"He did not stir. How soundly he slept! I moved round the chair and faced him squarely. A wild shriek escaped me.

"The man was a corpse, a mummy almost; a carcass covered with black parchmentised skin! Two cavities, black and deep, pierced the face, all that was left of what had once been his eyes.

"I shrieked again, and fell against a chair, half swooning with terror. Nevertheless, as often happens in times of supreme crises, I seemed to think with redoubled speed and clearness, to know in a flash, as it were, the desolating truth. I had before me the corpse of Baron Ker-pen-hir, overtaken by death while fleeing from some of his human enemies!

"Some peculiar property in the air in this shut-up dungeon had dried and preserved his remains, as they dry and preserve in a certain Italian convent, in the cells of a subterranean chapel, the bodies of the monks whose souls have passed away.

"Then—then—what would become of me, ignorant of the dungeon's secret, and unable to re-open or re-find the door through which I had fallen? And again I screamed and screamed, till my voice failed me.

"No one came. No one heard me.

"The tones were buried here as they had been in the cell above. Death had caged me, slow, torturing, accompanied by more than the usual hideous train of anguish and fright.

"My mother, my husband, my friends—I should never see them more.

"They would seek me; oh, yes, they would seek me and search and search for me, as they had sought for the Baron Ker-pen-hir, but they would never find me any more than they had found him. My inexplicable disappearance would but add another to those sombre legends of which this old Brittany was so full!

"And how I should suffer in that place of horror; before that ironically grinning corpse, tortured by thirst, tormented by memory, before death released me from my agony; without hope!

"Meanwhile, the gloom had increased about me. Vague as the seeing had been from the start, I saw now nothing at all, nothing but the white, gleaming teeth of that horrible mummy-head, concentrating in themselves all the last faint rays of light in that fast blackening chamber.

"Breathless, panting, straining my eyes in the darkness, I fell upon my knees to send up a last plea to heaven.

"Suddenly, as I fell, a cry sounded near me, hoarse, at once mocking and menacing; at the same time the corpse shook its head violently, with a dry, rustling sound. This was too much. My senses left me.

"When I came to myself again the night had passed. A pale, yellowish reflection told me that the sun was shining; that day once more had come. I had not dreamt, however, the horror that had happened to me. I was truly buried alive, by my own childish folly, in the prison and tomb of Baron Ker-pen-hir. That cry, too; that hoarse, raucous cry, which rung in my ears still, I knew now whence it had come.

"I saw now what had set the corpse's head nodding at me the night before. It was 'Tête-Noir,' the concierge's crow, perched on the chair back and pecking and tweaking at the Baron's hat.

"The sight of that bird was a new ray of hope for me. Heaven had truly heard my prayer, for I saw in the coming of that bird to the cell at this time almost a path to assured safety. My plan was formed instantly and I set about executing it.

"In my pocket I had my handkerchief, stamped with my name. Warily approaching him, softly coaxing him meanwhile—a wholly needless strategem, though, as 'Tête-Noir,' despite his evilly sparkling eyes, was the gentlest creature in the world—I caught him in my arms, securely knotted my handkerchief to his leg and launched him gently toward the crevice in the roof, through which he had certainly made his way.

"Cawing loudly, the handkerchief fluttering white behind him, the crow flew away.

"I swooned in earnest this time, only coming back to life to the ringing sound of pickaxes breaking in the roof, and my husband's voice in anguish beseeching me to assure him that I was not dead.

"The rest you divine. 'Tête Noir' had done his errand nobly. Straight as an arrow he had gone for his breakfast; the handkerchief had been seen and removed, but even then another whole day must pass—and this was the second one, remember—before the crow would seek again the place of nightly rest. They watched him, my husband and the peasants he had summoned followed him, saw him enter his lair and I was saved.

"I saw my dear ones again; my friends; God's beautiful sunlight; but I had lived a lifetime of agony in those thirty hours of black entombment, and never more, so long as I live, will I play "hide and seek" in an old Breton manor!"

THE GLADIATOR.

A Tale of the Eastern Empire.

By GEORGE C. WALLIS.

PART THE THIRD.

"Through the Meshes of the Net."

CHAPTER V.

The Sliding Stone.

"We had better seize Time by the forelock," said Rhesus, "and bring our share of the treasure away in the chariot while we have time."

"As you please," replied Proclus, then fell to laughing immoderately, which angered his friend for a moment.

"I see little to make us mirthful," he said. "What has got you?"

"I was thinking of Marcen," said the other, "of how completely, in his suspicious cunning, he has over-reached himself. Had he been content to simply overhear and act upon his knowledge, he would have won. He could have lured you here alone, or waylain me unexpectedly. As it is, he has shown his hand, put us on our guard, and defeated his own designs. But now to work. Since the gold fever is upon us also, let us be quick with our task. You, Zethra," addressing the driver, "will remain with the chariot. If any armed men appear you will leave it and come down to us."

Therewith they entered the lane, and finding the head of the stone stairs easily now so much had fallen in, came soon to the Hall of Waters. The boat, with its rowlocks of graven bronze, still rotted there, floating idly on the slimy flood. Guiding themselves by the flaring light of their pine torches thrown on the fragments of the rusted chain, they pulled along the dismal avenues of the giant pillars until they found the entrance to the tunnel. There they made fast the craft, and entered hastily. But as they overtrod the footstones of the archway, Zethra's voice came to them. It echoed weirdly through the ghostly aisles. They knew that Marcen was once more on their track.

"Back into the boat!" cried Proclus. "We must save my brave man, above all things. And it is scarcely likely they will all face the water."

"And if they do," cried Rhesus, as they pulled back, "you shall not risk your life to save mine again. It shall be as you said that awful night—'Friends always; friends to the end.'"

They reached the foot of the steps as Marcen and six sturdy rogues were halfway down. They got Zethra in and pushed off. Only just in time. Their short sculls had not struck seven sprays of the inky flood behind ere Marcen and five of his men were in the water and swimming after. Lest they should be capsized with coming to close quarters they pulled away with frantic strokes. Springing into the mouth of the tunnel they prepared to dispute the passage.

One they struck back in the death agony as the others clambered up; then, before the onset of the rest, retired gradually towards the great rock door. In the narrowness of the way and the shifting gleam of the torches they had some set-off against the superior number. Going slowly, pace by pace, guarding and parrying every wild stroke carefully, they came to the huge wall of stone that from the slaty greyness of the shadows loomed out black, still, forbidding. They came to a sudden stop. Now one of the foes is down, now Zethra, now another.

With their backs to the wall they eyed the foe warily, each with sword half raised, and in the moment of hesitation that fell upon all at sight of the stone—even upon Marcen, whose fury at his own oversight was now consuming him as a fire—Proclus said to his friend, whispering guardedly:

"Now for the final act in the tragic comedy of this indifferent-merry life of ours, as I said when we stood here before. You to the right, Rhesus; I to the left—but this time let the comedy end differently. Guard me while I press the key in its place, and be ready to dash through. Let them come after if they will."

Rhesus saw his clever plan and stepped a pace forward. Nerved to the utmost tension by all he had suffered from Marcen, he played his sword before the eyes of the enemy like a cataract of falling steel. They gave back a moment, and in that moment there came a grating sound from behind as the huge stone slowly rose.

The friends dashed through the opening it made before it settled back with a sullen jar into its upright place, and the graven characters upon it stood revealed, but the others did not follow. The three gladiators had tasted enough of the two men's valour, although those who had fallen were now up again and Zethra was dead—one, in fact, having dragged him away and thrown him in into the water—and they waited for further assurance. Marcen, for all his ferocity and rising greed, was afraid. The friends threw down their torches and stamped them out, thus shrouding themselves in darkness, leaving the foe in light. In the darkness they took rest and waited.

But the brief gleam that the last flicker had cast into the cavern had flashed on the jewels and the gold of the long-sought treasure piled upon the rocky floor. The fears of Marcen were dispelled. The avarice of the gladiators was aroused. Marcen had not told them of this, merely wishing to use them in getting the key from Proclus. Now they had seen it he had no alternative but to feign to share it with them.

"Make an end of these obstinate fellows," he said, "and we will divide yonder hoard in equal parts. Come, they are only two, and we are four."

No more urging they needed then. With torches waved aloft and short swords pointed forward, they dashed headlong into the darkness. There was a moment's wild struggle, then Proclus and Rhesus won through, rushed out, and turned again. They checked the following charge, and standing one at each side of the passage, at the upper edge of the stone, held their own well. One of the three cut-throats Rhesus stayed with a sweeping upward swing of his blade, and another Proclus settled with a home-thrust delivered in the most approved arena fashion. Only Marcen and the third now remained. These hesitated at daring the passage again; and Marcen, though not facing the two swords that barred the way, foamed at the mouth with rage.

"Why dally there?" cried Rhesus, derisively. "Why let your treasure lie? You have schemed for it long enough, surely! You have played false to all your friends, caused much blood to be shed, and blighted the best years of more than one life, for its sake. By all the gods of old Olympus, and all the saints of the new Heaven, you will surely not confess yourself outwitted at last by a galley slave and a drowned man! Come, there is a way between us!"

"Yes, come," laughed Proclus, with a cynic sneer, "come! Gather up your precious gold and jewels and trinkets, load up your worthy comrade also, and face us like men! As Rhesus says, there is a way between us, and it leads you clear of this dismal place—if it only leads to the nether world! Waste no more time here than you can help, Marcen. You are somewhat of a judge in matters artistic, and many of these old treasures are splendid works. You know the ancient saying: 'Ars longa, vita brevis'?"

The fellow with him stood with blanched face and dagger gripped convulsively in his red hand, but Marcen was stung to madness by the taunts of the friends, and lost control. He bade the man keep guard, placed his torch in a cleft of the wall, and ran back to the treasure. He began secreting it about his garments with feverish haste, hurling bitter imprecations at his foes as he worked. He toiled like a driven slave, overturning the piles of glittering wealth and picking out the best. The perspiration poured from him in shining beads. His fingers bled from contact with the rough edges of the uncut jewels.

The two friends stood laughing at him, and presently a fresh thought came to Proclus. He leant upon the wall as though in mortal pain, putting his hands on the rock and resting his face upon them. The gladiator, seizing the chance, sprang forward. But Rhesus understood the cynic's action, and put out his blade, tripping the man up. Before he could rise the same blade stilled him for ever. Into the soul of Rhesus the iron had eaten. Then Proclus lifted his head, slipping something long and bright into the folds of his sash; and with sword poised, glanced upward.

Marcen hears the struggle, hears a peculiar, grinding noise, and looks up also. At what he sees a terror seizes him; a handful of rubies scatters from his grasp. Yet his eye catches the red gleam of one as it rolls on the floor, and his greed cannot let it go. He is no longer a man, he is not even a traitor; he is Avarice incarnate. He springs towards the gem, clutches it with claw-like hand, thrusts it into his girdle, and darts towards the falling stone.

It is more than half-way down now, sinking in a lessening angle with majestic motion. The two men beyond it are blurred to his sight by the thin sheet of dust that falls from its edge in a dry cascade. It comes lower, gaining impetus with its fall, and when he reaches it he has to bend, to creep, to get into the opening.

He casts away the red jewel; a wild oath on his quivering lips; a fearful agony of terror in his bloodshot eyes. He has almost scrambled through when the point of a sword pricks his hand. Its edge shines sharp before his face. He recoils from the glittering thing that crosses the small angle of escape, and a wild shriek rings through the cavern, echoing down the passage like the cry of a lost soul. Rhesus even now would hold back his friend's hand, but Proclus is firm. With cool sneer he watches the mighty mass descend.

It grinds down its guiding grooves with a slight, rocking motion, caused by the impulse of its ponderous bulk. Rhesus averts his eye as a writhing hand is pushed from under it. With a thunderous shock it settles to its place. The vibration of its fall dies away, and all is still. Grim, silent, inanimate, it looms before them, filling the square of the passage completely. Only the clutching hand protrudes.

"It is well," says Proclus, shuddering. "It was awful, but just. Let the treasure lie now, Rhesus. We have enough with the handful of jewels we picked up while we waited in the darkness. I would not raise the stone again for the ransom of an empire."

"Nor I," says Rhesus. "Let us be going."

So they turn back up the tunnel and get into the boat, finding the foot of the steps by the light of the one remaining torch. There Rhesus stoves in the craft, watching it settle down for ever in the flood, and after it Proclus throws the long and slender key of bronze. The black ripples made by its splash break dismally against the giant columns, and the muffled echo of their breaking sighs in weird diminuendo down the dim arcades.

Rhesus utters an exclamation of relief, then together the two friends ascend the narrow stairs.

CHAPTER VI.

Over the Sea to Sicily.

The outlet into the lane was open, and they stepped out of the darkness into the full flush of a perfect dawn. The sun had risen in a cloudless sky, and was bathing the tapering spires and countless roofs of the city in a flood of hot and golden light. Along the narrow streets, however, the shadows were yet deep and cool. The two men, keeping well in the shelter of these, reached the new house of Proclus without observation or pursuit. The gladiator Marcen had left on the steps, they saw not again. Perhaps he had thought better of the business, grown weary of waiting, and gone home. Perhaps he had stolen the chariot, for it was missing!

Their way of escape now seemed clear. If Theodora, through her many spies, had gained no inkling of their plans, it was clear. So Proclus bade his friend keep to the house all day, saying that he had work to do that must be hurried, if they were, after all, to leave the city that night.

The hours dragged on wearily for Rhesus. He wandered idly through the statuetted walls of the mansion, listened unheedingly to the sweet songs of the Jewesses, disdained the sensuous allurements of the dancing girls; and as twilight neared, found some relief in the gossip of an old slave. It was such gossip as is usual in such places—such as was every-day talk in that strange city of piety and plunder, wine and wealth—even to the last item, of the sacking and burning of a great villa beyond the wall, near the Charsian Gate.

"It is reported, master," said the old slave, with a peculiarly knowing gleam in the corners of his eyes, "that the pillagers were a band of Sythians, whom—may God condemn them!—have harried our suburbs unmercifully since Nika. But I think otherwise. Be that as it may, they have done their work well and got safely away, taking the fair daughter of the house, who has long been ill-treated, 'tis said, by her harsh foster-parents, with them. The latest rumour has it that the said parents have since been set free. That also I doubt."

Rhesus hoped that the rumour was true, and hearing that the name of the beautiful girl who had been carried off was Annita, gave no more thought to the matter. The old man went out, and after him the dancing girls, and the Jewesses. The dusk deepened to night, and Rhesus felt a strange silence grow upon the house. He went from one room to another, roused to some suspicion. He called for the attendants. The house was empty; no one answered to his call.

He went out into the street, glaring now with the torch-lights of passers-by. He noticed the varying badges of blue and green, and heard the ribald songs of the tipsy gallants whose day began with night. The sky was moonless, but wonderfully starry and clear. The sweeping curve of Andromeda, swung over the changeful Algol, recalled his far-off home to his mind, and the many evenings he had spent in tracing out the constellations on the black background of that mystic space. His uneasiness was lulled a little. He went back into the house and waited; and presently Proclus returned alone.

"I was afraid you would have thought me false, Rhesus," said he, "so long have I been away. My task has been a hard one. The slaves have gone, I see—by my orders. It is well. I have a great surprise for you to-morrow, friend, so stuff your sash with all the coin you can, and let us be going."

Digitized by Google

"I am ready," said Rhesus. "Weary of this waiting, too, though I never doubted your fidelity. But what is this surprise you have in store?"

"That you shall know when we are clear of this evil place," said the other. "I have something yet to do here."

He ran down the silent passage to the back of the dwelling, and presently, with a queer smile, returned. Rhesus heard the crackling of dry wood and guessed his errand.

"We must be wily as foxes if we are to get away," said the cynic. "It has come to my knowledge that some hint of my intention has reached the Empress. So I thought it best to create some diversion for the soldiery and the mob!"

They were a street's length away by this, but the cry of "Fire!" was already raised, and the crowd ran crushing past them towards the house. Curls of smoke and tongues of flame leapt from the rear of it. Falling sparks, carried by the fresh wind, overtook them.

"Constantinople will have work and gossip enough to-night!" laughed the incendiary. "It will pay them back somewhat for the trouble they gave us that night you and I know so well, Rhesus."

Unnoticed in the tumult and excitement they came easily to the palace garden. Passing the little portal, they entered the aloe grove. Rhesus felt his heart beat high, and a strange diffidence seize him, now he stood on the threshold of love's kingdom at last. Yet when the flutter of Eutasia's robe came down the flower-embroidered path, his dalliance vanished. He sprang out of their concealment and clasped her to him as ruthlessly as he had done that first day—how long ago it seemed!—when he picked her from the sand of the arena and bore her round the course in his chariot.

"Then you are not afraid to leave all for my sake, sweet little 'Tasia?" he asked.

"What think you, Rhesus? I am here, and ready, and impatient to be gone. What would you have more?"

"Nothing, dear," he cried, and led her down the shaded groves to the garden steps, with Proclus coming carefully behind. There, with muffled oars and a silent crew, lay a light galley waiting.

There was a patter of feet and a great commotion in the garden as they stepped on board. Lights flashed between the trees, voices called, weapons gleamed in the clear starshine.

"Cast off!" cried Proclus. The little craft sheered away. He shouted back a mocking derision to the baffled emissaries of the Empress. The rowers gathered rhythm in their strokes, the low shore receded, the lights sank to wavering dots that at last were lost in the gloom, the angry cries were swept away in the night wind. Safety for the fugitives was won at last.

All through the night the galley sped down the dark-shining waters of Propontis and the Hellespont, and though pursued by a warship manned in haste, got clear away and out upon the opening bosom of the Egean.

* * * * *

As the greyness of morning twilight gave place to the red tinge of sunrise over the glittering sea, Proclus drew Rhesus and Eutasia to the stern of the ship's deck, and bade a sailor bring up the lady from below.

She came up the hatchway steps radiant with the freshness of beauty. A blush-red hue was painted on her soft cheeks by the ocean breeze. With the lovelight in her dark eyes, she crossed the deck to Proclus and placed her hand in his.

"This," said the cynic, gravely, "is Annita, whom I took from her home yesterday in a somewhat rough manner. You may have heard of my exploit in the city. She is to be my wife, Rhesus."

Rhesus said no words beyond a simple greeting, and the two women kissed each other. Leaving them to make friends in their own way, the two men went together to the side and gazed out upon the spreading wash that the ship left behind her in the waters. In that moment of heartfelt joy and peace the ambitions of one and the pessimism of the other were swept away for ever in the merry-whistling gale.

They talked awhile of their adventures and trials, their failures and successes, their loves and their prospects for the peaceful future, arranging to put in at Athens and be married in a sacred shrine of the old faith yet remaining there. Rhesus, as the quiet years of peace to come in the white-walled villa set amid the vineyards and the orange-fields of sunny Sicily lay fair and bright before him, had no regret for the hopes of his youth that were now no more. He had no regret for the life of the gay city blessed by Nature and cursed by man; for the treasure that had cost so much, and was now lost. He had chosen the better part of life, after all, gaining a greater treasure than all the jewels in the world, a greater gift than the applause of men. The words that escaped his lips, breaking the spell of the silence that had fallen between them, were re-echoed lowly by his friend.

Eutasia and Annita took them up in refrain, shattering the spell completely with their merry laughter; and the words that their sweet voices flung out over the sunlit sea were "home" and "rest."

And the swift galley bore them safely to both; for the Fates are kind sometimes.

THE END.

A Young Matchmaker.

It had been Baby's love affair from the beginning, as he had introduced the young people, compassing the matter in this way:

The Lansing family had just moved to Southampton and were busy with the settling of their household goods' The family consisted of The Baby, aged hree years, his father and mother, and Aunt Mary Lanting, all young people, and all, apparently, existing sbut to revolve round the small autocrat of the household.

On this busiest of all days, Baby took it into his curly pate to explore the city of his adoption, and, after various thrilling encounters with huge, hungry-looking dogs, with street urchins, larger and more worldly-wise than himself, and thundering waggons and drays, his courage forsook him, and he collapsed into a sobbing little heap at a street corner.

Just as he had decided that he had not a friend in the world, a young man hurrying past caught sight of the forlorn little one, and, with a mingled feeling of impatience at the interruption, and of pity, stooped and picked him up.

"Hallo, young man! What has happened?"

Baby's plump cheeks were flushed and dusty, with paths down them where the tears had trickled. His lip curled pitifully as he replied:

"I zus wented out, an' now I's losted!"

"Very evident, sir. And what may be your name?"

"Baby," with a sniff.

"Baby what?"

"Ist on'y Baby!" with impatient iteration.

"What's papa's name?"

"Papa, course! An' Mamma's ist Mamma, an' Aunt's 's Auntie, an' 'at's all."

Despairing of identifying his burden, the young man started in search of a policeman, when he encountered a young lady. He had just time to see that she was breathless and pale, and while her pink cotton gown was most becoming, it was hardly appropriate for the street, when she gave an ecstatic cry of recognition and caught Baby in her arms, where he put two plump hands about her neck and patted wildly at the back of her head, to the refrain of "Auntie! mine own Auntie!"

Then, as Miss Lansing turned to acknowledge the family debt to Baby's rescuer, he recovered his dignity and remarked with an eloquent gesture of a fat forefinger:

"Zis ist mine Auntie, what loves me. An' zis ist ve nice man what foun' me when I was losted. I fink I'll call him Uncle, 'cause I never had one 't all, yo know."

And so Baby introduced Frederick Austen and Mary Lansing; and as he had with much trouble to himself, made them known to each other, so he lent them the aid and encouragement of his presence and advice on all important or embarrassing occasions. Sometimes the occasions alluded to were embarrassing chiefly because of Baby's wide, inquisitive blue eyes and searching questions.

One evening, when the young people were discussing Chopin as Miss Lansing played softly, Mr. Austen apparently engrossed in the argument, but really, as he bent over the fair player, marvelling at the changing pink and white in her cheeks and the regular waves of her soft brown hair, an experienced eye would have known at first glance what was imminent; but Baby rushed upon the scene, calling, in his high-pitched treble:

"Auntie! Oh, Auntie! I wan' to ask yo somefing!" Then, sure of the attention of his audience, he burst forth eagerly: "W'y—mamma—w'y, las' night mamma said to papa 'at she fought uncle meant somefing sewious, an' I didn't know whedder yo knowed it or not!"

When the critical moment arrived, and the young solicitor skilfully pleaded his case; when his entreaties had broken down the last barrier; when his eager arms had opened to receive the slender form; when the world and time itself were, for the moment, blotted out for two people, there came a howl of indignant remonstrance from the staircase in the hall. Baby stumbled down the few remaining steps as fast as his fat legs would allow, tore across the floor and threw himself upon the girl, clutching at her skirts until she stooped to raise him in her arms, where he clung, panting defiantly.

"She's mine auntie, mine own, an' Uncle ner no one else can be a-huggin' of her."

Through the bliss of their early courtship Baby hovered about them with an insistence that sometimes caused Mr. Austen to say something impatient under his breath as he gnawed the ends of his moustache, but, being a wise young man, he concealed the fact that the presence of a wriggling human interrogation-point was not always as welcome as "the flowers that bloom in the spring." He used sometimes to wish that it was a pug instead of a child, "for then," he would soliloquise, "I could persuade Mary to let me take the little wretch by the nape of the neck and put him out of the room."

But Baby stayed on, making himself a prominent factor in their conversation, and on that never-to-be-forgotten day when they quarrelled—about nothing much, to be sure, but still a serious quarrel—he took a hand in the disagreement, sided with his beloved Auntie though plainly stricken to go against the Uncle of his adoption, and placed his chubby little person between the pair.

"Yo shan't look so at mine own Auntie!" he declared with quivering lip. "See how you've made her k'y. Go 'way 'twunst."

Aunt Mary seemed to gain courage from this display of spirit on the part of her protector, for she raised her head and echoed Baby's summary order, adding a few scathing remarks that Baby perhaps thought, but that were impossible to his limited vocabulary.

Three months passed, during which time Baby prattled much of the Uncle who used to love his Auntie, and Aunt Mary grew more slender, and the pink came less often to her cheeks.

And in a solicitor's office a young man fretted and fumed over his law books, or in court glared and thundered at his opponents with a vehemence that caused the older lawyers, whose own love affairs were in the dim and shadowy past, to open their eyes and wonder if Austen were in training for politics.

Coming downstairs one afternoon he encountered at the street door a kilted young man of some four years, with a dilapidated cap set askew on tangled yellow curls and an air of sturdy determination beaming from his blue eyes and not over-clean face.

"Hallo, Uncle!" said he. "I knowed if I come stwaight down stweet I'd fin' you."

"Why, how do you do, Baby?" returned the young man, turning a trifle pale. Then extending his hand: "Won't you shake hands with me?"

"Affe: ..hile," was the business-like response. "But, fyste I want to show you," and he pulled a dilapidated photograph from under his arm. "Zus see how Auntie 's 'poiled zis ole fing, a k'yin' on it. I see her do it, lots o' times, an' I fink you oughter gimme a better one fer her, 'cause you been naughty to her."

For a long minute the young man stood motionless, staring down at the little figure and the soiled photograph of himself. Then with a swoop of his strong arms, he lifted the child as he had done on the first day of their acquaintance.

"I can't say that I'm sorry that the picture has been spoilt in that way, Baby, and I'm perfectly willing to give Auntie another one, but suppose you take Uncle up to see her, and he'll tell her he's sorry for being so naughty to her."

Baby heaved a sigh of relief.

"Well, I fink you better. 'At 's 'e way I allus does when I been naughty, an' it makes me feel good."

Within half an hour all the heartache and loneliness were of the past. Baby stood aside with hands clasped behind him, viewing the pair with speculative eyes. Then their sweet oblivion vanished before his piping voice:

"Uncle, I fink you better stop a huggin' Auntie so hard, an' tell her 'at you're very sorry fer bein' so naughty to her, an' p'omise her 'at you won't make her k'y, never no more!"

Baby steered his love affair successfully thereafter, and at the wedding marched proudly in the procession, and, except that he slapped one of the little flower girls for stepping on the bride's train, behaved with the utmost dignity and decorum.

He still keeps a watchful eye on the pair beneath their new roof-tree, and takes quite the pride of proprietorship in their peace and happiness.

ALBERT ANDREWS.

TEN £5 NOTES GIVEN AWAY EVERY WEEK.

PERHAPS THERE IS ONE FOR YOU.

The Editor of Pearson's Weekly has addressed Ten Envelopes to Ten People in various parts of the Country. Inside each envelope he has placed a Five-Pound Note, and locked them all away in his private safe. All you have to do is to apply to P.W. offices on a post-card, asking if one of these Five-Pound Notes has been addressed to you, giving your full name and address.

The names have been picked out at random from the Post Office Directories, so it is just possible notes have been awarded to people who are not readers of P.W. No note will be given unless it is applied for, so it would be advisable to drop a POST-CARD, whether you are a reader or not.

All applications for No. 3 Distribution must reach P.W. office Saturday, August 20th, addressed to

THE "NOTE" EDITOR,

NOVELS FOR THE HOLIDAYS

To be had of all Booksellers and at the Circulating Libraries.

THE SHROUDED FACE.

By OWEN RHOSCOMYL, Author of "Battlement and Tower," "The Jewel of Ynys Galon." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"To readers who enjoy plenty of mystery, stirring incident, a touch of witchcraft, and a redeeming thread of sentiment, 'The Shrouded Face' will prove acceptable. It also gains an interest by taking us into the back-waters of a history as yet not amply recorded in authorised historic writings."—Sheffield Independent.

"Here and there the colouring of the story is almost Stevensonian in strength and quality, and a greater art than Crockett's is shown in some of the passages-at-arms."—Dundee Advertiser.

THE MASTER KEY.

By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A busy, domestic story, by a writer who, since her first appearance with 'The House on the Marsh,' has always been entertaining."—Academy.

AUTHORISED TRANSLATION.

THE HOPE OF THE FAMILY.

By ALPHONSE DAUDET. Translated by LEVIN CARNAC. Crown 8vo, buckram, 6s.

"It is destined, we think, to rank among the very best of his novels." The Pall Mall Gazette on the French Edition.

"Is to be classed with Daudet's better work. In his best style." Literature.

HAGAR OF HOMERTON.

By MRS. HENRY E. DUDENEY, Author of "A Man with a Maid." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The reader is introduced to characters drawn with considerable smartness, and there is a tone of originality about the story which will awaken interest in the heart of the most hardened novel-reader."—Dundee Advertiser.

"Told with much cleverness in detail and piquancy of style. The heroine's connection with the East End affords her opportunities for much skilful satire at the expense of East London society, which furnishes some of the best episodes in the book."—Scotsman.

A MAORI MAID.

By H. B. VOGEL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The story is told with delicacy and good feeling. Mr. Vogel knows New Zealand well, and in particular the Maories—their history, institutions, customs, and characteristics, and many of his descriptive passages are decidedly interesting and picturesque."—Scotsman.

IN FRIENDLY CONVERSE.

W. K. L.—No, the Royal Family cannot constitutionally abdicate without the consent of both Houses of Parliament.

G. D. G. writes to point out that Napoleon was once wounded by a musket ball in the left foot at the storming of Ratisbon, when he defeated the Arch-Duke Charles, on April 23rd, 1809.

I. P.—Coats of Arms were originally so called because ladies and gentlemen had their armorial bearings embroidered upon their dresses. A knight was allowed to adopt any symbol he chose, and it soon became the symbol by which he was known.

Fireman.—The difficulty caused by the rapid evaporation of the water contained in the fire buckets of a building or works can easily be avoided by pouring a few drops of oil into the buckets, which will form a preservative coating on the top of the water.

G. G.—The only man in the kingdom to whom the word "Sir," without any qualifying term, can properly be employed as an apostrophe, is the Prince of Wales. In speaking to a baronet—Sir John Jones for example—you must say "Sir John," and never on any account "Sir Jones."

Citizen.—If you wish to have a warm situation for your house, choose a spot on a hill, not in a valley; for although a house situated low down gains a certain amount of shelter from the high winds, it is more than counterbalanced by the presence of damp. Moist situations are always colder than dry ones.

Hiawatha asks for the best way of discovering whether a seed is ripe or not.——There are many ways of determining this. During the process of growth the seed is always soft, when it is ripe it becomes hard. Colour, of course, plays a prominent part in the maturity of seed. A ripe seed is usually brown or black. It will also be found that, as a rule, a ripe seed will sink in water, owing to the density of its particles, while an immature one will float.

Puzzler writes: "Can you assign any reason for the fact that a wetting with fresh water will almost invariably be followed by a severe cold, while a wetting with sea water has no such effect?"————Because the salt in the sea water acts as a double preventive of cold in the following way: It retards evaporation, and the sudden absorption of heat from the body which follows a fresh water wetting is thus avoided. Secondly, the salt causes an extra flow of blood to the skin by its irritating effect upon it.

Storm.—Storm warnings were first issued in Holland in 1860.

Metre.—The expression "hair-breadth," now usually called "hair's breadth," was once a regular measure. It was the width of sixteen hairs laid side by side.

J. N.—The first hippopotamus in the possession of the Zoological Society—in 1851—was a gift to the Society; but it cost £1,000 for transport. The society once paid £2,400 for three giraffes.

R. R. R.—The originator of the famous three "r" alliteration—"reading, 'riting, and 'rithmetic"—is said to have been Sir William Curtis, at one time Lord Mayor of London. It occurred in a toast in 1795.

Miner.—A mine on the Dalquharren Estate, Dailly, Scotland, has been burning for fifty years. It has just spent itself. The flames occasionally burst forth from the ground in volcanic fashion. The dykes of rock which intersected it prevented the fire from reaching the other mines.

Alice.—You are quite right; the "spider's web" pattern for dresses and waistcoats is really not at all new. Here is a quotation from a diary written about 160 years ago: "A coat of rich yellow, with the netts of spiders cunningly drawn on the cloth." It was worn by a gentleman at the notorious Ranelagh Gardens.

Contractor asks whether a railway-bridge has ever been fixed in position in one night.————Yes. About eighteen months ago the Great Eastern Railway removed the old bridge over the River Lea, near Tottenham Station, and fixed a new one in its place in nine hours, despite a severe snowstorm. The G.E.R. has done some quick things in that way.

S. I. S.—Sisters of Charity originated with the labours of Vincent de Paul. Wherever he went he was accustomed to urge benevolent women to undertake the relief of the suffering; but he found that these volunteers did not continue the work for long. He resolved to found a society; he did so in 1633. From this society of four members has sprung the great organisation of our days.

B.—The importance of eating a good breakfast is strongly insisted upon by many medical men. One large firm in the North of England is said to have turned out more work with the same number of hands after it altered the time of starting from six to eight, thus enabling the men to have breakfast before they began, instead of working two hours before breakfast. The Portuguese have a saying to the effect that no man can be a good husband who does not eat a good breakfast.

Siller.—A silver coin is usually in currency for twenty-seven years.

Numis.—The "Kreutzer," which may be called the Austrian farthing, and which is being withdrawn from circulation, is one of the oldest of European coins. It has been in existence for more than four centuries. It circulated in North and South Germany at one time, but has been practically limited to Austria for twenty-five years.

Taste.—It is all a matter of custom. The person who cannot do with less than three pieces of sugar in a small cup of tea can, by degrees, accustom his palate to relishing tea without any sugar. Most people would think an egg quite insipid without salt, but one member of this staff declares that salt simply spoils the flavour of the egg. "Salt," he says, "may be necessary if you are forced to eat an egg that has reached the 'political' stage, but otherwise it is a disadvantage."

A. T. has been led by his thirst for knowledge to ask me if America was known to the ancient Greeks.————There is no evidence. A French writer has tried to prove that it was, but his proof is not convincing. He says that Aristotle describes a foreign country where, in the vicinity of marshy ground and sluggish rivers, a booming sound is heard at night. This sound could not be accounted for; but the writer asserts that it must have been made by the American bull-frog; so that America was known to the Greeks.

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD

When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?

Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vescicle tissues generally."

NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.

All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.

After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.

The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."

After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.

From Rev. J. H. BURN.

DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN, NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.

"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.

Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

Nothing Similar. Nothing as Good. KAPUTINE CURES HEADACHE IN 10 MINUTES.

BURMAH CUP.

THE FIN DE SIÈCLE

NON-ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGE NOW INTRODUCED INTO LONDON.

BURMAH CUP is an Aerated Beverage produced from the choicest and purest ingredients. So wisely selected and so scientifically blended are the flavours of Fruits, Spices, and Flowers, all detectable, none too prominent, that BURMAH CUP may be described as the NECTAR of the XIXTH CENTURY.

BURMAH CUP IS CHARMING TO LOOK AT. DELIGHTFUL TO DRINK IS BURMAH CUP.

SPARKLING. INVIGORATING. REFRESHING. INEXPENSIVE.

CREDENTIALS.

GEO. R. SIMS, writing in The Referee, says:

"I wonder whether the next century will give us a non-mawkish, non-flatulent Temperance Drink. There is a fortune awaiting the inventor of a Temperance Drink which will be above the level of the beverages usually consumed by children of tender years in conjunction with jam tarts and cream ices."

GEO. R. SIMS, writing to The Inventor, says:

"Dear Sir,—Thanks for BURMAH CUP, which I find excellent. Kindly send me address of your Agents in London, through whom it can be ordered.—Faithfully yours,

"GEO. R. SIMS."

A few days later he gave permission to quote the above, and added:

"BURMAH CUP is certainly very palatable, and should be a great success."

Sir WILLIAM COLLINS, late Lord Provost of Glasgow and President of the Scottish Temperance League, introduced it for use at the Civic Entertainments during his three years' tenure of office. Since then it has maintained its popularity with the élite of Society.

BURMAH CUP has been used for Royal and Civic Ceremonies, and Public Banquets, Dinners, Luncheons, Balls, Receptions, Garden Parties, etc., and Private Entertainments of all descriptions.

ROYAL TOASTS HAVE BEEN DRUNK IN BURMAH CUP IN THE ROYAL PRESENCE.

EXPERTS SPEAK.

"I hereby certify that I have made a careful chemical analysis and microscopical examination of samples of BURMAH CUP. I am of opinion that BURMAH CUP is a Grand Non-Alcoholic Beverage. The very finest ingredients have been used, and great skill used in its manufacture. It is ABSOLUTELY PURE. I strongly recommend it to ladies and gentlemen at home, and especially in tropical countries, as being a first-class, cooling and refreshing drink.

"GEO. COMBE STUART, F.C.S., M.B.P.C., &c.,
"Public Analyst, Glasgow."

The Mineral Water Trade Journal* says:

"It is sparkling and stimulating without being intoxicating, and it only requires to be widely known to ensure its unqualified success. BURMAH CUP should prove a welcome addition to the list of non-intoxicating beverages, and will be equally popular in winter as in summer."

The Caterer* says:

"It is beautifully bright, seductive to the palate, and altogether a fascinating Temperance Drink of vouched-for purity."

THE MEDICAL FACULTY.

Now freely prescribe BURMAH CUP for use by sufferers from Neuralgia; and it is becoming highly popular amongst Clergymen, Orators, Vocalists, etc., as a Beverage possessing the properties of an Excellent Voice Tonic.

BURMAH CUP is retailed at Cafes, Restaurants, Refreshment Counters, Dining Rooms, Hotels, &c., at usual prices of good lemonade.

BURMAH CUP is supplied to families in corked bottles at 2s. 6d. per dozen, splits 1s. 9d., and in syphons 7s. per dozen. Bottles, syphons, and cases charged for, but allowed on return.

BURMAH CUP is sold by WILLIAM WHITELEY, of Westbourne Grove, W.; D. MELIA & Co. (Limited), of Jewry Street, London, and their Branches in the great Provincial Towns; and by all prominent firms elsewhere.

BURMAH CUP IN LONDON is bottled and supplied to the trade by Messrs. NAPOLEON PAUL & Co., of King's Road, St. Pancras, N.W.

BURMO

is the Essence Compound from which BURMAH CUP is prepared. BURMAH CUP can be made at home by means of a Gazogene or any Aerated Water.

UNTOLD TALES OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.

IV.—The Lights at the Delhi Gate.

By H. HUNTER.

THE old fort at Agra—what a crowd of memories cluster round its battlements and bastions! What legends, mostly grim and grisly, linger about its pillared courts and sculptured arches. What tales are told concerning its long galleries, where the ladies of the Zenana used to play "hide and seek" with the Emperor. What stories of the gloomy range of underground vaults, the secret stairs, and mysterious passages; and of the curious chambers concealed in the masonry of its great carven gateways.

What phantoms flit through its gleaming pavilions, or hover round it massive towers, or haunt its terraced roof and airy colonnades!

The old palace of Shah Jehan, dominated by the dark red wall of the great fort, and with the sacred waters of the Jumna flowing in a deep channel at its base, was indeed a place in which to dream dreams and see visions.

But the story which I have to tell cannot be contemptuously dismissed as the one, or politely referred to the other.

Yet few stranger have ever been told outside the pages of sensational romance.

It was never doubted by any of the large number of English, civil and military, who were living at the time in the fort—never doubted even by the three or four leading civilians, who, of all men there present, were the least disposed to credulity, after the report of Colonel Fraser and the ocular demonstration afforded them.

The Delhi Gate of the old fort at Agra, imposing as it looked to the eye, contained only two or three moderate-sized apartments, a few small chambers and several narrow staircases and alleyways by which access was gained to the roof above the main gateway, and to the battlements beyond.

In one of these apartments in the first months of the Mutiny was quartered a clerk attached to the Stores Department.

The man was an Eurasian. In his veins ran the blood of two continents, Europe and Asia; a mixture despised in the East, and by none more than by the English rulers of the Empire of India. There are reasons for this which do not concern our story; but, during the stress of the Mutiny, the fact was too often allowed to prejudice the opinion of the men in authority in many of the affected districts.

Agra was no exception. The civil officials, the magistrate and the collector particularly, would listen to nothing that reached them through Eurasian channels. That an Eurasian gave the information was, in their eyes, enough to condemn it as untrustworty. Nothing coming from Eurasian sources could move the Lieutenant-Governor to action. It was tainted. Eurasians didn't "count" in the calculations of the Anglo-Indians responsible for the government of Agra.

The Stores clerk was a cut above the average run of his race, and naturally resented the low estimate put upon his blood by the chief civil authorities of the place. His room in the Delhi Gate commanded a view of the great wall which inclosed the fort on the landward side. From the window he could see straight down the Rowney—the dry ditch which ran at the bottom of the wall.

One evening, when the charcoal fires began to glow about the fountain, and the English families who had found shelter in the fort were assembled as usual in the great square of the Palace, for the social meal which closed each eventful day, it was pretty evident, from the eager talk and suppressed excitement, that something had occurred to give the daily gossip a fresher flavour, and a newer interest.

A rumour, indeed, had gone about from group to group, till it had travelled the entire circuit of the square, which had set every tongue wagging to the same tune, and filled every heart with vague feelings of uneasiness, apprehension, and alarm.

In those days, filled with excitement, when the improbable and the unexpected were happening every hour, nothing was too wild or too extravagant for belief—and, with the old fort a perfect rabbit-warren of underground passages, extending in all directions and very imperfectly explored, there was ample foundation for the imagination to build on.

Any number of rebels might find concealment in the long range of subterranean chambers beneath the Palace. The mutineers, who were believed to be in the suburbs and villages across the river, could get access to these chambers, it was said, through the secret passages which extended under the Rowney—the dry ditch—and had exits in different quarters of the city.

The rumour, circulating through the Palace Square on this particular evening in July '57, declared that strange noises had been heard in the Rowney at unholy hours, and strange lights had been seen there long after gun fire had warned everybody to retire and the bugle had sounded "lights out."

The story, it was reported, orignated with a clerk whose room in the Delhi Gate looked into the ditch, which it commanded as far as the angle of the wall.

"Yes," said young Joyce, the Deputy-Assistant Collector, who was drinking tea with Mrs. Cubitt's party, "with that half-caste chap who weighs out the grain rations, Dick Costello—drunken Dick, as we call him. The man's never sober more than half his time—not but what they say he does his work just as well in one condition as the other."

"Well," put in Lieutenant Batson, who had just come off duty at the Bengalee bastion, and for whom Nellie Cubitt had reserved a chair next her own, "it isn't every fellow who can plead such a good, sound, reasonable excuse for his liquor. I wonder the man isn't drunk every day in the week instead of only making it three out of seven. He certainly deserves to be commended for his moderation."

"Was there any truth in that story?" inquired a sad-looking lady, one of the fugitives from Gwalior.

"Truth!" chirped the cheerful Lieutenant, "why, my dear madam, it was all truth. And the very part which one would be most inclined to reject is really the truest half of it.

"When the mutineers broke into his room in the city, Costello was about three quarters through with a bottle of Exshaw's 'best.' He received them with all the grace and courtesy of Government House, invited them to be seated, apologised for not having glasses enough to go round, assisted them to smash his mirrors and break his furniture; danced with them round the bonfire they made in the street, and yelled louder than any rebel in the mob.

"They thought him a lunatic, but he was only drunk; and, while every other Christian, man, woman, and child, was brutally murdered and mutilated, Costello was left unharmed. Lunatics, you know, are always objects of reverence in the East."

"But Mr. Drummond, I'm afraid, hasn't much sympathy with Dick sober and none at all with Dick drunk."

"I understand," said Joyce, "that he's threatened Costello, that if he finds him repeating that silly story again—about the lights at the gate, I mean—he'll make an example of him."

"Yes," hummed Lieutenant Batson, "as he did of the corn merchant who sold grain to the Commissariat contractor.

"The poor devil got two months in 'chokee' for helping the General to feed the garrison. Oh! we're a happy family, aren't we? Let the military issue an order, the civilians immediately publish another; and the Mussulman says to the Hindoo: 'See how these Christians love one another.'"

"With the sword hanging over our heads we spend most of our time in squabbling and quarrelling."

"We haven't got a man here; that's what's the matter with Agra," said a quiet spoken individual in the uniform of the mounted militia. "A man who can grasp the situation and 'sit firm.' The magistrate swears by the Mahommedans, and the Lieutenant-Governor supports him. The General swears at them, but lacks capacity and trusts to luck. The Colonels are good men and true, but their hands are tied: on one side by military etiquette, on the other by civil authority.

"This story of the lights at the Delhi Gate would have been investigated and disposed of before ever it got to be the common gossip of the fort, if we'd had a man here like Lawrence or Nicholson. But Drummond thinks he's done enough when he's called Costello a drunken fool; and Mr. Colvin declines to hear a word against Drummond.

"Heigh-ho! There goes Fraser. Excuse me, Mrs. Cubitt," said the militia man rising. "I want a word with the Colonel."

* * * * * *

"Yes, I know what Mr. Drummond has threatened, but you can leave me to deal with that, I think," said Colonel Fraser to Dick Costello, the morning after Mrs. Cubitt's tea party in the Palace Square. "Now then, let's have the whole story. It can't be a very long one, and tell it as straight as you know how. You needn't look round the room in that scared fashion, man. There's nobody behind the grass mats; there's not a soul within hearing but ourselves. You're telling the tale to none but me, understand. So now, eyes front, if you please."

"Well, Colonel," stammered the unfortunate Stores clerk, by no means assured of the Colonel's power to protect him, and with the sense of an unholy secret weighing like lead upon him, "as you say, it isn't much of a story, and Mr. Drummond——"

"How did it begin, man, and when did it start?" interrupted the Colonel impatiently. "Give us a day or a date, can't you? Something definite to go upon. Be careful what you say; but see you don't keep anything back."

"It began with the noises, Colonel," said the man, breaking into a perspiration from sheer fright. "I was lying awake one night—it's dreadful hot up in that room ——"

The Colonel fidgeted.

"It was the Thursday in last week, Colonel," continued Costello with a gasp.

He had caught the look in the Colonel's eye.

"Just a week ago to-day, sir. I was lying awake. I hadn't been to sleep and I wasn't dreaming.

"I was thinking of the fine new house which Jotee Persham, the military contractor, had built himself out of the commissariat money, when I heard a sound like somebody tapping with a hammer. I didn't pay much attention to it at first. But it continued—'tap-tap,' at intervals of every few seconds.

"That's a hammer striking a chisel, thinks I, after it had been going for a bit. But I didn't know the sappers worked in the Rowney all night. Some new order out, I s'pose!

He saw a shadowy form emerge from the shelter of the wall.

"I lay listening for a matter of p'raps twenty minutes, wondering what it might be and thinking every moment it would cease. But it kept on 'tap-tap' as regular as the beat of the clock on the wall there. Now and again, the hammer would seem to miss the chisel and strike the stone. The difference in the sound was plainly perceptible.

"All at once it occurred to me, as a singular circumstance, that only one hammer should be going if the sappers were really at work in the ditch below. So I got up and went to the window. There wasn't a soul to be seen. There wasn't so much as a dog moving. The Rowney was deserted. But the tapping went on as before. I didn't half like the sound of that 'tap-tap,' coming up at regular intervals from the silence below.

"It seemed to come from the wall below the gate. I listened at the window for a good bit, expecting to see someone. But I saw nothing. The noise, however, continued without ceasing. When it stopped, I don't know. It was going, I believe, when I fell asleep.

"The following night I heard it again. It began about the same time—as near midnight as makes no difference. I listened again. It came from the same place—about twenty yards from the gate, at the foot of the wall. There was no other sound, no voices, nothing but the regular tap of iron on iron, or iron on stone.

"Next morning I reported it."

The man stopped. He was shaking like a leaf. The Colonel looked hard at him, drew his own conclusions, and, taking a bottle from a dwarf cabinet, poured out a measure of brandy. Adding thereto a small quantity of water he handed it to the man.

"Drink this, Costel.o," he said, "it will steady your nerves a bit. You've got a touch of hysteria. There's nothing for you to be frightened of, my good fellow. I give you the word of an English officer, you shan't be punished for speaking the truth, or what you believe to be the truth. Just tell me plainly all you saw and heard and leave the rest to me."

"I don't make so much, sir, of Mr. Drummond calling me a drunken fool," said poor Dick, querulously. "I know I drink more than's good for me; but I wasn't drunk when I heard them noises, nor yet when I saw the lights; and I ain't quite a fool, either. Would they trust me to keep the Stores accounts if they thought me a fool?

"But I've got something to tell, Colonel, that gives me the shivers only to think of—something that'll make you turn against me worse'n Mr. Drummond, for he ain't heard it, or you must be a won'nerful good sort, Colonel—'cuse me, sir. Something, sir, that I wouldn't tell Mr. Drummond—no, not if he promised me a pension! And the worst of it is, Colonel, that I should be satisfied if I knew I was drunk; but I was sober, sir, as sober as Mr. Drummond himself. Yet I'll take my dying oath I saw all four of 'em."

"Four of whom?" said the Colonel, thoroughly interested at last.

"The four English soldiers who went into the vaults and never came out again."

Colonel Fraser sat and stared at the man for some minutes without speaking.

"Do you know how long ago that is?" said he at length, without taking his eyes off Costello.

"Fifty years, they say, or thereabouts."

"And you saw those men?"

"I saw them, Colonel, as plain as I see you. I knew them by their English uniforms and their white English faces. But I told you you'd turn against me."

"I thought you said you saw nothing," rejoined the Colonel severely.

"Nothing, till the night before I saw the lights in the shed. And then I saw those men in the bottom of the ditch at the foot of the wall, not twenty yards from the gate."

"What were they doing?"

"Stooping over something."

Colonel Fraser was silent for a moment.

"And you saw the lights on Monday?"

"Yes."

"Last night?"

"I didn't look, Colonel. I've seen too much. I don't want to see any more. Let them look whom it concerns. Drunken fool, is the best word they've got for me—you don't believe me, Colonel Fraser, any more'n Mr. Drummond," added the man, sulkily, after a pause, during which the Colonel sat staring at him in a way that was trying to the nerves. "But I'll swear it by all the oaths in the High Court—on the Koran, the Ganges or the Bible."

"The lights and the noises, Costello, are one thing—at least they come within the practical and the possible. They are capable of being traced and investigated; but I must say you've shaken my confidence in the story by introducing the supernatural into it. The most charitable explanation of the matter is to suppose that you were——"

"——drunk, of course."

"Overstrung was the word I was going to use," said the Colonel, quietly.

"Well, I've got no more to tell, Colonel," said the man looking up sullenly, "and if you've quite done with me I'll be glad to go."

"You haven't mentioned this—er—this new experience—about the four soldiers, Costello, to anyone?"

"Mr. Drummond said quite enough, sir, to keep me from opening my mouth to a living soul—and I wish now that I hadn't told you, Colonel. 'Tain't done me no good."

"It shall not do you any harm, Costello; and now, tell me this one thing more and then you may go. Did the light appear in any other part of the Rowney, or only in the shed?"

"Only in the shed."

"Thanks, I think that will do," and Dick Costello left the Colonel's quarters smarting under the conviction that in all Agra there was no more deeply injured man.

* * * * * *

"What does Mr. Drummond say to it now—eh? Drunken Dick's scored off him nicely. Reckon he don't feel quite so big as he did; and the military aren't sorry."

"It's a fair take-in, old man, I own; and it's made somebody look as if it hasn't agreed with him. But then, I think it's rather something of a 'let-down' for a good many of us, ain't it?"

The speakers were Teddy Joyce of the Revenue Department and Lieutenant Batson of the Bengal Artillery. The place was the great marble-flagged Square of the old Palace; the time, evening; the occasion, a tea party given by Mrs. Cubitt, the hostess of the evening, already a week old, when the rumour of lights at the Delhi Gate had first been whispered in the Square.

"Have they found who put the shed up?" inquired the lady, handing the Lieutenant a cup of tea.

"No and never will. They'll never be any wiser than they are to-day."

"And what have they discovered?" asked pretty Miss Nellie, eager for the story which ought to be at the back of the mystery.

"Nothing, absolutely nothing."

The party forming Mrs. Cubitt's social group on the marble flags of the Pearl Zenana, stared blankly at the speaker.

"But, I say, old man!" said Joyce "the shed, hang it all!—that couldn't have been put up without hands. That was substantial enough, anyhow. Surely the engineers know who knocked that together."

Lieutenant Batson shrugged his shoulders.

"Ask 'em," he said ironically. "I reckon Drunken Dick's given the whole garrison a pill to swallow that they can't digest.

"You've read the story of Jonah's gourd? Well, that's the story of this shed. There was a shed in the Rowney one morning; there was none there when the men knocked off in the evening before. It had sprung up during the night.

"Fact, my boy; you needn't look so incredulous. We had hundreds of fellows at work in the Rowney—natives most of 'em. Nobody made it his business to inquire about the shed; and now everybody denies all knowledge of it whatever.

"Cotton and Fraser, being military men, don't try to juggle with the facts. They honestly admit themselves beaten. But it ain't satisfactory by a long chalk."

"They'll never believe it at home," murmured Mrs. Cubitt, meditatively.

"I don't fancy any of us would venture to tell the tale in England," said the Lieutenant, "but I've got all the details if ever I feel the 'call.' I can go one better than most, for I saw the men with my own eyes."

Nellie looked at him, speechless with awe and wonder.

"Yes," he continued, "I did. And nothing, I think, that's hid in the future can beat, for me, the experience of last night.

"The Colonel, you know," he said, addressing Mrs. Cubitt, "posted a trustworthy sentry below the window in the Delhi Gate, with instructions to watch the shed, and if he saw a light in it, to fire.

"Not a sound broke the stillness of the Rowney. But about 12.30 he saw a shadowy form emerge from the shelter of the wall, creep along the ditch and enter the shed. The next moment a light shone through the cracks in the boards, and from a small aperture near the roof which served for a window. A minute later the sentry challenged and fired.

"In the morning the shed was searched. The shot had smashed a water-jar which had stood in a corner; but of the visitor there was no trace, nor of the lamp, nor of any means of procuring a light.

"The light disappeared the moment the man fired. The figure he saw no more. The next night the Colonel posted two men at the gate, one being a corporal. There was light enough in the sky to distinguish objects at a short distance.

"Soon after twelve, the men became aware that two figures were moving rapidly and noiselessly along the line of the wall in the direction of the shed. The corporal could see them with greater distinctness than the private; and he says they wore the uniform of the British Line before Waterloo. They entered the shed together, and almost immediately the light appeared. The shed seemed to fill suddenly with a strong, white light. The corporal challenged.

"There was no reply, and both fired.

"But when the shed was searched in the morning, it was drawn blank. There was nothing that would help to elucidate the mystery that had gathered round that rough structure in the Rowney which had been erected by some person or persons unknown. Only, the water-jar, which had been smashed on the previous night, had been replaced by another.

"The light vanished as soon as the shot swere fired; repeating in this, its behaviour on the first occasion.

"'But there should be four,' said the Colonel with as ghastly grin when the corporal made his report. The story which has been told for nearly fifty years, says that four soldiers went into the vaults to hunt for hid treasure, and never came out again—which,' said he 'I think is not at all improbable, considering the number of galleries and passages they would have to traverse. Go and find the other two.'

"It was said in a joke, but when the sergeant told him at ten o'clock the same night that he was going to take charge himself of the post at the Delhi Gate, the Colonel said:

"'I needn't tell you, sergeant, how anxious I am to get this matter rid up. It's all over the fort, and the Lieutenant-Govenor isn't half pleased about it.'

"There were four men on duty that night at the gate; the sergeant, a corporal, and two privates. The history of the two previous nights was repeated, save that on this occasion the number of figures which entered the shed was increased by one. Number three had turned up.

"In the morning the Colonel directed me to have a sergeant's file ready at ten p.m., and he would go with them himself to the Gate and surround the shed directly the figures had entered it.

"At ten precisely we drew up in the shadow of the great Gate; but the Colonel had been sent for by Mr. Colvin and the command devolved upon me. I had merely to carry out the Colonel's instructions.

"It was a clear night, and we could see everything distinctly. We could almost count the boards in the shed.

"At half past twelve exactly, by my watch, four figures came out of the wall below the Jehangiree Mahal and made direc ly for the shed. They were clad in the old British uniform of the Line, and moved like skirmishers going into action. They moved without noise, and so quickly that before I could get my men together, they had gained the hut. Before we had gone a dozen steps the light shone out. Every man in the little company saw it. There was nothing ghostly about it. It seemed to come from a powerful lamp, fitted probably with an Argand burner.

"The four dark silent figures, creeping with bent backs, swiftly and stealthily through the gloomy void of the great ditch, had given the affair a certain touch of the uncanny; but in the light which shone from the shed, there was no suggestion of the weird and the supernatural.

"I had posted the men, three on each side, and was just creeping up myself to take a peep through the chinks in the boards, when suddenly, without sign or sound, the light went out. It was a queer experience.

"'Fire!' I cried, springing back, and on the instant, twelve shots riddled the shed from end to end.

"We remained on the ground till dawn, when the Colonel and Mr. Drummond came down, and under their direction the shed was removed. There was nothing in it but the water-jar aforesaid.

"How any living thing could have escaped the storm of balls which rained through it I cannot explain, any more than I can say how it was we found no trace of lamp or lighter.

"The ground was dug away all round for a depth of three feet; but nothing was discovered that would indicate a concealed passage, or, indeed, any means by which exit could have been found from the Rowney or concealment within it."

As Lieutenant Batson ceased speaking, the gun from the bastion warned the little crowd in the Square that the hour for retiring—nine o'clock—had arrived, and slowly the social gathering began to break up.

The mystery of the lights at the Delhi Gate, like so many other incidents connected with the Great Sepoy Mutiny, remains a mystery still.

They were never seen after the removal of the shed.

THE HOUSE OF THE LIGHTED WINDOWS.

A Story of 1860.

That voyage is memorable to me, not only for the confidence the Government showed in thus employing me, but also for a melancholy circumstance connected with it which caused me many hours of fruitless regret—I may say, almost of remorse. The negotiation was without good result; I speak of it because it involved me in something of an adventure, and also because my conscience is not at ease to this day for the thoughtlessness into which I was led.

The schooner was no sooner under way than I had reason to retire to my state-room, for we laboured from the very first with a heavy sea.

However, when not too unwell to appear with my companions, I found them not unpleasant fellows.

The captain was a cautious old fellow with little to say and with a rather disconcerting way of shutting up one eye, and making long and silent observations of whoever happened to attract his attention by addressing him. The mate informed me that this habit was contracted from his gazing many hours at a time through a greenish-brass spyglass which was his constant companion.

As for the mate, I must say that I took quite a fancy to him. He was an extremely agreeable young Irishman, though saucy and sadly given to flattery, but with an unusual amount of quickness and discernment; for he said to me one evening, as we beguiled the time with cards:

"Is it in the interest of the Government that ye're making this voyage?"

"That it is, Mr. Kilgore," said I. "And it's very important that we don't go to pieces in the meantime," for the ship was dancing to a lively tune.

"That's just what I was going to say," he answered, with a laugh. "I have no great objections to getting into port with a whole skin mesilf."

"You seamen take it very well, sir," said I, with an attempt at cheerfulness, "but I am what you would call a land-lubber, eh?"

"You haven't extraordinary good sea-legs, and that's a fact," said the mate.

"Yes," said I, returning to the orignal subject, "if my papers do not arrive when due, important complications may arise."

"Be jabers, if we'd known that, we'd have been shy of taking ye on board. It's a great responsibility to drown a plenipotenteeary."

I will not say but that I was uneasy, especially when a lurch of the ship sent the cards flying about the room. But when I had recovered myself, I stared sternly at my companion. There was such a twinkle in his knowing turn-up nose—I will say, before I forget it, that all the power of expression of his face seemed to be concentrated in that organ—that if I were not inclined to pity him for his tragic end, I might doubt if he held quite a respectful attitude toward a man of my position, not to mention the august matters of State with which I was entrusted.

However, I took no further notice of his remark than to assume towards him a more distant manner; though I was really concerned to know if the storm were in truth more than ordinarily dangerous in the experienced eye of a seaman.

"I presume," said I, "I presume that such a tempest as this is a very frequent occurence at sea?"

"Sure, and that's very true. You would be surprised to know how many vessels go down in a year."

"You take it very coolly, sir," said I.

"That I don't, I assure ye," he replied, though he smiled pleasantly.

"May I inquire the cause of these storms?" I asked, to shift the disagreeable subject.

"Bedad, there's a difference of opinion. The captain will tell ye that it's the beginning of the equinox, but the men maintain that it's owing to the troubled spirits of seafaring men who have walked the plank into these waters or swung from the yard-arm of pirate vessels while rounding this point."

"Then we're keeping close along the shore?" I asked, with some relief.

"That's just what troubles the men, Mr. Ogilvie," returned the mate. "They'd rather be any number of leagues out at sea than hugging this coast."

"Is it indeed so dangerous?" I cried. "Rocks and breakers, eh?"

"Why, no; it's not that. It's because of an uncommon ghostly house by the shore. It's deserted, and has an ill name; for any dark night ye may see the windows lighted up in a way that is enough to send a ship to perdition at the sight of it. It stands on a cape and commands a view of the sea in all directions. I'll be happy to show ye the lights if ye have no objections to going aloft and getting wet."

I declined the offer, for I had extreme objections to "going aloft and getting wet."

The mate, I take it, would have entertained me all night with his yarns, had not the increasing storm demanded his attention.

All hands being on deck, I was left alone below. The rest of the evening was spent in complete misery, for the wind blew a most terrific gale. What earlier in the evening I had called a storm was nothing in comparison with this that we were having now. It was impossible to remain upright, and I wonder that I escaped with a sound bone in my body.

"I will never," said I, "set foot on a ship again," and I am not ashamed to say that I got upon my knees and said my prayers; for in my day all public men were religious men.

The mate appeared at my state-room door a little later. He was wringing wet and very cheerful.

"I'm afraid your papers won't come jue, Mr. Ogilvie," he said, "for the ship's sprung a leak."

"For Heaven's sake, my dear fellow, don't desert me," said I.

"By me sowl," began the Irishman, composedly, but the captain, passing the door with his valuables, called out.

"Mr. Ogilvie," said he, "we'll have to take to the boats, for the ship's in a bad condition."

I do not know how I got on deck. The first I remember is finding myself in a boat with the mate giving me brandy.

I will not deny that I was prodigiously afraid; I can stand most dangers on dry land, but may I be preserved from the sea!

We learnt afterward, when the bodies were washed ashore, that our companions in the other boats had no such luck as we; they must have capsized at the outset, and it's a miracle to me that we landed as successfully as we did.

We were carried far beyond the point where the men desired to disembark. I was in no condition to observe their dissatisfaction until after we were safe ashore, when I could not but notice that they showed much less delight in their deliverance than might have been expected. It made no odds to me where we landed, so that my feet felt the firm earth again.

When I had recovered myself sufficiently—though the mate said I was still "uncommon groggy" on my feet—I was very much for seeking shelter for the rest of the night, as the wind chilled me to the bone. But the men were standing in groups whispering to each other as though in fear of some danger. It seemed that we had landed within but a few yards of the mysterious house of the lighted windows.

The men declared that there was no sign of habitation for miles round, and there we stood in the thick darkness with the sea rushing up to our feet on one side, and with the house duskily looming on the other. I might have fancied that we were indeed "between the devil and the deep sea" had I not been taken up with such commonplace discomforts as a chilly skin.

I did not wonder at the men's reluctance to land on such a coast, though I may say that I saw nothing unusual about the windows of the house. But when the clouds were blown from the face of the moon, about as ill-looking a pile was disclosed as ever I wished to see, and I made no doubt that the men had been influenced by its dreary air to imagine the unusual appearances of which the mate had spoken.

It was an immense rough-cast stone house, with the plaster coming off in spots, as though an eruption had broken out upon the old building. Originally it could not have stood so close down to the water, but at the time when I saw it, the steps and the posts which supported the floor of the front verandah were under water during high tides and storms; and the whole building seemed to be gradually sinking into the sand, which at the sides and back came nearly up to the lowest windows.

Indeed, the foundations were beginning to be so eaten away that the walls had a tipsy, dangerous look, as if they had not long to stand, and it is not possible that the house could have withstood to the present day this steady encroachment of the waters and the sand.

There was one curious circumstance connected with the house which must have added to its bad reputation. It stood in such a position that the débris of the ocean, floating remains of wrecks, the offal of passing vessels, was apt to collect during high water under the broad verandah which faced the sea.

Indeed, the next day we were shocked to find the body of one of the ship's company from the capsized boat wedged under the steps, and I shuddered to think of how much might be revealed if the sand under that porch should be examined.

Many of these remarks I am making from information gathered later, for at the time I was less concerned about the character of the house than about my chattering teeth, so that I scoffed at the fears of my companions and urged them to join with me in taking possession of the building.

The men drew back, and I noticed that my merry friend, the mate, made himself exceedingly small. The captain had no thoughts but for his ship.

"Where are we to spend the night?" said I.

"Not in that house," muttered one of the men. "It's haunted."

"Haunted or not," I said, quite myself again, "I'm not going to stay here in the cold."

"But I don't like the looks of the house mesilf," said the mate.

"You're surely never afraid of a lonely house, Mr. Kilgore!" exclaimed I, sarcastically. I fancied that I had hold of his weak point.

"I afraid? Bedad, and that don't come very well from yourself, Mr. Ogilvie." Then he turned blusteringly to the men: "Come on, ye blithering idjits; but if ye're afraid, stay where ye are and welcome." And with a great show of unconcern he followed my lead.

Most of the men preferred the open air, though two or three from pure shame accompanied us to the house. The captain lingered behind; to do him justice it was rather to see the last of his ship than for fear of the suspicious refuge which I had shamed the mate into sharing with me.

The house was completely empty; but in the first room we entered, there was a broad fire-place which the men filled with rotten wood from the gaping windows and the wainscoting, and we soon had a roaring fire and a roomful of monstrous shadows. Mr. Kilgore had recourse to his brandy bottle for comfort, but anathematised me softly when he found that I had near emptied it while in the boat. The men sat round the fire on their heels and talked noisily to keep up their spirits.

For my part, I was much impressed by the sounds of the storm. The old house groaned and creaked in the tempest, and at each large gust I felt sure it was coming down about our ears. We were almost in the midst of the uproar of the sea; I could scarce believe that it was on land that I stood when I heard the intermittent splash of the water over the verandah. Sometimes an unusually large wave would be broken into foam against the front door, and the water leaked and dripped unceasingly in the cellar.

As long as the storm lasted the men were in an exhilarated condition and passed the time in relating the most monstrous yarns about former shipwrecks. I was very much pleased with their candour in admitting their fear during these experiences.

"I suppose it takes only such uncommonly stiff gentlemen as Mr. Kilgore to go through such an adventure as to-night's without turning a hair," I remarked.

"Ah, and ye're having fun at my expense after having near devoured me brandy bottle," said he.

"I'll restore your brandy bottle fourfold," I answered, "if you'll be so kind as to restore me to my friends."

"But I can't resthore the peace of the world if your papers don't arrive at their desteenation, I fancy," said the mate.

"Oh, I did not wish to give the impression that the peace of the world will be endangered, but that important complications may arise," I replied.

The time thus passed in pleasant conversation between the mate and myself; but as the storm abated, I noticed that the men became depressed and silent, muttering to themselves more than once that they wished themselves "safe at sea."

"But what reason have you to suppose that these appearances in the windows have a supernatural origin?" I asked.

"There's been more than one murder done here in Capta n Kidd's time which isn't over comfortable to talk of now," said one of the men.

"Ye may save your breath," said the mate. "Mr. Ogilvie has no belief in ghosts. By Jove, though, if he'd seen the lights himself, he sing a different chune."

"And what think you your hardy mariners would say if they came unexpectedly on our lights? If they would be but hardy enough to take a look in at the window, sure they'd see some pretty substantial ghosts."

As we were speaking, the captain entered; he was noticeably pale, and I could not repress a feeling of pity for him.

"Ah, sir," said I, "the poor ship is gone at last, is it?"

"Yes, it is gone long since! But that is no matter now.

"Have any of you been upstairs? No? But there was a light in the room above you; it appeared a short time and then went out."

The men were terror-stricken at this intelligence, but I had begun to expostulate when my mouth was summarily closed.

Directly overhead, cutting my words short, came one loud thump, followed by no reverberations or echoes or anything that could linger in the ear to reassure one that there had been a sound at all. I could almost have believed that I had fancied it, had I not seen the eyes of the men starting with fear.

"What was that?" I asked sharply.

The mate crossed himself and moved toward the door where the other men pushed past him. I myself had recovered instantly; I believe that I said somewhere that I am not easily frightened except at sea, but I ought not to attribute courage to myself as the sole cause for my coolness at such a time; for I felt conscious of a very strong desire to show these men that I was not so timorous a creature as by my behaviour on the ship and on the boat they may have been led to suppose.

"Something has blown down upstairs, and, for my part, I will stay where I am," said I.

My explanation seemed so reasonable that the men paused and strained their ears. The captain shut his superfluous eye and inspected me, but I was too much interested in the discomfort of the mate to heed his stare.

"Oh, fie, Mr. Kilgore," I said, "you, a seaman, are not scared at a bit of wind!"

It still clung to me that he had enjoyed my terror at sea; but before the night was over, I regretted my idle words.

"The mon does not live that could throw fear in me face and not answer for it, Mr. Ogilvie!" he said, flashing round at me, though he was uncommonly white about the gills as he spoke.

"I never refuse to answer for my words, sir," said I, "though I am willing to overlook a little heat in youth."

"Sir, will ye take back what ye said, then? You have as good as called me a coward twice this night," said the mate.

"Indeed, sir—" I began, with some haughtiness; but the captain interrupted me.

"Gentlemen, gentlemen!" he cried, "you are surely not going to make a quarrel out of a jest! Mr. Ogilvie, I thought you a man of sense."

"I have no wish to quarrel with the young man," I answered, somewhat abashed, "indeed, he showed himself a brave gentleman during the storm, and here's my hand to it, Mr. Kilgore."

We shook hands, and I have ever been thankful that our last words were those of friendship.

"And now to clear up the mystery of these sights and sounds," he said, going to the door again. "If ye say the word, faith, I'll go up and investeegate."

"Not alone, at any rate," I said; "if you have no objections, I'll accompany you."

But he was inclined to take offence at this, and persisted in going alone; he was bound to vindicate his honour, he said.

I am sure he was afraid, and indeed it was no great discredit to him, for I think he feared nothing in the universe, so long as it remained in the flesh. He put a bold face upon it, however, and started on his little tour of discovery.

We waited and listened to the sound of his footsteps on the stairs and along the corridor. We heard him pause at the door of the room above us, cross the threshold and take several steps forward, his heels sounding sharp on the bare floor. There was a second of silence and then came a most terrific, deadened blow, the force of which rattled the rotten casements and jarred the walls. This was followed, after another pause, by a scraping, dragging sound which made the flesh creep.

The men made for the door, and I was terribly moved myself; indeed, my throat contracted so that I could scarce swallow. But there was one thought that did not leave me for a moment I knew that the young mate had never been up there alone with that fiendish noise were it not for me.

"Men," I said, "I am going up there to see what this means, and if you are true men, you will follow me."

They were not cowards, for though it went sorely against the grain, they accompanied me up the stairs and along the corridor, but not one of them—not even the captain—would enter the room.

We called the mate by name, but he made no answer, and we stood shivering and wondering in the doorway, with the wind from the two broken windows, looking out on the sea, blowing strangely in our faces. I confess to having had a strong curiosity as to the cause of the strange noises; yet I vow that nothing but my anxiety about the mate would have induced me to enter the room.

As it was, I stepped into it, calling loudly; there was still no answer but the moan of the lulling winds, which suddenly caught the door behind me and slammed it violently between me and my companions. It was rather of a shock to me, in my frame of mind, and you may fancy how I felt, when I discovered that the door had a spring lock attached to it, and that I was shut in with I knew not what.

"Confound it, I'm locked in!" I cried. "Can't you men do something to open the door?"

We rattled the knob furiously on both sides until someone suggested breaking the door in, and then I suddenly heard them clattering and stumbling down the stairs; they all went together, there was not a man of them would have gone by himself for a fortune.

It is wonderful how fear for someone else will check fear for one's self. The mate was still on my mind, and I put behind me this trouble of my own and took a step forward with a desire to investigate. My foot slipped, and I came near falling. I stooped to find the cause, and felt that the floor was wet with a kind of slime. The touch of it was so disgusting that my gorge rose.

Feeling about to find whence it came, I discovered it to be a track like that of a colossal snail, which I followed on my hands and knees with a determination that I cannot account for. It brought me to the windows, where I became aware, in the darkness, of a darker mass directly before me, and as I was light-headed and reckless by this time, I put out my hand to touch it. The remembrance sickens me to this day; for I had put it into what seemed an enormous mouth, warm, wet and with teeth!

You may be sure that I withdrew my hand in less time than it takes to tell, and though I heard the men breaking down the door and calling my name, my mind was a perfect blank, except for the thought of the wet trail and that great mouth laughing at me in the darkness. If the object had moved I should have gone clean distracted at once. But it remained still, and at last the door fell in, and the captain ran forward, lighting the way with a blazing piece of wood.

Then I saw what my monster was, and some of the men swore and others prayed. It was the mate, with his throat cut almost clean through, with a trail of blood nearly to the door—and I had put my hand into the wound. He was lying on the floor with his feet on the window-seat.

"Heavens, this is no work of a spirit!" said the captain; and we all agreed that it was not.

Further investigation proved beyond a doubt that we had fallen upon a smuggler's retreat, for the room was filled with casks of rum and with boxes of various importations. The murderers had made a complete escape.

We found the men who had remained outside much excited; they had seen figures escaping from the windows and crawling down over the verandah, but their superstitious fears prevented them giving chase.

The peculiar position of the dead mate revealed that for same reason—probably that of keeping alive these convenient superstitions—the murderers had intended making off with the body, but found as they got out of the windows that it interfered with a hasty retreat.

I have never had the pleasure of seeing them hanged, but not long afterward a gang of contrabandists fell into the clutches of the law, for which I thanked Heaven.

I cannot express the satisfaction I felt in leaving behind me that blotched and drunken house with its ghosts of many crimes, sunning itself high and dry under the beautiful sky of the next morning. The verandah was covered with shells and pretty rippling patterns of sand; and though the sea still heaved roughly, it kept at a respectful distance.

I never again saw the captain after we parted; I heard, however, that it was not long before he was in possession of another schooner which did not leak. As for my papers, I was shocked to discover that I had left them on board when the ship foundered.

However, a merciful Providence has preserved our Government from harm and I was exonerated from all blame in connection with the loss. It has frequently come to me that those who opposed the measures adopted by the administration, had a hand in my making sail in a leaky vessel in order to break off the negotiations. I'll mention no names, but I have my suspicions.

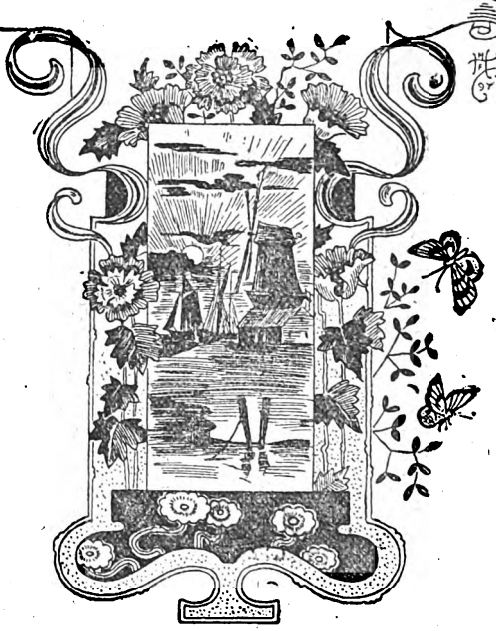
CHANGING THE BRAND.



"I DON'T understand it at all, cap'n."

Howard said it emphatically.

He was a tall, lanky man, and he leant his elbow familiarly upon the pommel of the saddle as he talked with the young owner of the Walong River farm.

Henry Penryn, the proprietor, relied no little upon the judgment and experience of Howard, and the subject of their present discussion was a serious one.

"Come, now; stock doesn't disappear, even in the bush without human agency," Penryn said reflectively. "According to the books, more than 500 head have disappeared—totally evaporated, so to speak—since last reckoning. I don't know what will happen. The leakage must stop, or I shall have to give up the business."

"Looks like there were thieves at work, don't it?"

Penryn looked at him without reply. His silence evidently exasperated his man.

"Look here," he exclaimed. He used the butt end of his whip to draw in the red dirt of the trail the figure used in the Walong River farm as a brand, thus (——) a "lazy O" in their nomenclature.

With a horizontal stroke the O was converted into D.

"Sweet, pretty little trick, ain't it?" he said sarcastically.

"But how does he get 'em?" demanded Penryn; "that is, if he is the guilty party."

"Oh, he's guilty fast enough! I've seen many a man hung on less evidence in the old days."

They were speaking of M. Perriot, a young Frenchman who had been for a time dealing in sheep in their neighbourhood and was rapidly growing rich.

M. Perriot was a good-looking, besides being a wealthy, young Frenchman.

Penryn had met him several times—usually at Freemans station, which lay several miles from the Walong River farm.

Before M. Perriot had come into the country Penryn had been about the only young man visitor at the Freemans'.

The farmer's daughter, Josie, was the magnet which drew him. Nowadays he always found Perriot there before him.

That very afternoon Penryn, taking what he called his constitutional, saw before him the young lady with Perriot as her escort. They were well mounted, and his pony had all he could do to overtake the couple, and might not have done so but that they drew rein on the verge of a hill and sat contemplating what was going on below on the other slope, where Perriot had his little camp.

So interested were they in the sheep branding, that they did not notice Penryn till he was close upon them. After saluting Miss Freeman and exchanging a few grave words with Perriot, Penryn raised his hat again to the lady and trotted down the farther side of the hill.

As he went, however, he turned to Perriot, and said, as he pointed to the scene below them:

"I've heard of a man being hung for branding a lot of sheep like that. Times have changed, but it isn't a healthy occupation even now."

"What mean you?" spluttered Perriot.

But Miss Josie turned her back upon the Cornishman.

Penryn spurred his pony on and rode down into the midst of the rabble about the camp. The men saw him coming, and somebody recognised him. The branders huddled together and turned black looks upon him as he rode into their midst.

There was a sheep close to him with an old mark—a mark Penryn knew well.

The men gathered round the Englishman with threatening faces. He looked down upon them contemptuously.

"You know what this means," he said calmly. "This place will be too hot for you fellows—understand?"

He turned his pony about and rode out of the group. One man made a grab at his bridle rein, and Penryn raised his whip, and brought it down with stinging force across his face. Then he put spurs to his pony and rode off over the rise, expecting every instant to hear the report of guns behind him. But no volley followed him, and he passed over the crest of the rise unmolested. Miss Josie and her escort had disappeared.

"If the fool remains round her twenty-four hours, I won't answer for the consequences. There were sheep from runs other than mine in that lot."

He struck off for his own place in a different direction from that by which he had come. The country was wilder and more broken. There was a grove of stunted trees and a branch of the river in his path, and he stopped to give his pony an hour's rest.

He was still sitting by the side of the stream, his steed feeding a few yards away, when he saw a group of half a dozen or more horsemen on the other side of the brook. They forded the stream, and then, apparently catching sight of him, drew up in an excited, gesticulating group. Penryn was quick to recognise them as from Perriot's camp.

He sprang up, intending to get his horse and be prepared for whatever was to follow, but as he loosened the revolver in his belt he heard a hail behind him. Instantly the group of horsemen spurred up the incline towards him; but before he could turn round to see what new danger threatened him from the rear, four men sprang upon him from the bush.

Some of his enemies had made a flank movement and he was at their mercy. He was dragged to the ground, the chattering crowd at once surrounded and disarmed him, and he was bound with his own belt to a lightning riven stump on the edge of the grove.

Penryn believed his condition to be desperate indeed, but he would not show fear before his captors and laughed in their faces. At that, one—the fellow whom he had struck at the camp—lashed him twice across the cheek with his own whip, and the blood flowed from the gashes.

But even the pain of the wound did not cow him.

"Do you think you can kill me and go scot free?" he demanded. "You'll find your mistake. My boys will hunt you all over the colony. And all Perriot's money won't save you."

At that they drew aside to confer, while Penryn leant against the tree to which they had bound him, half fainting from loss of blood and the pain of the gashes on his face. He remembered with bitterness how Freeman's daughter had turned her back upon him when he accused Perriot of stealing his sheep.

The girl was evidently in love with the Frenchman, and in his despair the young Cornishman did not much care what these desperadoes did with him.

Suddenly his enemies ran for their horses and climbed helter-skelter into their saddles. Penryn, with his head hanging upon his breast, paid slight attention, but when the swift beat of horses' hoofs smote his ear he wondered vaguely if more of Perriot's men were coming.

He raised his head.

The men were crossing the stream again, plying spur and lash as they went. One of them, the man who had already struck him, turned in his saddle and fired at the figure tied to the tree, but the bullet flew wide of its mark.

The pounding of hoofs increased, and pouring over a neighbouring rise came another body of men.

Penryn looked again and recognised Howard at their head. He cried aloud to him and then hung limp upon his bonds.

He came to himself again in a moment.

Howard had him lying upon the grass, and he found himself choking over some of "the real stuff," which the man had forced between his lips.

"We were just in time, by Heaven!" exclaimed Howard. "How d'you feel now?"

"Better," said Penryn, sitting up.

"Here, lemme bind that up," said the man, muffling the lower part of his employer's face in a linen handkerchief. "Them fellers had better get off as fast as they can," he pursued. "The boys are hot after 'em an' the whole place will be buzzin' about their ears afore mornin'."

"How did you know about it?" asked Penryn.

"Freeman's gal rid over an' told me how you was down in Perriot's camp. Plucky gal she is! nearly rid her hoss to death bringing th' news. Hey, where yer goin'?" he broke off to ask, as Penryn staggered to his feet and made for his horse.

"Don't suppose I'm going to stay here all night, do you?" demanded his employer, testily.

"S'pose not. You'd better go home. I'm goin' to ride on arter the boys."

"All right. I'll go home," said Penryn, but he started his horse at a canter in an entirely different direction.

Howard tightened his saddle girth before he remounted, chuckling the while. "He'll get there 'fore the gal does if he keeps up that gait," he said. "Expec' she'll be wearin' the 'lazy C' brand 'fore long an' Walong River farm 'll be gettin' a mistress."

Then he vaulted into his saddle and rode off.

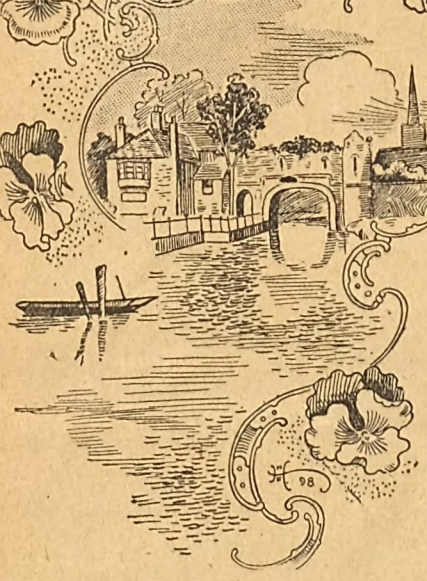
ONE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD.



Two passengers left the train at Barton one pleasant afternoon in May. One was a tall, slender young man, with a pleasant face, frank blue eyes, and fair hair and moustache; the other, a young girl, dressed very plainly in grey serge, and wearing a thick brown veil which entirely concealed her face.

Her figure was so graceful, and showed to such admirable advantage in the close-fitting dress, that the young man looked at her with very evident admiration in his eyes as he passed her on his way to the steps.

His look was not returned. The girl's eyes were riveted on a large placard which was tacked up on the door of the waiting-room, announcing that £100 reward was offered for the apprehension of the murderer of one Rachel Taylor, on April 23rd. All communications were to be addressed to Holmes and Clifford, solicitors.

"It does not seem possible!" muttered the girl. "My old friend, poor soul! What a sad end to her strange, lonely life!"

Then she turned as the station-master came near, and asked him if he could direct her to the house of Mr. Derwent.

"It's 'bout a mile from here," he answered, "perhaps a little more. Keep on up the road till you come to a lane on your right. Turn down that, an' Derwent's is the first house you come to. Are you goin' to stop there?" he asked, with the curiosity which a monotonous country life is apt to engender.

"Yes; I am Mr. Derwent's niece," answered the girl, quietly, "and if you can manage to have my luggage sent up to Mr. Derwent's, I shall be very much obliged."

He promised that the luggage should follow her almost immediately, and Hester Derwent left the station and took the road he had indicated as leading to her uncle's house.

A situation more lonely than that of her future home could scarcely be imagined. The house stood a long distance from the road, and was completely surrounded by trees and shrubs. It was a low, six-roomed cottage with a slanting roof and small dormer windows.

About the whole place there was a look of such ruin and decay, that Hester's heart sank within her as she unlatched the gate and walked up the weed-grown path.

She had known very little of her uncle, and had not seen him for eight years; but she had imagined him such a man as her dear father had been, and was entirely unprepared to find him living in such a desolate abode.

The young girl's knock on the worm-eaten door was answered, when her patience was almost at an end, by an old wizened-faced woman, who appeared to find it extremely difficult to comprehend that the handsome young lady on the steps was her master's niece.

But she consented to admit her, and after directing her to knock on the door of a room to the right, hobbled away into the kitchen again to resume her culinary operations.

"Come in," said a clear, manly voice, as Hester knocked timidly, and she pushed open the door and found herself face to face with the young man she had seen at the station.

"I was told that Mr. Derwent——" she began.

"Mr. Derwent went upstairs a moment ago," interrupted the young man, kindly, seeing her hesitation and changing colour. "He will be back very soon. Won't you sit down? Let me introduce myself. My name is Wilfred Clifford, and——"

"Wilfred Clifford!" interrupted Hester. "And you don't know me? You don't remember Hester Derwent?"

"Is it possible!" exclaimed Wilfred, seizing both her hands in a warm grasp. "And why are you here? I thought you were at school still."

Digitized by Google

"I have been in a boarding-school for eight years," said Hester. "Uncle sent me there when father died. Scarlet fever broke out in the school, and all those who could leave left at once. I did not take time even to telegraph to uncle. I knew that he was keeping house here, and that my coming a few weeks sooner than he expected would probably make no difference to him. But I did not think to find him in such a place as this."

"Certainly it is not a proper home for you, Hester," said Wilfred, tenderly. "Such ruin and decay may suit your poor old uncle, but you deserve something different."

"I must make the best of it since I have no other relative in the world," said Hester. "I will try to lighten the gloom. Do you remember what a lovely home we had, Wilfred? And to think your poor aunt should have met such a terrible death! I knew nothing about it until I saw the placard at the station."

"It was a brutal murder," said Wilfred, his handsome face darkening perceptibly. "You know she would never trust her money and valuables in the bank. She thought them safer in her own care, and hid them away where she imagined no one would ever discover them. She once showed me a box nearly full of rings, bracelets, stones of great value, and heavy gold chains. Most of them were heirlooms in her family, and had descended to her from many generations. But she never told me where she kept them, and I never asked.

"I often tried to convince her that they would be safer in the bank; but she would not listen to me.

"She was found on the floor of her bedroom, with her head almost severed from her body. In her desk was her will, in which she left all her property to me, and a letter in which she told me that there was a false floor to the closet in her room, and on lifting that up I should find the box containing the jewels and a canvas bag full of gold pieces. Of course, neither box nor bag was to be found, and, with the exception of the house and ground, I am as poor as ever."

"Has no clue been discovered yet?" asked Hester.

"None whatever. The matter is shrouded in the deepest mystery. But my partner, Albert Holmes, is working like a tiger in the case. He is as shrewd and sharp a fellow as I ever met, and I have faith that he will unearth the villains yet. It was so unfortunate that he was not at home on the night of the murder."

At this moment the door opened to admit Mr. Derwent, an old man, with stooping shoulders, an uncertain gait, and long white hair, which hung over his coat-collar. So much greyer, older and weaker did he look than when Hester had seen him last, that she scarcely recognised him.

He seemed greatly surprised to see her, and it appeared to Hester, who was exceedingly sensitive, that he was annoyed and a little distressed by her arrival.

He said very little, however, but, turning to Clifford, gave him a small package, directing him to give it to Mr. Holmes as soon as possible.

"I suppose you would not care to remain all night?" he added.

"I must not even think of it," said Wilfred, "much as I would enjoy talking over old times with Hester. But at any time Holmes may discover some clue to the murderers, and I must be on hand to consult with him if necessary. I should not have left town to-day for even the few hours that it takes to make a trip here, but Holmes could not possibly get off, as he had a case in court, and he wouldn't trust his letter to you by post. He seemed anxious to have it put into your hands without delay, so I offered to run down with it."

It seemed to Hester as if a peculiar expression, ironical and a little sad, rested on her uncle's face as Wilfred spoke, but it was gone in an instant, and he shook hands cordially with his visitor as he bade him good-bye.

"I will come down again, Hester," the young man said in parting from her, "and try not to feel lonely."

But as time passed Hester grew very lonely indeed. From morning to night she was thrown on her own resources for amusement and occupation. Her uncle appeared only at meals. All day long he remained shut up in a little room he called his study, though Hester could not imagine what he found to employ him there; for the room contained no books, and was furnished with only a small, deep desk, a table, and three chairs.

Wilfred Clifford kept his promise, and came occasionally to see Hester, and she looked forward to his visit as a traveller in the desert looks forward to reaching the water which will give new life to his frame. But it seemed to the poor girl as if her uncle was annoyed by Wilfred's coming, and more than once he refused to see him at all, so that her joy in the presence of her old friend was not unmixed with pain.

She saw very plainly that Wilfred was learning to love her, and she knew that he was becoming dearer to her every day; and she dreaded the coming of the time when her uncle must learn this, so sure was she that he would refuse his consent to her marriage.

She had been several weeks at the cottage before she saw Mr. Holmes. One morning her uncle announced that the lawyer would be with them that evening, and that dinner must be put off until the arrival of the late train.

"As he comes to see me entirely on businses, you need not feel obliged to remain with us," said the old man. "He is good enough to come to me, instead of requiring me to go to him. We shall be occupied in the study until late, looking over—some—papers, and you'd better go to bed early, my dear."

"Yes, uncle," said Hester, quietly.

"It may be that I shall have to go abroad for a time," continued the old man, a little hesitatingly. "But it is not certain. Holmes will decide for me to-night: so you need not worry yet, Hester."

"I did not know that your business ever took you abroad, uncle," said Hester. "But I think the trip would benefit your health. You don't look well, and every night I hear you moaning in your sleep. Last night you screamed aloud several times. It really frightened me. Don't you think you ought to see a doctor, uncle?"

"No, no," said the old man, rising from his seat and moving towards the door. "I'm not ill, Hester—I'm only tired; and sometimes I have the nightmare."

He left the room, and Hester, wondering at his strange, nervous manner, resumed her occupation of clearing the breakfast table, which she had ceased in order to more closely observe her uncle.

She was in her room when Mr. Holmes arrived, and overheard his greeting to her uncle, who opened the hall door to admit him.

"So you expected me? You received my note, then? I think we can push matters now without any trouble."

"Hush!" said Mr. Derwent, tremulously. "My niece may hear you."

"Why the deuce do you have a niece, I'd like to know?" said Holmes, as he entered.

Hester wondered what kind of a man Wilfred's partner could be to talk so roughly to an old man and she was predisposed to dislike him.

But she speedily forgot her half-formed prejudice when she met him an hour later at the dinner table. His appearance was prepossessing.

He was a handsome man, with keen, dark eyes, an olive complexion, regular features, and a long, black moustache, which he habitually caressed as he talked.

Though dignified in manner, he was as gracious as possible with Hester, who was young enough to be considerably flattered by the notice he took of her, and the delicate compliments he contrived to pay her before the meal was over.

As they rose from the table he took her hand and gave it an unmistakable pressure, saying that, as he should probably not see her again, he would wish her good-bye.

"I sometimes think your uncle is a little—peculiar," said Holmes, hesitating over the last word, as Derwent left the room.

"I often wonder if Miss Taylor's death had anything to do with the singular change which has come over him since I last saw him," said Hester. "They were great friends when we all lived in that part, and I know he thought very seriously once of marrying her. I remember hearing my father speak of it, and say that the old lady was more than willing. Was not her death horrible? But has no clue to the murderers been found?"

"Not yet," said Holmes. "And still—may I tell you something in confidence? I think, perhaps, you ought to know it."

"Please tell me," said Hester. "If it is anything about the murder, I shall certainly take a deep interest in it. When Mr. Clifford is here we talk of very little else."

"Ah!" with a peculiar look which made the blood rush to her cheeks. "I fancy I could find other objects of interest. And, if what I suspect has any foundation, Clifford ought to avoid the subject of his aunt's death."

"What do you mean?" asked Hester, turning pale at his significant tone,

"Only that Wilfred Clifford was tired of waiting for his old aunt's money; that he, of all people, ought to have known—had a better chance to know—where the property was secreted, and——"

"Stop!" interrupted Hester, trembling. "I will not listen to any more. You wrong him by your suspicions. They are unfounded. He was away—that can be proved."

"Perhaps so," said Holmes, with a shrug of his shoulders. "I hope so, certainly. I am sorry I gave you even a hint of my suspicions. I had no idea, of course, that you would resent my confidence." And with a smile and a bow he left the room.

Hester went to her room and tried to think matters over calmly. She would not admit to herself that she was at all influenced by what Holmes had said of Wilfred, but, nevertheless, she was vaguely troubled and distressed.

The night was close and warm, and thinking that in her present condition of mind sleep would be impossible, she concluded to go down into the garden.

She descended the stairs as noiselessly as possible, so as not to disturb her uncle or Mr. Holmes, whose voice she could hear as she passed the study door, and gaining the garden, she sank down in the first seat she saw—a rustic bench under a cedar tree.

She was about to abandon herself to the quiet beauty of the night, and the fragrance of the flowers blooming about her, when she was startled by hearing a voice say:—

"Well, now that matter is settled, the sooner we go to work the better."

"I wish you could arrange to go," replied a voice that Hester recognised as her uncle's. "You always put the worst part on me."

"Do I?" with a sneer. "I scarcely think you took on your shoulders the worst part of that business we entered on last April."

"There's a great deal of risk in going——" began Mr. Derwent.

"Oh, drop the subject. You've got to go, and that ends it. I have explained my reasons until I am tired. Are you sure that niece of yours is in her room?"

"Oh, yes; I heard the clock strike eleven a few moments ago. She is always in bed by ten at the latest."

"We don't want any surprises. Where's the old woman?"

"She went home to stay all night."

"Good. Where's the key to the desk?"

At this juncture Hester turned round and found that she was sitting within two yards of the open window of the study, the shutters of which were closed, however. She did not rise, but remained motionless, half paralysed by what she had heard.

What could be this business upon which they were engaged, and which would be ruined by a surprise?

Turning the matter over in her mind, Hester at last determined to penetrate the mystery. It was not curiosity which urged her to decide thus. She was singularly free from any desire to possess herself unbidden of the secrets of others.

No, it was a feeling; which she could not smother, that something was going wrong in that room which merited detection.

Digitized by Google

For her own sake, she must know whether her uncle could be trusted with her welfare.

Softly she advanced to the window, and trembling in every limb, peered through a crack in the shutter. What a sight met her eyes!

As she looked she could scarcely repress a cry of astonishment.

On the table in the centre of the room lay a glittering heap of jewellery. Massive old silver, some of the pieces encrusted with precious gems; gold chains; rings; costly bracelets; sets of valuable stones; and a necklace, tiara, cross, and pin of diamonds.

A fortune was spread on that little table, a fortune which Hester felt sure did not belong to the two men in whose possession she saw it now.

With small instruments, both Derwent and Holmes were busily separating the diamonds and stones from their settings, and then pushing them into little heaps as they fell on the table.

To whom did this fortune belong?

Hester had little difficulty in determining this question.

A small canvas bag and a square, black box on the floor by the lawyer's chair gave her an unmistakable clue. She felt sure that she saw before her the murderers of Wilfred's aunt. And yet one of these men was her uncle—her father's brother—into whose care she had been committed eight years before!

What was her duty? What steps must she take, now that she had made this terrible discovery?

She stood at the window until the work within the room was completed. She saw Holmes fill a belt with stones and fasten it about her uncle's waist. She saw him take from a similar belt about his own body a handful of gold, which he gave to Mr. Derwent. She knew now why her uncle was going abroad. It was to dispose in perfect safety of the ill-gotten booty.

It was daylight when at length she sought her room again. But, though she undressed and lay down, she could not sleep. That was impossible with such a load on heart and brain.

She descended to breakfast, looking wan, pale, and haggard. She had not decided what course to pursue. She recoiled from the thought of exposing her uncle; but could she, in justice to either the living or the dead, remain silent?

Holmes had left early in order to catch the first train; she was spared the trial of meeting him again. But she found it impossible to preserve her composure, even before her uncle, who eyed her very sharply as she sat listlessly behind the coffee urn, but who made no comment on her want of appetite.

As they rose from the table Hester formed a sudden resolution. She found a longer silence unendurable. Approaching her uncle, she laid her hand on his arm.

"Uncle," she said, "last night I saw you in your study, and saw the work upon which you were engaged. How could you stain your hands with the blood of your old friend?"

Her voice was solemn and impressive, and as she spoke Henry Derwent turned fairly livid.

He staggered back against the wall like a man struck by a sudden blow.

"I did not do it—I never touched her," he gasped. "I was outside all the time. It was Holmes. I never knew she was murdered until I saw it in the papers. He did not tell me. He kept it from me as long as he could. Hester, I swear to you, I thought it was only a robbery at first. But I knew it would come to light. I told Holmes that Clifford would find out some day."

His voice had risen to a shriek. He was trembling like a leaf in a storm.

"Why did you take the money and jewels, uncle? Why help to defraud the innocent?" asked Hester sternly.

"He—he made me," gasped the old man. "He had a hold over me. I couldn't help it."

He dropped into a chair, and, entirely overcome, let his head fall on his breast and burst into tears.

"But this property must be restored, uncle. It must be given to Wilfred Clifford. You must not keep it another hour."

"You won't betray me?" shrieked the old man, falling on his knees before her, and clutching her dress with both hands. "Oh, Hester, spare me, spare me! Remember that your father was my brother. Don't betray me!"

"If I only knew what was right!" sighed Hester, as she helped him to his feet.

He did not answer; but she saw his face become suddenly distorted, his trembling increase. The next moment he fell in a fit at her feet.

Half an hour later the village doctor arrived breathless, at the cottage, having been summoned in hot haste by the old servant. But his skill availed nothing. He found no use for the medicine box he had brought; for within ten minutes of his arrival old Derwent breathed his last.

* * * * *

Late that evening, as Wilfred Clifford sat alone in the small parlour of the neat little house which his aunt had left him, he heard the sound of steps on the gravel walk. He answered the ring of the bell himself, and to his great surprise saw that his visitor was a woman. He did not recognise her until she came into the lighted hall and threw back her veil.

"Hester!" he exclaimed.

"Yes, it is I," she said, in a low voice. "Strange, is it not, that I should come alone to your house late at night? But I have come to tell you where you can find the murderer you have been seeking so long."

The next morning, Holmes was startled by a heavy knock at his door. He opened it, and was confronted by two policemen, who held a warrant for his arrest for the wilful murder of Rachel Taylor.

The evidence was against him, and he was convicted, paying the penalty of his crime a few days later.

Wilfred Clifford and Hester Derwent were married a short time afterwards, and it is scarcely necessary to say that the bride never returned to that desolate cottage where she had made such a terrible and important discovery. Nor did she ever claim the reward. Love paid the debt, and her heart was more than satisfied.

ALLAN DEED.

OUGHT YOU TO HAVE HAD ONE OF THOSE FIVE POUNDS?

THE result of the distribution in connection with the ten £5 notes offered every week in P.W. appears in the current issue of that paper. Three out of the ten people selected have been fortunate enough to secure £5 each by forwarding their names to this office. There are seven others, who, by failing to apply, either through indifference, or through their not being readers, did not secure their money. Their names and addresses are also given. Are you one of them?

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

Time 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskdale's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, to Harington's sister, Ethel.

Lord Eskdale has very good reasons to believe that France and Germany are meditating an immediate invasion of England. He, therefore, dispatches Harington to London to warn the Premier, and Rodney to warn the British admiral established in the Mediterranean.

An attempt to land at Worthing is made by a combined French and German fleet of 36 ironclads, 40 troopships, and 100 smaller boats. The local volunteers hold them in check till the regulars arrive from London.

An inventor secures an audience with the Prince of Wales and demonstrates to him the utility of a new weapon, with the result that steps are immediately taken to manufacture an enormous number of them.

CHAPTER VII.

The Voyage of the "Hornet."

From the course of events it has been made clear that Lieutenant Rodney accomplished, without hitch or deviation of any sort, the chief part of the special mission upon which he was so suddenly dispatched by Lord Eskdale.

It was not until a fellow-countryman entered the mail train at Bologna, late on the Wednesday evening, that Rodney learnt the full significance of his journey. The Italian newspapers were selling in hundreds in the station, and a chance inquiry made by the new arrival elicited the fact that war had been declared and the allied fleets were then on their way to the English coast. The Englishman who gave this information was himself intent upon catching the Peninsular at Brindisi in the hope that he might be able to get home by that means, as the possibility of crossing the Continent by train was practically out of the question.

The Peninsular was true to her appointed time. Rodney had little leisure to make some purchases to complete his scanty outfit before he stepped from the marble quay to the deck of that fine steamer. A brief conversation with the captain led him to give some emphatic orders to the chief engineer, and when the Peninsular swung out of the little harbour, with its quaint windmill-shaped castle guarding the entrance, the log forthwith recorded a speed of seventeen knots per hour. There would be no bonus for officers or engineers for that voyage owing to the economy of coal consumption.

On Friday morning at six o'clock Valetta was reached, and when the Peninsular's anchor rattled from her bows, Midshipman Fisher, of the Hornet, swung himself on board from a steam launch and inquired for Rodney.

"Sir Arthur Fremantle is waiting for you at the castle, sir," he said, saluting, as Frank had hastened towards the youngster when he saw him climbing up the ship's side. "He is anxious to see you immediately."

"Tumble my traps overboard, and I will be with you in half a tick," was the answer, and Rodney hastened off to bid the Captain "good-bye," in case circumstances should prevent him from rejoining the Peninsular, as the ship left again in two hours.

The next time he set foot on the vessel's deck, Ethel and he were en route to Egypt for their honeymoon tour.

"What's the news here?" he inquired as he took his place by the middy's side in the stern-sheets of the little launch which rapidly throbbed its way to the steps of St. John.

"We've all got the jumps," was the answer. "The fleet left yesterday morning at half an hour's notice, bound for Gib., we believe. At twelve o'clock every blessed cable was cut somewhere or another, and since then we have been drinking pegs and asking each other 'What's up?' There are 8,000 troops here and 1,000 militia, and every man jack is a complete note of interrogation in himself."

"We are at war with France and Germany," said Rodney. The boatswain heard the reply, and, as discipline forbade him to yell, or curse, or even whistle, he pressed the throttle-valve hard down and made the launch hum with excitement.

"Then what in thunder was the Hornet left here for?" asked Midshipman Fisher, scarlet with indignation at the thought that there was a row going on and he was not in it.

The Hornet, it may be explained, is a diminutive torpedo-boat destroyer, very smart and very small, so there was no wonder that Rodney laughed as he answered: "All right, young 'un. Don't be alarmed. You'll see sparks before this business is over."

There was no time for further conversation. When the launch reached the landing place, Rodney was met by the Assistant Military Secretary, Captain J. S. Ewart, of the Cameron Highlanders, and taken straight to the Governor's quarters.

Sir Arthur Lyon Fremantle received his momentous intelligence with an air of deeper concern than Master Fisher had displayed.

"Seymour and I feared as much when your telegrams reached us," he said. "The word you used meant that we were to be prepared for the worst possible eventualities in the way of a hostile combination, and both Admiralty and War Office have repeatedly urged the necessity for momentary readiness for action. Have you heard that six French warships passed south of the island this morning at 5.30, steaming rapidly eastwards?"

"No, sir. I have only been on shore five minutes."

"I thought that perhaps it might be known to the people on the launch. We are secure enough here," went on the Governor, "but I wish we could do something more than act on the defensive only."

"Where were the enemy going, in your opinion, sir?" said Rodney.

"To seize the Suez Canal, undoubtedly, and to capture all the British merchant ships they may encounter. It is fortunate that they cannot fall in with the Peninsular, which may now escape. I suppose they will also occupy Perim, for the sake of the coal supply, and probably bombard Aden. By the manner in which they have telegraphically isolated us, I have no doubt that the garrisons of both places will be in ignorance of the progress of events until the enemy's fleet commences hostilities."

"Why should they not be stopped?" cried the naval officer, starting up excitedly from his chair.

"Stopped! What can we do?" exclaimed the Governor.

"Blow up the canal!" was the emphatic rejoinder.

"We can't blow it up by talking about it," remarked Captain Ewart.

"No. But the Hornet is here, and if she is ready for sea she can get to Port Said before the enemy's fleet," said Rodney, now thoroughly excited.

"She is in first-rate trim," said the Governor. "Sir Michael Seymour told me so himself, and he left her here to act as a dispatch vessel if necessary. Unfortunately her commander, Lieutenant Cator, has been very ill from island fever, and is still extremely weak."

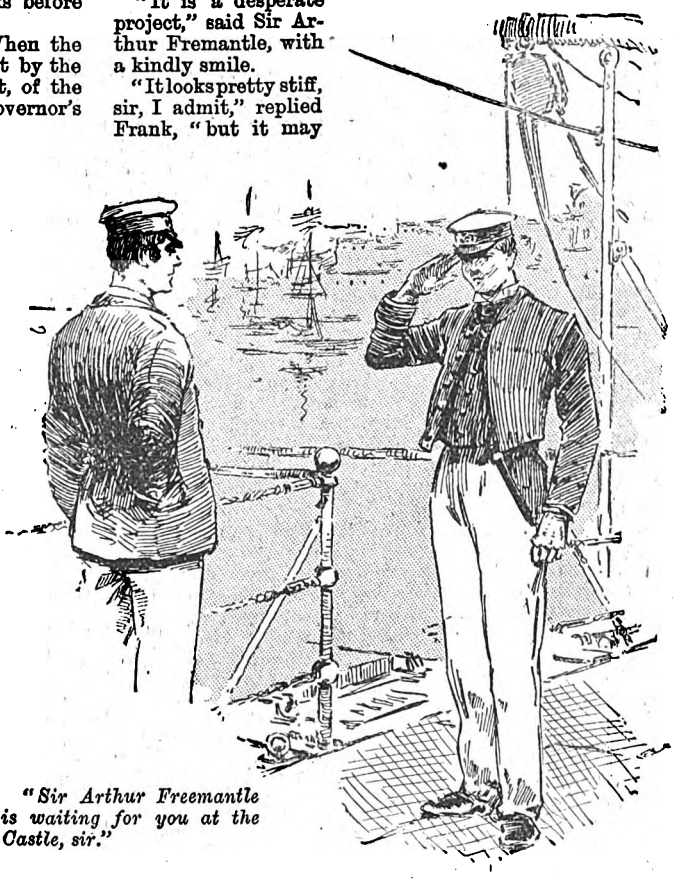
"Send me, sir," cried Rodney. "You can forward a note to the Admiral by the Peninsular to explain my absence and your intentions."

"Lieutenant Rodney," said the Governor, cordially extending his hand, "you are a man of action. Go, and take my heartfelt thanks for your offer, which I gratefully accept. I leave all details to you, and Captain Ewart will take you to the Admiral Superintendent so that all the resources of the dockyard may be placed at your disposal. It has always been the intention of the authorities to convert the Mediterranean into a French lake in the event of a war with France, and I see no harm in allowing Germany and Russia to share the privilege with her. I will communicate, as you suggest, with Sir Michael Culme Seymour, and I wish you good luck. Have you any plan? If successful, do you return here?"

"I think, sir, it would be best to dash through the Red Sea and warn Aden. Perhaps the cable to Bombay may be uninjured, and we could thus give India timely information."

"It is a desperate project," said Sir Arthur Fremantle, with a kindly smile.

"It looks pretty stiff, sir, I admit," replied Frank, "but it may be easy enough. Will you let me write a line to be forwarded with yours?"



"Sir Arthur Freemantle is waiting for you at the Castle, sir."

He hastily scribbled a note to Ethel, which ran as follows:

Malta, May 5, 1898.

DEAREST,—If you hear that the Suez Canal is blown up, you may feel certain that I am all serene. See my mother and kiss her for me. I am skipper of the Hornet for the next week.

Yours ever,
FRANK RODNEY.

Before noon the Hornet was ready for sea, presenting a strange sight for such a trim little ship, as her decks were piled high with bags of coal to eke out her ordinary supply of fuel. Rodney was seeing to the careful disposition of several hundredweight of dynamite when a scrap of paper was brought to him by a hospital orderly, which bore in faintly-pencilled scrawl this message:

I have heard of your project. I know I can't be in command, but for God's sake take me with you. I will be as fit as a fiddle in a few days. Don't leave me here, there's a good fellow. Your old messmate, Gerald Cator.

"Where is Lieutenant Cator?" said Rodney to Master Fisher, who had grown an inch in height and girth since the morning.

"In the hospital, near the Gunners' Mess, sir."

"Take three men and bring him on board in five minutes, if you can."

"If I can!" said the middy, as he ran off. "As if I bloomin' well couldn't!"

Shortly afterwards a pale and emaciated figure in the undress uniform of a naval officer, reclining on a long deck chair, with three tars and a midshipman shouldering a corner a-piece, was borne at the double out of the hospital and rapidly ferried on board the Hornet. That afternoon the Senior Surgeon reported Lieutenant Cator for being absent without leave, but, after a chat with the Governor, cancelled the report, and marked the register opposite his name; "Discharged cured."

As the Hornet steamed down the magnificent harbour, the quays of Valetta itself and the "Three Cities" were crowded with cheering soldiers and port operatives, whilst a salute of seven guns was fired from one of the forts, compliments that the little vessel shrilly returned by means of her steam whistle. Quickly gaining way, she rattled off to the east at twenty knots an hour, and, after fixing a temporary crow's-nest for a look-out on top of an improvised foremast, Rodney went below to have a quiet chat with Cator, his brother officer and old-time chum when they were cadets together on board the Britannia.

At six bells in the middle watch, in other words, at 3 a.m. on Saturday, whilst the Hornet was spinning away under her forced draught of 3,300 horse power, her speed being then close on twenty-five knots an hour, the look-out sighted the French fleet, which was visible through the hazy light of dawn about four miles away on the port bow.

Rodney, who was asleep, turned out instantly, and climbed to the crow's nest, whence he could plainly distinguish the six vessels, two armoured battleships and four first-class cruisers, travelling leisurely at about half the pace of the Hornet, in the direction of Port Said.

His first impulse, on descending to the deck, was to alter his course so as to be safe from recognition by the time daylight was sufficiently advanced to render the horizon perfectly clear. But the boyish spirit was not quite dead in him yet, and, after a brief consultation with Cator, he resolved to reduce speed a little without deviation of bearings, with the result that in another hour's time he would be slightly ahead of the enemy and plainly visible to them.

Midshipman Fisher, of course, thought they were going to attack, and asked Rodney when it would be necessary to rouse the starboard watch, and whether someone should not be set to clear the torpedo tubes.

The commander did not perceive his meaning for a moment, but when he did, told him to confine his attention to procuring the biggest Union Jack that the ship's stores would produce.

They had not long to wait before signals made on the French fleet showed that they were observed, and a cruiser detached herself from the rest in order to intercept them. It was absolutely out of the question for a sixteen-knot vessel to endeavour to catch the Hornet, but by way of amusing the Frenchmen Rodney now displayed his bit of bunting, and young Fisher gained some renown by suggesting that it would be a delicate compliment to string up the French flag beneath it, he having fashioned a tricolour by means of a pair of scissors and some string, after rummaging in the signal locker.

A couple of shots were fired at them, and the second shell fell unpleasantly close. Rodney now thought the joke had gone far enough, as he could not afford to risk his ship for the sake of amusement. He therefore altered his course, and gave the order "Full speed ahead," with the result that by breakfast time the enemy was hull down on the horizon, nursing the uneasy conviction that the British vessel was up to some devilment that could not be fathomed.

By the afternoon of Sunday the Hornet was within sixty miles of Port Said. Her deck was now clear of coal-bags, and some inroad had been made upon her bunkers. She had made a superb run—over 1,000 miles in little more than two days—and Rodney decided to steam boldly into the Canal by daylight, and trust to luck in dealing with any enemy he might encounter there.

He reached the dirty but picturesque port by five o'clock, and demanded the right of one of Her Majesty's ships to take precedence of all other vessels waiting to enter the Canal.

The French officials hardly knew what to say, being conscious that war had broken out, but they thought it best to simply treat the passage of the Hornet as an ordinary event, and forthwith supplied her with the huge electric lamp that enables vessels to make their way through the Canal by night. During the delay Rodney ascertained from the captain of a British ship in the harbour that the Canal was clear of warships, so far as he knew, and in return for the information the naval officer advised him to set his course round by the north of Candia if he wished to save his ship from destruction by the French fleet.

Rodney determined to destroy the Canal at a point between Ferdeneh and El Gisr, where the banks are fairly high. Once inside, therefore, he pushed ahead at a much more rapid rate than the stately pace prescribed by the regulations, and put an end to the expostulations of the French pilot by having him securely lashed to a chair in the mess-room.

By midnight he had reached the spot selected. Every preliminary had been thought of during the journey from Malta. No sooner was the vessel tied up by the Canal side than the whole available crew set to work to bore blasting holes along the banks for a distance of two hundred yards on each shore.

For many hours they worked undisturbed. Two ships passed during the night, and, as they approached, the working parties temporarily returned to the Hornet to escape observation, and to be ready to use guns or torpedo against a possible foe. But the two passers-by were an English collier bound for Aden and an Austrian Lloyd steamer from India.

At last all preparations were made.

Twelve bore-holes had been driven into the banks to a vertical depth of ten feet, and several pounds of dynamite or blasting powder deposited at the bottom of each. Time fuses were affixed to the powder charges, and detonators, governed by long pieces of cord, controlled the dynamite.

When all was ready Rodney himself ignited each of the five-minute fuses, and saw that the men in charge of the dynamite sections were stationed, cord in hand, at the safest distance obtainable under the circumstances. Their instructions were to rapidly jerk the cord the moment that the first gunpowder explosion occurred and then run for their lives towards the desert, in order to escape falling stones and débris.

At the final moment the service telegraph wire of the Canal was cut as a precautionary measure, and then everyone waited anxiously for the dénouement.

A loud roar announced the firing of the first time-fuse mine. Almost simultaneously there came a tremendous explosion from the dynamite charges. With a crash that seemed to shake the sky and loosen the firm earth, the terrific explosive tore thousands of tons of soil and rock from the solid banks of the canal. In a second a great cloud of smoke and dust rose into the air and spread around in impenetrable density, whilst a big wave raced along the Canal and made itself felt for many miles north and south along its length.

Two or three minor explosions followed, from the remainder of the powder mines, and when at last it was safe to make an inspection, Rodney found that the Canal was blocked in such fashion that it would require months of labour to make it passable for vessels.

He collected his ship's company, and there were no casualties, though Midshipman Fisher had been sharply rapped on the head by a falling pebble. The Hornet was about to proceed upon her way when a big steamer loomed out of the gloom and hailed the torpedo-boat.

"What ship is that?" said Rodney in response.

"Ze Gretchen, off Hamburg," was the answer. "Vot noise vos dat?"

"This is Her Majesty's ship Hornet," cried Rodney, "and as your country has declared war against England, we make you a prisoner. Do you surrender, or shall we torpedo you?"

"No, mein Gott, no torpedo," roared the astounded German captain.

Rodney then boarded the stranger, and told the commander that he and his crew might land their personal belongings, but as for the ship she would be run into the wreck of the Canal, and then scuttled, as an additional obstacle, and the German had no option but to submit to this rough usage.

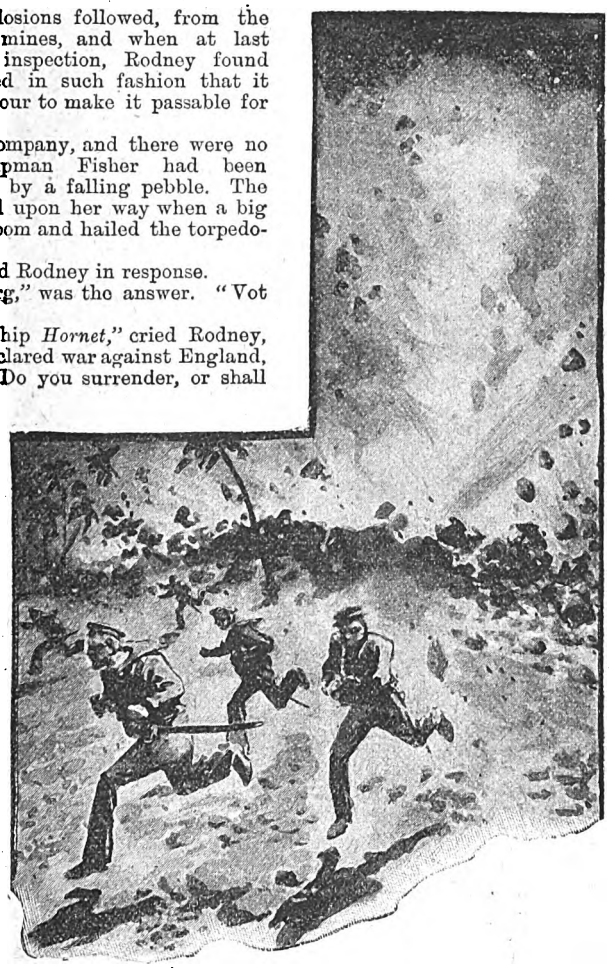
After the British vessel had replenished her coal supply from the tramp's stores, the other part of the programme was faithfully carried out and the Hornet steamed off to Ismailia and Suez to report that a German steamer had burst her boilers and sunk in the Canal, temporarily damaging the telegraph posts in her vicinity.

When, three days later, Rodney and Cator went ashore at Perim to obtain more coal, and to have lunch with the British subaltern in command of the hundred Sepoys who garrison the island, they entertained this worthy to a graphic account of the scene in the desert as the great cloud rose from the explosion.

"It must have been a fine sight," he said, "but I will knock it out here if any of the enemy's fleet comes along."

"How?" inquired Rodney.

"There are 30,000 tons of coal always in stock on this island, and my orders are to set fire to the lot when I consider there is any danger of its falling into the hands of an enemy. That'll be worth seeing on a fine night, won't it?"



A great cloud of smoke and dust rose into the air.

CHAPTER VIII.

On the Boulevards.

During the first days of the war Paris was in a frenzied state of exultation.

Along the boulevards and in the cafés excited groups, moved by the common impulse of national enthusiasm, gathered to discuss in extravagant language, and with all the heat of Gallic passion, this sudden swoop upon an unsuspecting foe. With every class of the community the war was popular. Work was laid aside and pleasure forgotten whilst ouvrier and patrician mingled in a common abandonment of rapture which showed how fiercely and deep burnt the fires of hereditary hatred.

"Agincourt is at last avenged!" screamed one heated orator from the pedestal of the statue of Jean d'Arc, to which he had climbed at the bidding of a tumultuous mob. "The hated Saxon is at our feet. We spared him at Waterloo, but it was only to sweep him in the end more cleanly from his wretched island!"

And this bombast was cheered to the echo.

The very gamins took up the cry and patrolled the streets shrieking insolent vaudevilles tossed off by the score by newspaper hacks, and all turning on some ribald jest at the expense of the enemy. One of the most popular, set to a well-known air, which Yvette Guilbert was then singing at the Casino, ran:

Ca y est, donc, en l'Angleterre,
Front de bœuf, et plein d'bière,
Trop de ventre pour s'enfuir,
V'là un homme, qui nous fait rire.

And crowds of people marched along the streets at night repeating, with inexhaustible delight, this feeble quatrain.

No Ministry had ever been so popular. The President—who took care to ride in the Bois—was followed by a cheering mob, and the Foreign Minister was carried bodily along the Champs Elysées from the Louvre to the Arc de Triomphe, where he was made to deliver a thrilling and patriotic speech.

"We win too early and forgive too late!" muttered a deputy who shook his head at the premature rejoicings of his countrymen.

Later in the day the Foreign Minister detailed his adventures to the President, and was jubilant at the course of events.

But the head of the Republic manifested anxiety on the question of supplies. "I hope that America may be impelled to take our side," he said. "We must conceal our desires with regard to Canada at present."

"The United States can always be counted upon to make a disturbance at the right moment, despite this show of friendship towards England," replied the Foreign Minister. "When Europe was apparently in line on the Turkish question, Russian diplomacy, backed up by more potent arguments, brought about the Venezuelan trouble, and diverted attention from Constantinople. I hear from Petersburg that the Tsar is endeavouring to arrange fresh difficulties between England and the United States on some point."

For a while the Parisians were too much occupied with celebrating their success to mark the absence of subsequent news. The telegram which announced the capture of Worthing had satisfied their vanity. But after a time came strange rumours that a hitch had occurred somewhere. Despite the persistence of the Press, which hour to hour flooded the streets with exciting information of an advance upon London, the flight of the Queen of England to Balmoral and the suicide of the Lord Mayor, there came a moment's pause in the general rejoicing.

Le Matin had announced that the French fleet had been sighted off Brest, and was making for the harbour.

At first the intelligence was received with incredulity, and the office of Le Matin was besieged by a furious mob, which broke the windows and would have torn the editor to shreds if he had not made his escape to the cellar.

When confirmation came, it was instantly declared that the return of the navy was only a subtle stratagem to lure the British to a more disastrous overthrow. No one believed that it could mean retreat. But the sage deputy observed with foreboding that the President did not ride in the Bois that day. Le Gaulois shrieked more fiercely than ever.

"England," it declared, "shivers behind her money-bags. This monster of injustice cares not that her honour is gone, but she trembles for her gold. Lord Chamberlain and Sir Balfour are quaking beneath the beak of the eagle, and our navy, triumphant, returns to bear us the glorious news."

But, alas! this false security could ill withstand the shock of truth.

On Friday morning the people of Brest witnessed a terrible sight. The shattered French ships of the allied fleets, crushed, maimed, and helpless, slowly made their way into the harbour, with sides ripped up and masts gone, with decks ploughed with shot and rudders almost useless. A horrified crowd assembled on the quay, and stood aghast and shuddering at these awful tokens of overwhelming ruin.

Along the narrow gangways were borne the wounded and dying.

But their grief and rage knew no bounds when along the narrow gangways were borne ashore the wounded and dying in agonising and what seemed endless file. The havoc of the fight had made unutterable wrecks of the splendid crews who a few days before had manned the vessels in the pride of perfect manhood. Horrible wounds and ghastly fractures, such as our modern shells cause, which leave scarcely a trace of human form and tear to fragments the frames of their victims, sent tremours through the crowd.

There could no longer be doubt. The fool's paradise in which a whole nation had lived for so brief a space was rudely demolished.

The fatal news spread apace, and in a few hours Paris lay prostrate beneath the blow. Nor was it long before the whole catastrophe became known, how two great navies had been crushed, and England, taken by surprise and scarce defended, still rose above the sea, calm and triumphant, unsoiled by the touch of a hostile foot.

Mercurial in its moods, quick to extremes of anger as to extremes of joy, knowing no mean between the two, and incapable of that phlegmatic courage which receives defeat with courage as it welcomes victory without undue elation, the Paris mob, when it had recovered from the stun of the terrible news, became frantic with ungovernable rage.

Wild crowds rushed through the streets in fury, maddened by humiliation and reckless with passion. An exultant people had in a moment become a savage mob. There was but one thought, that of revenge on someone, anyone, who might suggest himself to the disordered public mind.

As the day drew to its close the more peaceful citizens became alarmed. Paris was no longer under control. Violent speakers, foaming with fury, demanded a new government—a communism—a new reign of terror. The members of the Cabinet had fled to their houses, and the President was compelled to surround the Elysée with troops.

Instead of calming the public feeling, the Parisian papers fanned the flame of revolt.

"Nous sommes trahis!" exclaimed Le Figaro in its opening words of comment, "France is once more the devoted victim of the treachery of her own sons. She has been delivered, by base intrigue, to her ruin. English gold and German hatred have bought her rulers. We are sacrificed to their perfidy. Her trusting confidence and simple love have been the ministers to her destruction. Down with the traitors! A l'Elysée! A l'Elysée!"

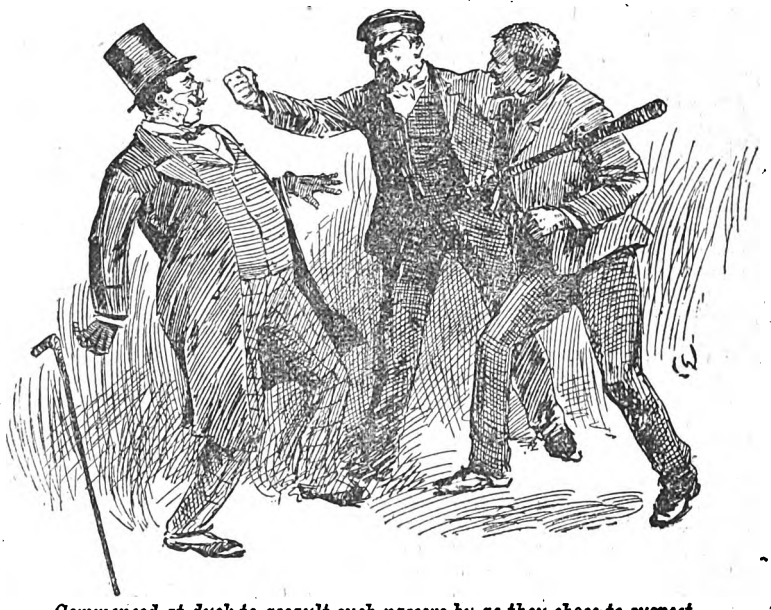
Le Journal boldly declared the Foreign Minister to be the ruling spirit of this betrayal, and the Minister who was shouldered along the streets on Thursday by an enthusiastic multitude was execrated on Friday as "le second Judas." Not a member of the Cabinet was safe. It would have been death to any one of them had he appeared.

This rumour of treachery travelled like wildfire, and caused a panic. Fierce spirits, let loose by the general disorder, commenced at dusk to assault such passers-by as they chose to suspect; some of the shops in the Rue de Rivoli were looted, and an attempt was made to break into the Palais Royal, which had been closed early in the day.

But the more serious papers, excited and extravagant, yet not without some sense of responsibility, sought to allay the storm.

Beyond all, realising that their justification of the sudden movement against England lay only in its success, they displayed an anxiety to convince the world that it was inevitable and imperative, and this they found no easy task.

It was ominous that the Paris edition of the New York Herald had, during the first three days, contented itself with the bare chronicling of the dramatic sweep of events. There was no word of comment; the editor was studiously dumb. It was as if delicacy to the people over whom the newspaper exercised so potent an influence demanded silence—a silence that had all the force of a tacit condemnation.



Commenced at dusk to assault such passers-by as they chose to suspect.

Le Matin had confidently appealed to old alliances and a common foe. It recalled hysterically the ancient feud with England which resulted in the establishment of an independent country across the water. But the Herald was not stirred to response, nor even to quotation, and the imperturbability of a journal noted for its piquant and lively comment produced a serious impression upon the more responsible French papers.

But matters became worse later on, when the opinion of the native American press upon the situation was flashed along the Mackay-Bennett cable. If respect to the land of its adoption made the Paris Herald silent, at least it did not prevent the insertion of quotations from the newspapers published at home, and their tone was non-committal enough to cause misgiving wherever the hope of active sympathy prevailed.

On the Saturday morning the Paris edition of the New York Herald, under a demure heading which carefully avoided sensation, published the following:

"We have scrupulously refrained from passing an opinion on the sensational events of the past few days. An American journal on French territory should at least respect the obligations of a guest, and it is impossible for us, as it would be discourteous, to throw our weight into the camp of either belligerent. It is our plain duty to preserve a neutral attitude. We therefore print, without comment, extracts from some of the more influential papers of America which have reached us though cable to-day.

"The Boston Herald passes no opinion on the rights of the quarrel between England and those who are attacking her. But it insists that the policy of America is absolute neutrality, 'Under no circumstances,' continues that journal, 'can we depart from the spirit of the Monroe doctrine, which practically restricts the United States to her own shores. So long as her independence is in no way threatened, she has no possible justification for embroiling herself in European complications. America will witness the struggle calmly to the end.'

"The New York World observes: 'We are in horror of what has occurred. Civilisation stands aghast at the iniquity of the blow. It seems as if the Continent has swept away its centuries of progression, and stands stripped to the skin, disclosing the primeval savage. If France imagines that she can count upon the assistance of the United States because of past services, she has made a profound mistake. We do not forget the insults of France and Germany during our war with Spain. Liberty is the watchword of our constitution, and it is the interest, no less than the earnest desire of a great republic, to protest against a giant wrong perpetrated in the name of a giant greed. All Americans will abhor the outburst that threatens to overwhelm England, and in her time of need we frankly admit her to be the pioneer of freedom and peace.'"

America was clearly to be neutral, as international law compelled, and these words flashed across the sea were ominously suggestive of the vanity of French hopes in this direction.

There were several of the more dignified papers in Paris which laboured to excuse the action of the United Powers in the eyes of the powerful Republic and incite her to action.

The Débats had a statesmanlike article, endeavouring to show that the war was an act of necessity. The whole country, it protested, was suffering from want of colonies. Trade demanded expansion; there was needed a broadening of the dominions to satisfy the ambitions and the just aims of an active people. On all hands were signs of a suffering nation, searching in vain for a market; her sons, meanwhile, compelled to remain at home for lack of new fields for their energies. England had seized the earth, and force alone could secure a just balance.

But America remained impassive to these arguments.

Yet some good fruits accrued from these passionate articles. Paris, so childlike in her impulses, was brought round to a reasonable mood, and though there was no longer enthusiasm or hysterical fervour, there was at least a calmer spirit—a more resolute front.

On the following Monday a Council of war was summoned at the Elysée. It was a full meeting of French and German Ministers, and the conference was long and anxious.

The terrible repulse of the fleet had come upon them all with consternation; there was no longer the air of certainty which prevailed at first. The President of the Republic thought less of Whitehall, and Count Holbach had postponed his negotiations for the occupation of Gibraltar.

The Foreign Minister was still confident.

"The fleet is driven back," he observed; "but that is a bagatelle. We have in the Mediterranean a combined force of men and ships powerful enough to decimate the whole British Empire. Let us not be discouraged. Before the enemy is able to call together its scattered strength we shall have sailed through the Straits and formed a fatal cordon around the British Islands."

This sounded reasonable enough. The stupendous fleet of the two countries was already on its way. It was a gathering of giants, and the English defences seemed feeble and ridiculous before it.

"In five days," observed the German Chancellor, "we shall be once more in the Channel. We have delayed, not thrown away, the victory."

At this moment a special messenger arrived with a telegram. The President opened it, and turned pale as he read:

"Gentlemen," he said slowly, "this message tells us that the enemy has been forewarned. The Suez Canal is blown up, and we have no longer a road to India."

There was a dead silence. The news had stunned them.

At last Count Holbach essayed to deal with the situation.

"These English are full of resource," he said. "They mean to give us trouble. So much the worse for them. Meanwhile let us not be over-concerned. Our plan lies not just now through the Suez. We will cripple the island, and then let India do what it will. The boom of our guns will be heard by the shores of Britain before the week is out. Give me seven days and I will lay her helpless."

Another knock came, and another messenger with a telegram.

The President bit his lips.

"The Straits of Gibraltar are blockaded!" he exclaimed. "This is annoying; our plans must suffer delay. But, thank Heaven, it is nothing worse."

"Nothing worse!" It was General Gourko, hitherto silent, who intervened. "You regard this as of less moment?"

"It merely delays us," returned the President.

"Gentlemen," declared Gourko, "the first telegram was disturbing enough; the second is appalling. Do you not see what has happened?"

There were inquiring murmurs. Everyone turned an anxious gaze upon the Russian general.

"It means," he continued impressively, "that the Mediterranean is no longer a sea. It is impassable. It is now reduced to the condition of a lake, and your great fleets are imprisoned in it without possibility of escape. You are stripped of your most powerful arm."

"We can seize Malta!" stammered the President.

"Malta," observed Gourko, "is impregnable, and it is provisioned for three years. England has destroyed exit and entrance, and your splendid ships are of no further use to you!"

At this solemn pronouncement, which was so obviously true, there came into the breasts of the Council a terrible fear. For the first time it dawned upon them that their task was not so easy as it appeared, that, amazing to say, England might yet rise in her strength and smite them all!

"I JUST hate being a drudge!" grumbled Jenny, giving a little cry of pain as a splinter from the dry firewood pierced her finger. "I just hate it! And I hate everything here."

She dropped the stick and began to pull at the splinter. It came out, bringing a drop of blood. The finger was hard and callous, the hands rough and red. The face was rough and red too, fiery red now with anger.

Everyone called her Crooked Jenny. This was because she was a dwarfish hump-back. Mrs. Hetherington declared that she deserved the name quite as much because of her crooked temper.

Jenny Low had been in the Hetherington home three years. Her parents were dead, and the uncle as well with whom she lived after the death of her parents. When this uncle died, Mrs. Hetherington brought Jenny home. There seemed nothing else to be done.

Perhaps she meant to do well by the girl. Certainly she expected Jenny to "pay her way," and was diligent in her efforts to see that she did.

Having extracted the splinter from her finger, Jenny picked up the offending stick and hurled it from her with fierce anger not noting and not caring the direction.

The door opened at that moment, and the flying stick struck Mrs. Hetherington on the shoulder, almost knocking her from her feet.

"I'll whip you for that, Jenny, see if I don't!" Mrs. Hetherington declared, her face aflame.

She crossed the intervening space before the astonished girl could rise to beat a retreat, and took her savagely by the shoulder.

"What do you mean by throwing that stick?"

She shook the girl violently. Jenny caught her breath, set her teeth and said not a word, though her contracted brows and the rebellious lines in her face spoke volumes.

"Why don't you answer me?" Mrs. Hetherington demanded. "Why don't you speak? Why did you throw that stick? Did you do it to hit me? I'm sure you did. You're the worst child I ever saw in all my born days! I've a good mind to thrash you to within an inch of your life!"

"I don't care," was Jenny's defiant assertion. "I don't care if you kill me!"

Mrs. Hetherington's anger appeared to gain volume She pulled the girl roughly across the floor, pushed her before her up the stairs, and locked her in a dark room.

It was a worse punishment than whipping.

Jenny paid no more heed to whippings than she did to the dropping rain on the grass and leaves, but she feared the darkness and loneliness of that room.

But it did not conquer her. It only roused her to fiercer defiance.

When Mrs. Hetherington retreated down the stairs Jenny was screaming, kicking on the door and shouting out her hate like a veritable little savage.

For half an hour afterwards, screams continued to issue from that upper room, and kicks to rain on the door. The furious little heart hated everything that lived. She knew the story of her wrong-doing would be told to Mr. Hetherington as soon as he stepped into the house, and she hated him for his expected condemnation. Above all things else, she hated herself, her crooked back, her homely, red face, and rough, red hands. Why was she born, she asked herself, to be an unloved and unlovely drudge?

Three hours later, when the night shadows were gathering, Mr. Hetherington pushed into the dark room, carrying a lantern. He had heard his wife's story and had a vague feeling that perhaps she had been hasty and harsh. As for himself, Mr. Hetherington had never given much heed to the little waif that the world's currents had drifted into his home.

He did not at first see the crooked form in the corner, where Jenny, having exhausted herself, had fallen asleep. When he did see her and observed the tear stains on the ill-favoured face, his lips twitched. She started up with a cry of fright as the light fell on her.

"It's only me, Jenny," he said softly. "It's time for you to go to bed, you know. You'll catch your death up here."

"I don't care," she declared, bitter memory reasserting itself.

"Tut, tut!" he cried, uncomfortably touched. "It's only foolish people who talk that way. You'll feel different in the morning. The supper's been cleared away, but"—hesitatingly—"here's an apple. I happened to have it in my pocket."

Jenny understood, but said nothing. To the torture of the dark room was always added deprivation of supper. However, she did not reach up to take the apple.

"What I wanted to say, though, and why I've come for you, instead of Mrs. Hetherington," he went on, "is that we've got company; they're down in the parlour now. I never give it much thought, but I s'pose it must be rather lonely for you here sometimes?"

Jenny maintained a perverse and dogged silence.

"They came over from the village an hour or so ago," he exclaimed, shifting uneasily to the other foot, "Mrs. Gordon and her baby, or rather her little girl, for she's about a year and a half old by now. Her husband died, you see, and being Mrs. Hetherington's own cousin, and no place to go, she come up here and we've agreed to do by her the best we can. I hope you'll like her, Jenny, her and the baby."

This last doubtfully.

"I don't want to see her," said Jenny, her heart icing again. She began to feel that Mr. Hetherington's unexampled kindness had its seat in a desire to keep Mrs. Gordon from knowing she had been badly treated. "She'll hate me, same's everybody does, when she sees my crooked back and red face, and finds out how bad I am sometimes. I know she'll hate me, and I don't want to see her."

"I dunno about that," argued Mr. Hetherington. "I don't hate you, and I don't believe she'll do anything of the kind, either. I fancy that she's going to like you."

He still held the apple in his hand. It was juicy and red-cheeked, and she loooked at it hungrily. A hard sob struggled out of the little throat, and a smiling look came into the eyes, but she did not take the apple.

"Now, I'm going to light you downstairs to bed, if you'll let me," he went on. "Things'll look different in the morning, when the sun's shining and the birds singin'. I've often noticed that they do. And you're certain to like Mrs. Gordon and the baby. Its name is Emmy. Emmy Gordon is a pretty name, I think."

His face flushed, when she was still silent, and he put the apple back into his pocket. The repulse hurt him. He took up the lantern and stepped to the top of the stairs, and she, getting up from the corner, followed.

At the bottom he left her without a word. She heard the sounds of conversation and laughter in the parlour, which was brilliantly illuminated, then scudded like a rat to the little back room where she slept.

The next day, the pink baby face, the toddling limbs, the big blue eyes and the cooing trustfulness of the child drew out Crooked Jenny's love in a surging wave.

The starved little heart gave to the baby all the love it had so long held in check, a love that in its power and depth was fairly worshipful.

"It's really wonderful how Jenny takes to your Emmy," Mrs. Hetherington declared to Mrs. Gordon before a week had gone by. "I've got to watch her or she'll steal the baby out or coax her upstairs when you ain't watching.

"I wish you'd just look at them romping now! I'm almost afraid to trust her, though. She's that changeable there's no depending on her."

At that moment Crooked Jenny was playing "camel."

She was down on her hands and knees, with the baby on her back, and she was plunging and prancing in what she conceived to be the true camel style.

"I'm a pretty good camel with that hump on my back, ain't I?" they heard her say; and somehow the tone and the question touched them.

Jenny saw them looking at her, and a great fear chilled her heart.

"I must be careful or they won't let me play with her at all," was her thought; and from that time there was a change in her demeanour toward the child.

Mrs. Hetherington observed this and duly commented on it, in her disparaging way, citing it as a proof of Crooked Jenny's fickleness.

One day Mrs. Hetherington and Mrs. Gordon sat in the kitchen, absorbed in talk.

The sunshine fell like a patterned carpet on the floor. The kettle sung a merry song on the stove. Little Emmy was momentarily forgotten.

A horse dragging a dog-cart dashed wildly up the road in a cloud of dust.

Crooked Jenny heard the clatter of hoofs and glanced out at the road. Her heart went into her mouth, and her pulse seemed to stand still.

Down in the dust of the road, unconscious of peril, little Emmy was playing.

With a choking cry, Crooked Jenny sprang through the open doorway. Her lips were parted and her homely face was white with a great fear. She saw the fiery-eyed horse, heard the thunder of his hoofs, and the rattle of the bounding wheels, saw the child. From her terror-filled heart a sobbing prayer went up.

The shriek that was torn from her when it seemed to her the horse's hoofs would strike the child to the earth brought to the women in the kitchen their first knowledge of little Emmy's peril. Then Crooked Jenny, rushing to the rescue, went down under the hoofs herself, and was beaten into the dust.

Crooked Jenny lay gasping and half unconscious, and her face was ashen when the women reached her, but the child was safe; Jenny had held it at arm's length, beyond the blows of the hoofs, and the wheels, and it was untouched.

Crooked Jenny came back to herself in a darkened room that made her think of the dark room upstairs. People were about her. She started up and cried out anxiously for little Emmy. The child, rosy and prattling, was placed in her arms by Mrs. Hetherington, whose eyes were red with weeping, and Jenny lay back on the pillow with a look of content. The pillow was not whiter than her face.

Mr. Hetherington glanced in a sort of dumb appeal toward the doctor, a spectacled gentleman who stood near the head of the bed and who had been very grave.

"You will relieve yourself of undue anxiety, Mr. Hetherington," he said. "Jenny will recover, though she has had a narrow escape."

Mrs. Gordon stooped and kissed the white face.

"I'm going to love you, Jenny, as if you were my very own," she promised.

The white face became pinkish with pleasure.

In a whisper and with painful effort came the answer:

"Oh, ma'am, if you only will!"

Then they began to understand what it was that Jenny had needed all those years, the simplest things, and at the same time the greatest things in the world, sympathy and love.

THE LAST RACE.

Morazan was a horse, white as to colour, and if I must be explicit, somewhat stiff as to legs, for he was now old, but even yet giving unmistakable evidence that his ancestors had been of no common breed.

There was something in the manner in which he occasionally laid back his ears and arched his beautiful neck, something in the flash that now and then brightened his eyes, which would have told even a stranger that he had once had a career. But that was long ago, when he had belonged to Carolos' father, the Señor Castello.

He belonged to Carolos now, and Carolos was at this moment astride his back. Morazan, the Mexican saddle, bridle and lariat, together with a minature of his mother, were all that Carolos possessed. It had been different once, but that, too, was long ago.

It seemed to Carolos as he rode leisurely down the broad avenue between the long rows of walnut trees, on the Señor Bertram's ranch, that it must have been a hundred years since the big ranch had belonged to his father, Enrico Castello; he could scarcely make himself believe that it was only six years ago.

The Señor Bertram had been very kind. His father had said so, and Carolos always remembered that. He had paid Enrico Castello, in gold, a fair price for the land, and had allowed him to live on the place the few remaining weeks of his life, and Señora Bertram had waited upon him with her own hands. And when he died she had comforted the orphan, Carolos, with gentle kindness.

After settling accounts, nothing was left for Carolos except the personal effects just mentioned, for although his father had been a gentleman of pure Spanish blood, after Carolos' mother died he had lived a reckless life. Carolos was too young at the time of his father's death to realise his financial loss. Had his fortune been left him, and Morazan and the lariat taken, he would have been wretched; but having these and the kindness of Señor Bertram, he was content, though a penniless orphan dependent upon the bounty of the English Señor.

One member of the Bertram family really loved Carolos. Ted loved him devotedly.

Ted was the only son and heir of the Bertram household, a merry, blue-eyed ten-year-old, who was at this identical moment sitting behind Carolos, astride Morazan's back, digging the horse's sides with his bare, brown heels, when he did not proceed at the speed Ted thought proper.

Like Carolos, Ted scorned shoes; indeed, he was pretty sure to scorn anything that Carolos looked upon with disfavour.

Carolos was a hero in his eyes, and whatever Carolos did, it became the sole end and aim of Ted's life to do also.

In spite of all Ted's digging with his sturdy little heels, Morazan showed no sign of increasing his speed, but continued to walk leisurely down the drive. He had received no intimation from Carolos to go faster, and he paid no attention to Ted's most vigorous hints.

Carolos, who for the last year had herded Señor Bertram's cattle, over in the hills, had been given a day off, and "John," the Chinaman who helped on the ranch, had taken his place with the herds.

Now Carolos was going back, and Ted after many entreaties was at last allowed to go for two days, when his father would drive over and bring him home. For Carolos might not be back again for weeks, as he had a camp in the hills.

Then, as he had reached the gateway leading to the road, he touched Morazan lightly, and he at once started off in a brisk walk toward the brown, irregular foot hills where Carolos' camp was situated.

* * * * *

It was the last day of Ted's stay.

It was the hottest day Carolos had ever known. The heat was excessive, and there was a strange sultriness in the air that was overpowering.

Ted succumbed under it and tumbled over under the big live oak where the tent was pitched, and was asleep before his head touched the ground.

How Carolos longed to lie down and sleep, too! The shade of the live oak had never looked so inviting, but he was uneasy about this sultriness and the murky hue that filled the atmosphere.

There must be a fire somewhere, but it could not be near enough to cause any uneasiness, surely, or he could see the smoke; perhaps the hills hid it. He brought Morazan up, and saddling him, rode round on the other side of the nearest hills, but could discover nothing.

Evidently the fire was not anywhere near, he concluded; and going back to the camp he tied Morazan near by to a large clump of green wood, that he might be ready should he deem it best to ride round presently and investigate further.

Meanwhile, if he only could lie down just for a moment! But he must not. If there was a fire anywhere in the hills, it might spread rapidly, and reach them. Carolos was troubled; what should he do in case it did reach them? Should he take Ted home and leave the herds—all Señor Bertram's fine Holsteins and Jerseys? Yes; he must if it came to the worst, but he must stay until certain that there was danger. How he wished the Señor would make haste and come for Ted, but it was so hot that he probably would not come until night.

It was strange that he felt so sleepy and stupid. It seemed impossible to keep awake, and his head felt so strangely. He went to the hydrant and plunged his head into the trough where the cattle drank, and then, coming back, sat listlessly down near Ted, under the oak.

He had only been sitting there a few moments, when his head began to droop, lower and lower, then he sank back unconsciously, and all things fled from his memory. His sleep was not a natural one, he was overcome by the excessive heat; yet, heavy as was his sleep, it was mingled with troubled dreams.

The sun beat down fiercely, the very wind seemed to scorch the dry grass round him. An hour passed, and still Carolos slept on, unconscious and unmindful of the tiny tongue of flame that was creeping round from the other side of the hills.

Nearer and nearer it came, growing in strength and volume, and filling the air with suffocating smoke. The horses and cattle down in the glen laid back their ears and huddled together for a few moments, and then with frightened snorts dashed madly away in every direction.

And still Carolos slept, unable to awaken from that deathlike slumber.

He was dreaming of his mother. He thought she stood over him, bending low and smiling upon him with her great, flashing, dark eyes. Lower and lower she bent, until the folds of her rebosa enveloped him—closer and closer it enfolded him—he was suffocating, strangling!

"Mother!" he cried thickly, "why do you stifle me?"

He could not hear her answer, but he heard something else.

A familiar sound fell upon his dulled ear.

It was Morazan's whinny. With a desperate effort he sat upright, and rubbed his dazed eyes. How strangely they smarted!

Again Morazan gave a long, urgent whinny. Ah, Carolos! but for Morazan neither you nor Ted would ever have awakened in this world.

In an instant Carolos was upon his feet, gazing about him with blanched face.

"Great Heavens! The fire is upon us!" he cried in a horror-stricken voice.

There was no time now to think of anything but to save Ted. The Señor Bertram had trusted the boy to Carolos and he would save the child or die with him.

Running to the hydrant he filled a bucket with water and, dashing it over the sleeping boy, succeeded in arousing him. Then catching up a blanket from out the tent and saturating it, he pinned it tightly round his neck, and helping Ted upon Morazan's back, he climbed up before the bewildered boy.

"Now crawl under the blanket, Ted; draw your feet up under it and hold tight about my waist; everything's dry as tinder and we must ride for our lives!" he said with compressed lips.

Ted did as Carolos commanded, and was entirely enveloped by the wet blanket.

Carolos let the reins loose, and, speaking an encouraging word to Moranzan, they were off like the wind. It was a difficult road out of the hills, in fact, only a steep, winding trail. How they ever clung to the horse in that mad race, Heaven only knows.

I have said that Morazan had had a career. In his young days he had been the pride of the country, and won many hundreds of pounds for Enrico Castello at the races. But never before had he ran such a race as he was running now. A race between life and death—a race in which Morazan's speed and strength were measured against the strength and speed of the fire-demon behind them!

Did the old horse remember the other days? Did his past glory and victory rise before him now?

It seemed so, for with head erect, ears laid back, and nostrils distended, he thundered on. He is on the race track again, his rival is close upon him—no need, Carolos, to whisper encouraging words; he knows as well as as yourself that two young lives are depending upon his strength and courage! The old horse is on his mettle and will save you or die in the attempt.

They have reached lower and flatter land, and have just entered a stretch of sage brush. Carolos' heart almost fails him, for he knows that when the fire reaches it, it will lick it up like tinder. Then there is a furious roar, and Carolos knows, although he dares not look back, that the fire has reached the sage brush.

Morazan gives a loud whinny, and fairly flies; his feet scarcely seem to touch the ground.

"Hold on fast, Ted," cried Carolos; then he set his teeth and, letting the reins fall, grasped the saddle pommel. With a wild, terrified snort, Morazan plunged forward.

There is a confused roar, a whirling cloud of smoke and flame, and the fire has passed over them and is licking up the grass and sage brush beyond. Now it runs round to the left and their way is clear.

Morazan half stops, shudders, staggers on, and then a dreadful cry rends the air, such a shrill, awful scream as nothing could give vent to but a horse in the throes of agony and fright.

Carolos' eyelashes and hair are singed, and his face is burnt, while his throat is full of sharp cutting pain, but he does not heed it, he hears only that dreadful cry, and again feels Morazan tremble, stagger, and then he is conscious that the brave horse is falling.

He throws his arms round Morazan's neck.

"Adorado!" he cries faintly, and then everything becomes a blank.

A carriage driven furiously up the road, down below, has held witnesses of this wild race; several men also are behind the carriage on horse-back.

It is the Señor Bertram with men he has gathered on the way; they have seen the fire and have hastened to the rescue of the boys.

When Carolos regained consciousness Señor Bertram was bending over him, his face working with emotion.

"Ted," whispered Carolos. His throat was so parched he could scarcely speak.

"Ted is all right, thanks to you, my brave boy," answered Ted's father unsteadily.

"And—Morazan?" Carolos asked faintly.

Señor Bertram did not answer for a moment, and Carolos covered his eyes with his hand, while a bitter sob burst from his lips.

"He is dead!" he said chokingly.

Bertram very gently drew Carolos' hand away and said kindly:

"He is not dead, my boy, and if money and care can save the noble animal, he shall live. Now our first duty is to you."

Kind hands lifted the brave boy into the carriage and he was taken home at once.

Some of the men went on to fight the fire and try to save the cattle, and the remainder stayed to attend to the noble horse whose courage and faithfulness had saved Carolos and Ted from an awful death.

And Morazan did not die. Indeed, he was well long before Carolos, whose burns were serious, and who will carry disfiguring scars upon his face as long as he lives.

During his illness he received the tenderest care, nor did he ever afterward lack for love, for the Señor Bertram adopted him and educated him as his own son.

Carolos is a man now, and in Central America he owns a fine home of his own, and a bright, dark-faced little boy calls him father. Among Carolos' most cherished treasures are the Mexican saddle, bridle, and lasso, and Morazan himself, now very old but tenderly cared for.

Frequently little Enrico goes for a walk with his father and beautiful young mother in the plaza and they invariably stop in front of the bronze statue of Morazan, the great general, and Enrico begs his father to tell him again the story of their own beloved Morazan, a story of which he never wearies; and Carolos relates for the hundredth time the story of Morazan's last race.

Lolita's Little Plan.

In the house of "El Chatto," ex-bull fighter of Madrid and at present performing before the Mexican public, there was dire dismay, owing to the low state—the very low state—of the family exchequer.

This sad state of affairs is common to many people among the members of the bull-fighting fraternity, who are not esteemed now as they once were.

This is, however, only in Mexico; whatever else may come and go in Spain, bull-fighting is always with them.

"El Chatto" (meaning "The Snubnose") had just finished taking his morning chocolate and roll, assisted by his pretty wife, Lolita, who also had been a member of the noble army of bull-fighters—in fact, first female espada in the big ring at Seville—but this was a secret.

A career that might possibly have been glorious had been cut short by "El Chatto," who had loved her, and married her.

But that was several years ago.

Successful, fêted and honoured in Cuba and afterwards in Mexico, "El Chatto's" prosperity had not lasted long, for soon had come the edict that bull-fighting in Mexico must stop.

A few desultory fights were still allowed, by which a torero could certainly not make a fortune.

This morning, the day before the bull-fight in honour of the fiesta of San Marcos, "El Chatto," needing some spare silver for the furbishing up of his costume, had turned out his pockets, with the assistance of Lolita.

Investigation revealed one big silver peso, one fifty-cent piece, one ten-cent piece and fourteen copper centavos.

Not enough to pay coach-hire, even!

Carramba! Here was a pretty mess! No wonder that "El Chatto" leisurely and calmly spoke some naughty words during the next half hour, the while Lolita tranquilly drank her chocolate, and then lit a cigarette, her dimpled face very serious all the time, as though in deep cogitation.

At last "El Chatto" glared about him, as though in search of some one to fight.

Lolita smiled at him sweetly, removing the cigarette from her pretty lips, as she murmured:

"Have you finished, my dear?"

A shrug of the shoulders was her husband's reply.

"Then listen, oh, most worthless husband, for I have a plan—a plan most magnificent; thereby we will make a fortune—sufficient for the voyage once more to Spain."

She stopped tantalisingly, and puffed at her cigarette, while "El Chatto" looked at her unbelievingly.

"This is how it is," she pursued, blowing a ring of smoke into the air; "the empresario pay you little—very little—only a hundred silver dollars—is it not so?"

"Si, that is all—the pigs!" growled at the torero; "and after this there will be no fight for weeks—no more money!"

"Then we will make more out of them—much more. But first, friend of my heart, will many rich people go to this fight—the president with his wife, the De la Matas, and those other rich Spaniards?"

"Yes, all of them," replied "El Chatto," who was as yet mystified, not understanding the subtle workings of his wife's brain; "but what have they to do with that wonderful plan of yours?"

Lolita smiled again, and playfully pulled her husband's ear.

"They have much to do—much!" she whispered, seating herself on the arm of his chair and pulling his moody face down to hers. "Listen, marido mio: this is the plan! But take care that no one hears us!"

No one hears—not even ourselves—it is whisper, whisper, whisper, and finally a loud shout of delight from "El Chatto." It must be something good—what a shame we are not let into the secret!

To-morrow seems such a long time in coming, but finally it is here—all balmy, blue sky, with never a white cloud to mar it; soft, warm breezes, laden with the perfume of roses and lilies that are just beginning to bloom.

On the cheap side—"the side of the sun"—white-garmented peons, with big sombreros, choke up every inch of space, and shout and yell loudly during the performance. As for the shady side, it is well filled—with rich Spaniards at that—for which reason the heart of Lolita rejoices; the more Spaniards, the more money.

"Ojala that there were nothing but Spaniards," she thinks.

She has purposely taken a seat just behind the first barrier of the bull-ring—not seven feet above the ground where her husband will kill his bull—"so that she can see him better," as she lisps to an admiring Mexican fighter, who wishes her to go into one of the boxes.

In her Sevillan costume, the silk mantilla exposing just enough of her Spanish eyes and dimpled chin to make people want to see more.

Lolita is by far the most admired woman in the Plaza, distracting attention even from the beautiful banderilla work that "El Largo" is going through in the ring. Many glasses are pointed at the little Española, as she so demurely watches for her husband.

Seated alone in his box, the prince of bankers, old Franquillo, drops his glass and sighs; perhaps if a girl like that one yonder had lived instead of passing away from him during the first poverty-stricken month of their married life, there in Barcelona, he would not now be a lone, forlorn man, without home, chick or child—only the money.

For though money is good, it doesn't always fill every chink of the heart!

Lolita, in spite of that sweet, shy demureness of hers, has noted the effect of her Spanish costume; she rejoices within herself, even though she is beginning to tremble a wee bit, and wishes it were not yet time for her husband to kill the bull.

She again measures the distance between herself and the ground; it is seven feet—quien sabe!

She is trembling from her dainty head down to her tiny Spanish slippers all the time that "El Largo" is torturing the furious, pawing bull with his sharp banderillas.

She clasps her hands tightly together, as, finally tiring of the banderilla work—which, in fact, has been somewhat long drawn out, "on account of the matador 'El Chatto's' sudden illness and faintness"—the public of the sunny side begin to shout:

"El matador! Kill the bull! We want the matador! El matador!"

The gate swings open at last, and "El Largo" still teases the bull as "El Chatto" moves forward slowly, and bows first to the president and then to the public.

In spite of his magnificent silver and violet costume, the gold lace and real bullion trimming, with cape of gold brocade, he looks deathly ill—his eyes show great black rings that extend almost half-way down his face.

Every one remarks it, and a foreigner, who has looked keenly at the bull-fighter, says sharply:

"That fellow ought to go home: he's in no condition to fight!"

But "El Chatto" is game if he is ill—perhaps the presence of his wife inspires him with fresh courage, for he unsheathes his bright, keen sword, nods briefly to "El Largo," who gets out of the way, smiles once at Lolita, who is, beneath her mantilla, far whiter than he; then he makes a tantalising movement at the bull.

That animal—one of the huge, fiery Andalusians that are the very terror of Mexican bull-fighters—comes on with a roar of fury, head swinging low to the ground, and the angry foam flying. "El Chatto" dodges, and places himself nearer the wall to meet the bull's return rush.

On he comes again, with an angry bellow, and "El Chatto" shakes the sword playfully in the brute's face, as is the Spanish custom—six or seven fancy passes, and then the kill.

After all, no one can fight a bull as does the Spanish matador. At least, during "El Chatto's" splendid work of the next seven minutes that is what the people think. All of them are on their feet, shrieking, some breathless with delight! Silver dollars, and hats, and flowers rain down into the ring, but "El Chatto" has not time to bow his thanks; he is too busy avoiding the plunges of the Andalusian.

On her feet, as is everybody else, for that matter, Lolita is watching every motion, her heart beating in great leaps, and so excited and wrought up now that she has forgotten to feel afraid.

Bull and matador are just underneath her, and twice her husband has glanced at her significantly; she is watching with her heart in her eyes. One pass of the sword before the bull's eyes; one leap over his back; one pass of the sword backward over the shoulder; now then, a-h-h!

In the twinkling of an eye there goes up from the thousands of people a loud groan of horror, pity, and terror.

For in a second it happens that the matador, suddenly reeling, after a fancy pass at the bull, has cast one agonised look up at his wife, and fallen prone on the ground.

The bull does not see, for the impetus of his last charge has taken him several feet beyond the matador. At the latter's side, on the ground, is the bright sword, that now will not save him.

The man was ill, unable to fight.

But before the people have well seen that, however, there is a quick leap and a flash; a slight childish figure is in the ring, her mantilla is cast back, the pink rose has fallen into the dust; her tiny white hands have caught up the sword.

As the bull swings madly forward, she meets him. He is an enormous beast, and to be on a line even with his shoulder she has to rise on tiptoe. She does it. Her face is white and calm as the brute rushes at her lowering his head. She springs forward and upward; the sword sinks out of sight in the bleeding shoulder—no fancy passes for her—the bull topples over on his knees, the blood gushing out in torrents. He is disabled—dying!

As for the spectators, they have passed from horror-stricken silence and terror into hysterical shouts, screams, applause, and even tears. Every woman in the audience is weeping copiously. Every man is shrieking, and stamping, and applauding at the top of his voice (in his heart envying the matador) as the girl, who has in some mysterious way revived her husband, rises to her feet, and the two stand together for a moment, bowing.

Then comes the exciting part of it. Out come purses and coins and even jewels from the rich ladies present, and masses of flowers. Amid shouts of "Bravo!" down it all pours into the ring. As for the great banker, Franquillo—who is so excited that he can hardly move—down goes his footman with a message to "La Española!"

Not waiting to bow or to thank the people, so overcome is she with her tremendous success, Lolita flies from the ring, leaving "El Chatto" to bow, and place his hands over his heart and bow again. It is all she can do to tremblingly thank the bearer of a message from the banker, Franquillo, who has promised her a cheque for five hundred pounds.

So that Lolita's little plan worked well after all—so well that five days later she and her husband left for Spain, where, having added much more money to the banker's gift, they have now retired and are great people.

And "El Chatto" says always that he owes his success to his wife—which is not understood, very naturally, by the Spaniards of Spain.

A MISUNDERSTANDING had come between myself and landlady. My bill was sadly in arrears, and Mrs. Ringwood, having passed from frowns to words and from words to importunity, had ended with a peremptory demand for payment.

Not being ready or having the ready money to comply with her requirement, I had nothing for it but to vacate my room and surrender my key, the former being wanted, I was given to understand, for Mr. MacIntyre, an old customer of Mrs. Ringwood, whom she was under a standing promise to accommodate, and whose arrival was hourly expected.

Mr. MacIntyre, I may here say, was Mrs. Ringwood's Mrs. Harris, a convenient myth, one who never came, but was always coming when a delinquent lodger was to be got rid of.

I had come to the town to be an author, but my efforts with the pen to scrape acquaintance with fame and fortune had not proved over successful.

Down to my last half-crown, with no immediate prospect of another, and wearied with a long search for a cheap lodging, where terms were not "invariably in advance," I sat me down in an out-of-the-way eating-house to face a tough beefsteak, and the still tougher question of what was best to be done.

A grave-looking gentleman sat opposite, dividing his attention between a bottle of wine and the evening paper.

"What a bungling set these detectives are!" said the gentleman, whose tone left it doubtful whether he spoke to himself or me.

"Why," he continued, addressing me this time, "here's that bank robbery nearly a week old, and with every clue to guide them; yet those who should have been hot on the scent within an hour, still stand gaping, with their fingers in their mouths. Things were managed differently in my day."

"You were a detective once?" I ventured to surmise.

He nodded.

"There is a reward—is it very large?" I asked.

"Five hundred pounds," he answered, "for the recovery of the property and capture of the thief."

"'Twould be a quick way to make money," said I, "if one knew how to go about it."

"Would you like to go halves in making the effort?" he queried, summing me up with a scrutinising glance.

"I fear I should be of little service," I returned. "I have had no experience in such matters, and am almost a stranger in the city."

"The very thing to render your aid invaluable! This crime is evidently not the work of a novice, and to your professional thief every detective's face is as familiar as a pal's. The mere sight of one puts the game to flight. Under skilful guidance you could work unsuspected. Now, if you'll put yourself in my hands for thirty-six hours, I believe we can bag the prize. What say you; is it a bargain?"

It was not exactly the road to fortune I had set out in, but it looked like a shorter cut at starting. At any rate, my circumstances were desperate, and I saw no better chance to mend them.

"I accept your offer," I said,

"Come along, then," said the stranger, rising; and having settled our scores we left the place together.

In the street he took my arm, and after a long walk through unfrequented by-streets my companion called a halt before a sombre-looking house, into which he admitted us with a latch-key. He led the way upstairs to a shabbily furnished apartment, in which a dim light was burning.

We sat down and my companion was beginning to unfold his plans when a knock was heard at the door.

He held up his finger in token of silence.

The knock was three times repeated in a peculiar manner, when my host got up and cautiously opened the door.

A man stood outside with his hat pulled over his eyes.

"Excuse me a moment," said my companion, stepping out and closing the door.

I heard low and earnest voices in the passage, but only distinguish the words:

"Train for London at 7. Aberdeen train at 8.30."

Soon there was a sound of departing footsteps, and the door of the room opened and the proprietor entered.

"I've no time to explain further now," he said. "Meet me at the Central Station in time for the 7 o'clock train to London.

"But I have no money," I answered.

"I'll see to that," he replied.

There was little time to lose, and I rose to go.

"Would you mind carrying this bag?" said he. "I have a short stop to make by the way, besides having a larger one to look after."

I received from his hand the article in question, which was small and light.

As I was half an hour early, and it was rather chilly on the platform, I thought I would step just inside the telegraph office, while watching for my friend.

I had once been a telegraph clerk, and there was a fascination for me in the clicking of the instrument. Of course, I had learnt to read messages by the ear; I naturally fell to reading the clicks. It is said eavesdroppers rarely hear good of themselves, and the present case, though the listening was involuntary, proved no exception.

Judge of my amazement when I heard clicked off, in a language to me as plain as speech, a full description of my person and everything pertaining to me, down to the bag in my hand, in which latter it was said would be found a portion of the bonds stolen from the Amalgamated Bank. I did not stay to hear what followed, which was doubtless an order for my immediate arrest.

The truth at once flashed upon me. I had been made the dupe of the real culprit, who had sought to cover his own retreat by a ruse of which I was to be the victim.

I left the station and walked away rapidly, keeping to the side streets as much as possible, and had gone a considerable distance before venturing to stop a policeman and inquire the way to the police station or office where I could see the chief of the detective force.

Following the directions, I lost no time in presenting myself to Inspector White.

"I think I have discovered the man who is wanted for the Bank robbery," said I, as coolly as I could.

"It'll be money in your pocket and a feather in your cap if you have," said he, eyeing me curiously. "It's very queer, though," he added, looking from me to a paper before him.

I proceeded to give a complete narrative of what had occurred since my falling in with the pretended ex-detective, expressing the opinion that the latter would be found taking the 7 o'clock train for London.

"The telegram for your arrest," said the Inspector "was sent by myself on information coming from an unknown source, but which I did not feel at liberty to neglect. Your coming directly here speaks in your favour. But let us see what is in the bag."

It was speedily opened, and in it was found a package of the missing bonds, a description of which was in the possession of the authorities. In giving them up my late acquaintance had sacrificed but little, as there would have been small chance of disposing of them, while putting them in my possession was a cunning device to divert suspicion from himself to me.

A cab was called, and in company with the Inspector and two subordinates I was taken to the Central Station, which we reached a few minutes before the departure of the train.

Snugly ensconced in a first class carriage, we discovered the object of our search, and in whom the officers recognised an old acquaintance. In his possession was found all the stolen money and securities except those he had placed in my hands.

I was formally detained till next morning when Mrs. Ringwood and two of her lodgers, the former being kind enough not to mention my little delinquency toward herself, gave so good an account of me, and proved so clearly that I was quietly at home at the time of the robbery, that I was discharged.

I got the £500, ceased to court the muses but married Nancy Walker, gave up poetry for journalism, and have found, if not fame, at least something like a fortune in it.

I'VE FOUND IT AT LAST.

When I read the fourth of the Indian Mutiny stories, entitled "The Lights at the Delhi Gates," I was somewhat dissatisfied with the apparently abrupt finish, and wrote to the author asking him if he could give an explanation of the mystery. He replied saying that had the story been fiction, he could have created a mystery, and, after arousing the curiosity of the reader, explain it away; but these stories are truthful, and the facts stated in them are absolutely correct. The mystery of the Delhi Gate was a mystery to all those in Delhi at the time, and has remained a mystery ever since. If any reader can clear it up I shall be pleased to award a gold-plated pencil-case to the sender of what I consider to be the best attempt.

C. A.—On the whole, Ireland has the most equable climate of any country in Europe.

M. A. S. asks: "Why is it that, generally speaking, female criminals get off with lighter sentences than men?"———It may be that our inborn tenderness towards the weaker sex has something to do with it. But it may also be due to the knowledge that imprisonment has a more severe effect on women than on men, and that equality of sentence does not mean equality of punishment.

Rose.—No; roses never grow upon the tree which gives us the wood called rosewood. The name was given to that wood because, when cut, it gives off a perfume like that of roses.

T. H.—The obelisk originally represented a ray of the sun—the sun having been worshipped as the Supreme Spirit. They were erected in pairs, usually at the entrance to the temple; sometimes they supported a disc of the sun, and stood upon a pyramid, that combination presumably representing resurrection—life from the tomb. There were priests of the obelisk.

Jill would like to know if there is any daily paper run entirely by women.———The Fronde, of Paris, is the only paper in the world started, written, edited, set up, and printed by women. It is run on the same lines as any other daily, except that its object is to give prominence to women's share of work. A quarter of a million copies were sold of the first issue, and it has been a great success. The reporters are women.

Z. I.—The reading of romances is forbidden by the Koran; hence popular tales are not committed to writing, but are passed from one storyteller to another. No doubt this is the origin of many stories which, although differing greatly in substance, have a common idea as their basis.

F. T.—Small feet are not necessarily pretty feet. The pretty—that is the well-shaped—foot is usually short because the instep is well arched. Greek women had a longer foot than the ordinary man of the present time.

Weed.—Smoking is allowed in the prisons of Belgium only as a reward for good behaviour.

J. L.—It is estimated that only one person in fifteen has perfect eyesight. In many people the left eye is of a focus quite different from that of the right eye. The larger percentage of defectiveness prevails among fair-haired persons.

E. G.—In engineering enterprises there is one man killed to (approximately) every £50,000 spent on work.

Jovial asks: "What was the 'Friendly Club,' and is it still in existence?"———The Friendly Club was established in the City of London in 1695; it was afterwards called the Centenary Club, and appears to have died a natural death some few years ago. It was made famous by its eccentric rules. It had a "father," a "mother," and a high steward among its officers. If the members were honoured in any way, they had to pay a fine. In 1791, a member paid five shillings for enjoying the honour of kissing the hand of the Princess of Wales. As late as 1850 the Lord Mayor paid a like amount because he had the honour of receiving the Prince Consort at the Mansion House.

D. G.—Marseilles is the chief market for the sale and purchase of human hair.

Kah-tal.—It was noted as a curious fact by Sir Samuel Baker that a negro never tamed an elephant or a wild animal. "You might travel all over Africa," he said, "and never see a wild animal trained and petted by the native." It often struck him that the little children had no animal pets.

Art.—The longest artificial waterway in the world is the Grand Canal of China, extending from Pekin to Canton, a distance of about 1,000 miles.

Stone.—A ruby of the best quality, of more than three carats, is worth more than a diamond of the same size and weight.

Candle.—The smoke from the wick of a candle, after it has been blown out, is poisonous; it should never be allowed to vitiate the air of a room. Some men played a trick on a sleeping boy, placing the blown-out candle close to his nose; after half-an-hour the boy's breathing became hard, he had a fit of trembling and cramps, and he died in three days.

L.—Brazil furnishes about half the world's supply of coffee.

Piano.—Probably the earliest mention of the pianoforte in connection with public performances is that contained in a play-bill dated May 16th, 1767. The principle attraction is given thus: "Miss Buckler will sing a song from Judith, accompanied by a new instrument called 'the pianoforte.'"

K. T.—There is nothing extraordinary in the fact that the Eskimo has his kayak, or canoe, made to fit him; if the little craft were a misfit, he would feel just as uncomfortable as you would in a pair of tight boots or a hat several sizes too large.

W.—To drink wine without diluting it with water was regarded as a barbarism by both Greeks and Romans.

Moon.—In many Continental villages—chiefly among the Teutonic peoples—a child born at the time of the full moon is supposed to have the gift of oratory.

N.—The horse succumbs to cold more quickly than any other animal.

Sign.—Biblical signboards were common at one time, and even now there are no fewer than seven taverns in London bearing the sign of "Adam and Eve." One of these is intimately connected with Sheridan. "The Two Spies" refers to the two Hebrews who reconnoitred the Promised Land; this sign is still in use. "The Bible" was a sign used by booksellers, and up till a comparatively recent date there was a tavern with that sign near Temple Bar. "Samson's Castle" still stands in that part of the Metropolis known as the Borough. Absolom was used by wig-makers.

UNTOLD TALES OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.

By H. HUNTER.

V.—AN UNREHEARSED TRAGEDY.

MEERUT—Friday evening, May the 8th, 1857, Lieutenant Harvey, of the 11th Regiment of Native Infantry, was standing in the veranda of his capacious bungalow reading a letter. His buggy was at the door.

He was descending the steps leading from the house when a messenger approaching had handed him a document.

It was inclosed in a long blue official-looking envelope, and the Lieutenant had taken it with all ill grace, a clouded brow, and a muttered expletive.

He was impatient to shake off the dust of the cantonment from his feet for a while—to forget in the dewy lips and laughing eyes, which would be sure to greet him in the pleasant bower whither he was bound, all the work and worry of the week; the troubles past, the fears present, the doubts of what might be to come.

There had been a good deal of feeling exhibited in the station during the week.

The occasion for it had been the action of Carmichael Smyth, who commanded the 3rd Native Cavalry, in ordering a parade of his men. Many of the European officers had handled him without gloves at the mess tables.

Some had openly denounced him before mixed company at the Commissioner's.

"He was a hard man," said they; "harsh in manner, cold, unsympathetic, and uncharitable."

A few had not scrupled to abuse him in the Lines.

The General had gone about lamenting that the Colonel should have forced a crisis and shown how little confidence he had in his men.

There was no doubt that Smyth had made himself the most unpopular man in the station.

There was an uncomfortable feeling in the bungalows of the Europeans that there might possibly be an interruption to the social gaieties, the pleasures and amenities of the great military cantonment to the north of Delhi.

Lieutenant Harvey tore open the envelope in the expectation of finding some unwelcome duty interposing itself between him and his weekly visit to Guln reganj.

The general Court-martial on the eighty-five troopers of the 3rd Cavalry who had refused to take the new cartridge had found the men guilty, and a punishment parade of all arms had been ordered at daybreak on Saturday, May the 9th. This, of itself, promised to entail upon Lieutenant Harvey no inconsiderable hardship in the shape of a double journey with only a few hours between; since he would have to come in to attend the parade; and drive out to the village again in the evening, if he wished to spend Sunday in the scented garden, where lived, with her own people, Zinat, the native girl, whose youthful grace and maiden beauty had captured the Lieutenant's too easily surrendered heart.

"Another croak from the croakers," he ejaculated mentally as he extracted a neatly folded sheet of Regimental note from the depths of the big envelope. Without doubt the communication had something to do with the wretched piece of business for which Colonel Smyth was getting all the blame.

The personal inconvenience which he was likely to suffer from the "stupidity" of the cavalry colonel was the chief thing uppermost in Lieutenant Harvey's mind at the moment.

"No," said he, fairly surprised, when at last the letter was opened, and disclosed the familiar script of an officer in the 60th Rifles, who acted as stage manager to the Military Theatre, "from Taylor. Bah Jove!

'Final rehearsal,'" he read; "'full dress—6.30 a.m., Monday. Mrs. Craigie and Miss Chambers had been working like niggers to get the dresses finished for the women's parts. They have just sent me word that I may depend on having them to-morrow, before tiffin.

"'We shall have a swell house on Monday night, old man.

"'Commissioner Fraser, I hear, is bringing over a party from Delhi. Little Bobbie Brown, of the 20th, has been practising the dying fall till he's that sore he can hardly move. He does it beautifully now.

"'Mrs. Scandalmonger whispered that a certain handsome Lieutenant in the 11th was safe to be off to the dove cot early to-morrow, so I'm sending this to-day by Gholam Singh. You must make one of us at dinner to-morrow night, old chap. No refusals accepted. Miss C. will be your left hand supporter.

"'Your mare can take you out to the Peri under thirty minutes; and 'detained at quarters' is always an available excuse.

"'Herein fail not at your peril.

"'Beastly nuisance this P.P. at four in the morning, isn't it? Can't we work a 'gag' or two for the benefit of the disturber of the Pax Britannica?'"

"Humph!" muttered Harvey, who had a vivid recollection of the dismal wailings of Colonel Smyth after his return from the great fair at Hardwar, "Cassandra in boots and breeches, eh? Doing his best to bring his own prophecies to pass, of course. Yes, bah Jove! I have it—clean and classical. A line from the knights of Aristophanes; though I daresay the old man would appreciate it better if it was less Greek and more Gaelic."

Lieutenant Harvey chuckled, scribbled a few words on the flysheet of the letter, tore it off, folded it, wrote Captain Taylor's name in the corner, and gave it to the messenger who had been squatting on his hams at the bottom of the steps, impassive as a bronze statue; but silently studying every line and feature of the Lieutenant's face as he rapidly scanned the contents of the Captain's missive.

Gholam Singh placed the letter in his turban salaamed and departed. Lieutenant Harvey climbed into his buggy, whipped up his mare, and driving rapidly past the Sipáhi Cantonment huts, past the gardens and trees of the compounds, and along the great Mall which divided the station into native and European, finally gained the dusty road which led through hamlet and village down to the Calcutta Gate of the Imperial City, forty miles away.

Harvey however, had only a drive of five miles in front of him! and before he had gone two, the rapid motion and the grateful breeze had dispelled the blue devils which had oppressed him on starting and given him a new outlook all round.

He saw nothing in the picture to excite suspicion; heard nothing dropped that would excuse the cry of "wolf."

There was nothing to be seen or heard, but the usual sights and sounds of an Indian landscape—the watchman at the village gate, the crowd at the well, the naked mendicant by the road, the temple in the grove, the story-teller under the banyan, the juggler on the green.

Rural India was Happy Arcadia; and after this little breeze which Smyth had whistled up had blown over, the atmosphere might perhaps be all the better for the hurly-burly.

The Lieutenant flicked off the flies which were tormenting the mare's neck and shoulders and let his thoughts wander.

He saw himself on the stage of the Garrison Theatre playing lover to Miss Chambers, the sister of his Adjutant.

The girl had only come out to India quite recently, having been brought over by her brother as companion to his newly married wife.

She was a tall, blonde beauty, with a marvellous complexion, and an abundance of animal spirits which made her the adored of the men and the envied of the women. The pitiless sun had not yet begun to lay its fiery finger on her youthful bloom and rosy freshness.

A good pianist, a better singer, she was much sought after by the hostesses of the great military station in Upper India, where her brother, Captain Chambers, was quartered. Fond of theatricals, Miss Chambers made a very clever actress; and having already achieved distinguished success in tragedy, had been cast for the principle female rôle in the piece that was down for performance on Monday night.

Lieutenant Harvey rather thought that he should enjoy the part assigned to him; for though the sweet English girl in her stage character had to inform him of her inability to return his affection, he would have opportunities such as many fellows he knew would gladly give a year's seniority to possess.

He fell a-musing, and found himself wondering how many times he had rehearsed the piece without once grasping the fact that the mimic tragedy of the stage would perhaps really require but a look, a gesture, a movement to convert it into the sordid tragedy of the street.

Thinking thus, his hand went to his pocket. When he drew it forth he had a curiously folded scrap of paper between his fingers. He looked at it for a moment with a queer dimming of the eye, passed the reins over to the native groom who was riding on the shaft, and slowly unfolded the small thin sheet he had abstracted from the pocket of his jacket.

"I firmly believe that girl would lay down her life for me," he murmured under his breath.

He gazed at the paper with eager attention for a long minute. It was covered in one corner with native characters, but the flowing Persian was as easily decipherable by Lieutenant Harvey as if it had been the most prosaic English.

"Lord of my life," it ran, "my heart panteth after thee, and refuseth to be satisfied until my eyes shall behold thee.

"Strange tidings have been brought hither. Come to me, my beloved, that I may satisfy myself with thy presence. Do not tarry but come swiftly, for one shall be taken and another shall be left.

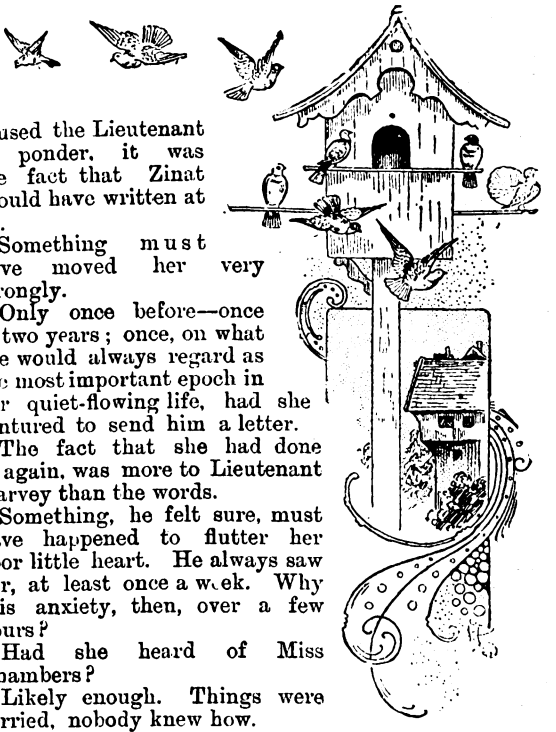
"Folly is at the finger ends of fools.

"They will dig up the house floors and level the cities.

"Come, thou desire of my heart; my soul will not fail to speak, and the daughters of music, the women who sit in the Meena Bazaar, shall be brought low."

The letter had been brought to Meerut by a dâk runner, who had delivered it before noon, saying that he was to take back an answer.

The exuberance and floridity of the language were the mere commonplaces of the Orient. They meant much or little, according to the speaker and the circumstances of the moment. It was not the phrasing which caused the Lieutenant to ponder, it was the fact that Zinat should have written at all.



Something must have moved her very strongly.

Only once before—once in two years; once, on what she would always regard as the most important epoch in her quiet-flowing life, had she ventured to send him a letter.

The fact that she had done it again, was more to Lieutenant Harvey than the words.

Something, he felt sure, must have happened to flutter her poor little heart. He always saw her, at least once a week. Why this anxiety, then, over a few hours?

Had she heard of Miss Chambers?

Likely enough. Things were carried, nobody knew how.

By the silent, salaaming, shadowy figures we call servants probably. Walls had eyes as well as ears in India. Night and day one was under observation by the natives. Dumb cattle with human passions.

The women in the harems were always well posted in all that went on outside. Yes, poor little Zinat was jealous of the memsahib; and now Taylor's letter would force him to inflict upon her still further pain.

He would certainly have to tell her that he couldn't possibly come over again till after gunfire on Sunday morning.

Two faces peered up at him out of the ghostly Indian twilight—one, a light golden brown with fathomless dark eyes; the other, a creamy white with a rose flush under the skin, and eyes of heavenly blue.

"Poor little girl," he said aloud. "I believe she'd die for me. But I wish—I wish to-night I'd never seen her."

He folded up the letter carefully, replaced it in his pocket, took the reins from the groom, struck the mare a quite unnecessary blow between the ears, and seven minutes later was at the end of his journey.

II.

MEERUT—Saturday night. Twenty-four hours after Lieutenant Harvey handed to Gholam Singh his reply to Captain Taylor's epistle.

The eighty-five troopers who had been stripped of their uniforms in the morning, and, fettered and shackled, had been marched out of the cantonment to the gaol, were safe under lock and key, in the great Civil Prison, two miles away.

In the European quarters dinner parties were in full swing.

Commissioner Greathed was dining with Colonel

Finnis. General Hewitt was the guest of the Brigadier. The Meerut Amateurs were being entertained by the 60th Rifles.

Compliments were being exchanged across flower-decked tables, congratulations were being offered over brimming beakers while the silent attention of the dusky attendants—obsequious and deferential as ever the sparkle of glass, the gleam of silver, the ripple of laughter and the flashing of bright eyes, lent to the scene a sense of security as delusive as it was deadly.

Nothing had happened, nothing would happen.

To-day was the same as yesterday.

To-morrow would be a copy of to-day. It was "well over"; and now things, of course, would go on as usual.

The painful incidents of the punishment parade were already forgotten.

But across the deep nullah which cut the station in two, there was shame, sorrow, indignation, and resentment. The memory of that mournful morning had been burnt into the brain of every native in the Company's service by the stinging taunts and bitter gibes of the women in the bazaars.

On one side of the ditch, light and laughter; on the other, darkness and despair.

The native city was alive with rumour. The native lines were sullen with discontent. The emissaries of sedition had done their work well. They had secured the services of the women, and the men were meditating revenge.

"Bismillah!" growled Hoosein Duffadar, of the 3rd Cavalry, throwing himself on the bare ground, "that I should live to be chased and hooted by a slip of a thing out of the Chandni Chowk at Delhi."

He had gone into the city in the evening, but the story of the morning was all over the bazaars, and the cavalrymen had returned to brood and brawl in the Lines.

"Didst hear the greeting they gave us at the Gujar-Mahál?" asked a voice out of the darkness, and immediately began to hum a line from a vile gutter song.

"Khamoosh!" shouted the Jemadar of No. 4 troop, who was on his way to a muster of Cavalry non-coms.

"Be silent! Protection of God! Have you no respect for your beard then; or hasn't it grown yet?"

"Sure, the women, Jemadar," replied the man, "have not left a rag amongst the regiment. The moolahs have stirred up the bazaars, and they who look out of the windows make mock of us, while the eighty-five sit behind stone walls."

"See here," said a tall sowar, holding forth his hand in which lay two tiny circlets of shining metal, "Azee would not show me her face, but she sent me her anklets. 'Wear them,' she said, 'till you've proved your manhood by striking off the ornaments which the Feringhees have fastened on the ankles of your brethren.'"

"Inshalla! What say you, sowars of the 3rd? Are we who wear these," striking his sabre and clinking his spurs, "to be flouted in the bazaars and not have a word to fling back?"

"Nurfiz," put in the man whose singing had been cut short by the Jemadar, "and the fair ones who lodge in the Taumbi Bazaar, flung their *Burkas over the men of Number Two troop, bidding them carry them back with them to hide in, when the Feringhees shall have got ready the two thousand bracelets which the smiths are busy making."

"Alla Ke Qoodrut!" exclaimed Hoosein savagely, starting up and stamping his spurred heel. "Coward, I am not; and I go no more to the bazaar till the eighty-five are brought back. The women are right. We are no men to let them stay in prison while the Feringhees are forging fetters for the rest."

"Hoosein has spoken," said a fresh voice. "To-morrow the Sahibs go to pray and sing in their temple. It will be a good time, Duffadar."

* * * * *

"It's all rot, you know, Jemmy. Moonshine and water, my dear fellow, moonshine and water. The old woman's been gadding about the bazaars, picking up the gossip of the gutter, and frightening the girl with her silly twaddle. The tales that woman has pitched are really past joking.

"The poor little thing's been just stuffed full of lies. Fancied I was to be set up as a mark for the men to shoot at.

"Sent for me on purpose to show me a hole in the wall—a secret hiding-place where she would conceal me from the budmashis.

"I gave old mother Fatmah the rough side of my tongue and a pretty big piece of my mind.

"There's nothing moving outside, old man. The niggers are as quiet as lambs and as scared as chickens.

"I didn't meet with a single experience, going out or coming in unless it be one to have seen the strange mollah who was turned out of the Lines and took refuge in the city.

"I saw him preaching to a small crowd on the outskirts this morning as I came in. You can never tell when these people will be asleep.

"The flock scattered, and the shepherd spat on the ground as I drove past. It's time those beggars were taken down a peg."

"Well, I'm glad we've got it over, anyhow. I was afraid there was going to be a row when I saw the chaps on parade. And I feel half sorry, you know, for those poor devils in 'chokee.' The blame isn't all theirs. Smyth's landed us in a fine mess."

The speakers were Lieutenant Harvey and Captain Taylor, who were enjoying a quiet smoke in the garden, while the band was taking a rest before tuning up for dance music.

"Would have spoilt Monday night's 'bill,' I guess, if we'd had any trouble this morning, Jemmy."

"Smashed up the whole show, Charlie, lock, stock and barrel. In that case, our little company would have had to play their part in an unrehearsed tragedy."

"H'm!—ain't this getting rather dismal, Captain? Suppose we join the ladies."

* * * * *

"Alla, illa, llah! There is no God but God, and there is no fighting against Fate The girl has gone," muttered old Fatmah, gazing helplessly round the empty room.

"In the night-time, wrapped in the veil of darkness she hath fled.

"The sahib will be killed and the money will stop, and Fatmah will have to go back to Delhi and find a new master—for the sahiblogues at Meerut will be all sent to Jehannum.

"Narfiz hath heard it from the mollah, who was sent by the Moulvie of Faizabad to preach the holy war.

"'The old times,' said she, 'are to come again, and the chief women are to have new bangles, bell bangles of silver, and rings, finger rings, and nose rings of gold.'

"But I am too old," crooned Fatmah, "too old, and Zinat has gone. Poor fool," she murmured softly. "God keep us all! The girl gave me no peace. I had to tell the little one that the men were going out to the gaol while the sahibs were at prayers, that the sahibs would be killed and their houses burnt. Why did she send me to the bazaar if I wasn't to tell?

"Then, she would have it, poor fool, there was the news that Gholam Singh brought about the tall mem-sahib.

"Bismillah! yonder's her writing-box. Plague take it! that she was ever taught to write.

"Mischief, mischief is all that can come of making women wiser than the Prophet permits."

She sank on the floor amid the soft folds of her draperies, her head aside, her chin resting in the hollow of her hand.

She was listening.

Through the lattice of the window came a glint of saffron coloured light which told that the dawn was breaking.

From the native city three miles away came a low, confused murmur, which as it rose and swelled, the woman leant her ear to catch.

The native population was astir.

"Alla hafiz! May God protect you, my Pearl of Pearls," murmured the listener, thinking of the "little one" who had insisted on hearing all the news, including the gossip which Gholam Singh carried from the European quarter. 'Nobody ever would die if it wasn't the will of God."

* * * * *

Zinat, divided between love and jealousy; assailed by doubt and urged by fear, had gone to the Native Lines intending to warn her English lover of coming danger. But the Lieutenant was dining in the European quarter at the other end of the cantonment.

It was the first time the girl had ever been in the Lines; but, having no one she could trust, and realising the magnitude of the danger from the reports of old Fatmah, whom she sent daily to the bazaars; she had written a few words, wrapped herself in a burka, and slipped out, intending to give Harvey the letter and return at once to the house.

Learning, however, that he was with the sahibs in the North Camp, she determined to follow him thither—perhaps she would see the tall fair mem, about whom Gholam Singh had talked with old Fatmah. It was a long way round, she hardly knew how to find her way in the dark. Old Fatmah's tales have made her very miserable. Her world seemed toppling about her ears. Everything had suddenly changed its aspect for her. She was afraid of every white face but one.

Jealousy gnawing at her heart, love animating her soul, desperation whispering in her ear, she set out for the British Lines.

"What was that? It came from behind the castor oil trees and has gone into that bamboo clump."

The voice was feminine and the tone betrayed alarm.

Miss Chambers had found the atmosphere within doors oppressive, and Lieutenant Harvey had proposed a stroll in the garden.

They were saunte ing idly along the winding paths under the peaceful light of the tropic stars. The band had just struck up the first bars of "God save the Queen."

"Didn't you see it?" she asked, laying her hand upon her companion's arm.

"I'm afraid my attention was wholly occupied elsewhere," he said, casting a look full of admiration upon the beautiful face whose pretty smile had suddenly given place to a look of gravity. "What was it like?"

"Oh! I don't know—something white. It came out of the castor oil trees. I believe now, I saw it some minutes ago—on the other path."

"The breeze stirring the leaves often gives one the idea of a turban amongst the castor oil trees. It's been noticed by lots of people."

"Oh! but I saw it before. Yes, I'm sure I saw it before; and it wasn't a turban. It was—somebody's been watching us," she said abruptly. "I have a distinct impression that somebody's been watching us, and it makes me—uncomfortable."

He laughed scepti ally. "Nothing to be alarmed at, my dear Miss Chambers. Some native gardener, probably. These people are about at all hours, you know; and flit from pillar to post like shee ed ghosts.

"One gets used to it after a while. Hark! Confound their politics. Frustrate their knavish tricks. That sounds all right, doesn't it? Shall I take you in now—Nellie?"

Zinat meanwhile, having fled from the castor oil trees on the approach of Harvey and his companion, was flying she knew not whither—anywhere, anywhere, so it be away from the fair white faces of the mem-sahibs.

"I hate them, oh! I hate them," she cried; and, flinging herself face downwards in the long grass, the undelivered letter clutched close against her breast, she sobbed bitterly—so bitterly that oblivious of aught save the pain at her heart, she never felt the pin prick inflicted by that cold slimy thing which, gliding swiftly across her feet disappeared amongst the yellow blades of the tiger grass.

III.

Monday—mid-day May the 11th, 1857, round the doors of the Garrison Theatre at Meerut a small knot of men had gathered. They were conversing in low tones and subdued whispers. The grave looks they exchanged and the unmistakable air of depression which hung over the group, told all too clearly of calamity and disaster. Something untoward had happened.

The doors of the theatre had been open since before six o'clock. Men had been continually passing in and out. Frequently they were bearing a burden which they carried in mournful silence and handled with reverent care.

By mid-day, the boards of the pretty house, which was to have witnessed a mimic tragedy that very evening, were occupied by a silent company, a company who had been called upon without notice to play their part in the opening scene of the Great Unrehearsed Tragedy on which the curtain went up on the morning of the previous day, Sunday, May 10th.

Over a dozen mangled and mutilated bodies lay upon the stage; amongst them that of Mrs. Chambers, wife of the adjutant of the 11th Sepoys.

At 6 p.m. on Sunday, Major Whish had driven into Brigadier Wilson's compound with the news that the native troops were in mutiny.

The cavalrymen had broken into the gaol, liberated the military prisoners, and brought them back to the lines. Their action had stopped there, but the infantry was in open revolt.

Alas! while Brigadier Wilson was receiving the report of Major Whish, Colonel Finnis of the 11th was falling from his horse riddled with the bullets of the 20th.

In that great struggling cantonment, broken up into blocks and sections, and covering an area five miles in circumference, it was difficult to know what was passing on the other side of the wide mall which lay between the European barracks and the native lines. The native city itself, lay still further to the south and from every lane and every alley in that crowded area men were then pouring.

Butchers, porters, watercarriers, cutlers, all scenting plunder, and each ready for slaughter.

The budmashis of the bazaars, finding the gaol open, had released the convicts, and 800 cut-throats went forward with the rest, to help in the fiendish work which the young May moon was soon to look down upon.

The mutineers after throwing off their allegiance and shooting whatever officers happened to come in their way, had started in hot haste for Delhi. Most of the burning, the butchering, and the plundering of that memorable Sunday night was the work of the Hindoo and Mohammedan mob from the bazaars.

The men at the door of the Theatre moved aside as another mournful little procession passed in. They looked in dumb surprise at the motionless white figure which the bearers were carrying.

"Yes," said the officer who accompanied them, "she's a native. They picked her up this morning between the 60th Mess-house and the Dragoon Barracks."

"What was she doing over there?" queried one.

"Coming to warn us for a certainty," replied the officer, "and got bitten by a cobra. "Anybody seen Harvey? I've a letter for him."

"You'll find him inside, Taylor," from several.

"He went in ten minutes ago with poor Chambers," volunteered the man who had asked the question about the girl. "Lucky for Miss Chambers that she was with Mrs. Cragie when the mob broke into the Captain's bungalow. He's taking it badly poor fellow."

Captain Taylor passed on, leaving the group still lingering at the door.

They put the native girl in a corner by herself; and, Captain Taylor, drawing Lieutenant Harvey aside whispered a few words in his ear.

Harvey stooped down, and peered under the veil which concealed the features of the silent one. When he rose his eyes were wet with tears.

The Captain handed him a letter. "It fell out of her bosom when we turned her over," he said, looking down sorrowfully at the dead girl.

"She died for me, Jemmy," murmured the Lieutenant, with a break in his voice, as he caught the full meaning of the queer Persian characters. "If I'd only had this on Saturday night. . . . My God," he broke out vehemently, gazing with passionate burning eyes upon the white robed figure at his feet, as the remembrance of something Miss Chambers had said in the Mess garden came back to him with terrible new distinctness.

"Jemmy!" his eyes wandered over the shrouded forms lying there so still and quiet in the dusky light of the silent stage. "I feel very like a murderer," he gasped.

His mouth was at the other man's ear, and he continued to speak for some minutes:

"You've nothing to blame yourself for in this matter, old man," said the Captain, when the Lieutenant had finished speaking. "It's a woman's way, whatever be the colour of her skin. The little one was jealous poor thing. If it hadn't been for that 'damned vermin' she'd have returned when the fit was over. But I've just heard that B—— had a wife from Delhi in the evening which ought to have put us on the qui vive, but it came at an awkward moment and he slipped it into his mess jacket—and, straightway forgot all about it."

"I'd shoot myself if I were he," exclaimed Harvey, with savage earnestness. "Let's get outside, Taylor, the air in here is stifling. I shall never enter a theatre again without thinking of the Great Unrehearsed Tragedy at Meerut."

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

Time 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskdale's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney, of H.M.S. Magnificent, to Harington's sister, Ethel.

Lord Eskdale has very good reasons to believe that France and Germany are meditating an immediate invasion of England. He, therefore, dispatches Harington to London to warn the Premier, and Rodney to warn the British admiral established in the Mediterranean.

An attempt to land at Worthing is made by a combined French and German fleet of 36 ironclads, 40 troopships, and 100 smaller boats. The local volunteers hold them in check till the regulars arrive from London.

An inventor secures an audience with the Prince of Wales and demonstrates to him the utility of a new weapon, with the result that steps are immediately taken to manufacture an enormous number of them.

The Hornet, a torpedo boat, commanded by Rodney, blows up the Suez Canal. Paris is in a state of fermentation owing to the repulse of the Allied fleet.

CHAPTER IX.

IMPREGNABLE GIBRALTAR.

When Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour surveyed his fleet under the lee of the Rock, he felt that few British naval commanders had ever looked upon so goodly a company.

His flag was hoisted on board the Ramillies, and that of his second in command, Rear-Admiral Compton E. Domvile, on the Trafalgar. The other first-class battleships in the roads were the Anson, Barfleur, Camperdown, Collingwood, Hood, Howe, Nile, and Rodney. The torpedo-ram Polyphemus, the cruisers Hawke, Arethusa, Cambrian, Fearless, Scout, and Sybille, and the gunboats Ardent, Trial, Hebe, and Skipjack, were valuable additions to the British fighting force.

In the path of any vessels coming from Toulon, the Cockatrice and Surprise, fast dispatch vessels, kept watch and ward some sixty to seventy miles away.

Some French ships of war approached the Straits a few hours after the Mediterranean fleet had reached Gibraltar. They appeared vastly surprised to find such an array of heavy metal in their way. Without any effort to try conclusions with the British ships, they promptly executed a volte-face.

It was the general opinion on the Rock that these vessels constituted a small expedition, with some specific purpose in view, which was forestalled by the unexpected departure of the British fleet from Malta. As, in any case, the enemy could hardly expect the English to remain quietly anchored at Valleta, it was further argued that a very strong combined fleet must be massed near Toulon, and its advent might be speedily looked for.

Both of these surmises proved to be correct, and subsequent inquiry showed that the expeditionary force that had been frightened off was intended for operations in Canadian waters.

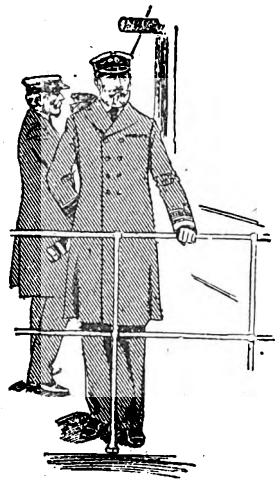
On Sunday afternoon the Seahorse—Commander Tully, having successfully run the gauntlet of the Bay—brought definite intelligence of the fight at Worthing. Great was the jubilation throughout the fleet, and greater still when the battleships Australia, Alexandra, Colossus, and Benbow arrived on Tuesday to reinforce the Mediterranean Squadron, conveying newspapers and letters detailing the effect of the repulse and the national preparations for a gigantic war.

But if hesitation and doubt prevailed at Paris and Berlin, these fearsome qualities were absent from the hearts of the French and German admirals who commanded the combined squadrons at Toulon.

Having long foreseen the necessity of effectually disabling the strong force of Great Britain in the inland sea, they had assembled eighteen fine battleships wherewith to smother the ten English vessels of similar calibre which formed the fighting-line of the Mediterranean fleet.



Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour.

Owing to the threatened bankruptcy of Italy, that country had been compelled to sell nearly one-third of her navy to Germany at the commencement of the year, whilst wholesale expenditure on the part of the allied Powers had already given them a considerable preponderance in armour-clads and first-class cruisers over the naval forces of England.

No fewer than twenty-one of the latter type of useful warship and fourteen torpedo gunboats were with the heavier vessels.

Against such odds it would seem, theoretically, that the British fleet, even when strengthened by four additional battleships, had no chance, as it must not be forgotten that surprise on either side was out of the question—and surprise was the prime factor in the success of Lord Charles Beresford's attack at Worthing.

When, therefore, early on Wednesday morning, long before the sun had cast the shadow of the Rock over the Bay towards Algeciras, the Surprise and Cockatrice steamed in to announce that a fleet of the dimensions just described was treading fast upon their heels, there is little wonder that Sir Michael Seymour's hurried conference with Rear-Admiral Domvile and the captain of ships was grave and serious. The problem before them was perplexing enough.

The Admiral's whole thought was given towards the best plan for forcing the enemy under the guns of the Rock, which command, it must be explained, the Bay, and the tongue of land connecting the peninsula with Spain, and not the Straits themselves, which are some fourteen miles wide at that point.

"I propose, gentlemen," said the Admiral, "to form the fighting line of battleships in a crescent, concave towards the enemy. The Ramillies will take the right of the line, and the Trafalgar the left, and ships will take interval at twelve cables' length apart. As soon as the action commences ships will echelon four points to the starboard, still preserving the crescent formation, until the right of our fighting-line rests upon the Rock and the left tends towards Algeciras. When this position is reached and the attack pressed home we may safely leave all ships within the crescent to the care of our friends on shore, and give our immediate attention, if possible, to such of the enemy's cruisers as may be in the Straits. Our cruisers and gunboats will take station on the right and immediate rear of the Ramillies, to prevent torpedo attacks from that quarter.

About the same time Vice-Admiral von Grüdenau, to whom, by virtue of seniority, the command of the combined squadron had been assigned, was consulting with Contre-Amiral des Vismes de Monthier as to his plan of attack.

"It is above all things important," he insisted, "that the cruisers should get to sea and reach Brest intact, if this absurd rumour about a contemplated invasion of France by England be correct. I, therefore, my comrade, ask you to command the assault upon the battleships, and I would recommend that you should endeavour to draw them into the Bay of Algeciras. When the fight is well advanced I will dash past with the cruisers through the open channel, but I would pray you to keep from beneath the guns of that infernal fortress. In the open bay you should have little difficulty in dealing with the Lord Seymour. After destroying his fleet you can leisurely follow me, leaving Gibraltar to itself, and sending your disabled ships—for the English will assuredly fight hard—back to Toulon for repairs."

The French officer, as fine a sailor as ever stepped on a quarter-deck, cordially assented, and, as it transpired, "Lord Seymour" would also have agreed to the Frenchman's part of the programme had he been present.

The shadow of the Rock fell across the path of the British ships as they steamed out, in magnificent array, to take up position in the Straits. It was a fine summer's morning. The coasts of Africa and Spain, with their green slopes merging into the brown hues of rocky headlands—capped by the deep blue of distant mountains—were clearly visible in the pellucid atmosphere, and a slight haze over the ultramarine horizon of the Mediterranean gave promise of a burning hot day when the sun rose high in the heavens.

Above all, thrusting its majestic pinnacles into the sky, towered the Rock of Gibraltar, grim, menacing, grandly typical of British power and dignity, whilst a Royal salute of twenty-one guns thundered a message of sympathy and fortitude to the passing flotilla.

As the last cannon pealed forth its solemn note over the bay, the band on the admiral's ship struck up "Rule Britannia," and the poetic midshipman in the foretop of the Collingwood was so overcome with the varied sensations of the moment that he turned for communion with a kindred spirit to a Scotch middy named Malcolm Macdonald.

"How do you feel, Scottie?" he inquired.

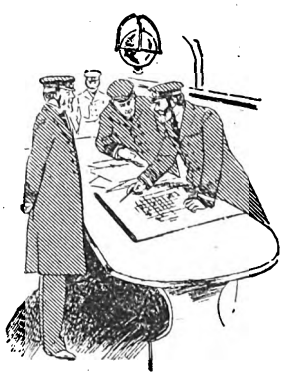
"I feel as if I wanted my breakfast," was the reply.

"Oh, I don't mean that," said the other with infinite scorn. "Doesn't your soul throb with the influences of the scene?"

"I'm minded to leave Froggy to think about his soul," said Macdonald. "I can smell the ham and eggs from here."

And even the poetic youth agreed, with a hungry look towards the deck, that it was time the relief came.

At nine o'clock the enemy was sighted, and des Vismes de Monthier formed his eighteen ships into a wedge-shaped array when he saw the disposition of the British fleet. At 9.30 the first shot was fired by the Ramillies, and the action was general a few minutes later.



"I propose, gentlemen."

Admiral Seymour was surprised at the ease with which the enemy allowed himself to be driven into the Bay of Algeciras. Under other circumstances the fact might have aroused his suspicions, more particularly because he had seen—from his favourable position on the outer horn of the crescent—the mass of cruisers and gunboats some miles in the rear of the attacking squadron. But outnumbered as he was, with a superior weight of metal against him, and a very much larger number of men on board individual ships than he possessed, it was utterly impossible to pay attention to any other concern than the matter in hand, which was pressing enough in all conscience.

The French Commander had a slice of luck at the outset.

His ships being in closer formation than the British vessels he was able to concentrate his fire from the apex of the triangle upon the centre of the British line. The Camperdown and Alexandra were smashed into absolute wrecks in a few minutes, and the former was only able to ram and sink the Admiral Baudin efore she herself commenced to fill and settle down—barely giving the remnant of her crew time to jump into their boats and pull for their lives out of the maelstrom she created as she went to the bottom.

"How do you feel, Scottie?"

By this time the two horns of the crescent had closed well round the allied fleet, and the terrific fire of the British ships, aided by the tremendous current that swirls round the southern face of the Rock into the bay, was steadily driving the enemy into the position desired by Sir Michael Seymour.

At the base of the Rock, in front of the little Mall where the rank and fashion of Gibraltar assemble at eventide to listen to the strains of a military band, a small group of anxious gunners stood in the bastion of the 110-ton gun. This brown monster was lightly poised on its powerful hydraulic carriage a few feet above sea level. For the first time in its history it was about to finally determine the vexed question of its value in marine warfare.

Only once in its existence—on the occasion of its gunnery trials, after leaving the foundry—had a full charge of powder been used in propelling its enormous shell, weighing nearly 1,000lb., and capable of smashing its way at a distance of some miles through the body of the most heavily armoured vessel afloat. The great damage done to the rifling of the gun by that discharge led even its most sanguine supporters to allot it a life of but thirty rounds, and the opponents of gigantic ordnance predicted complete failure for the weapon when used in active warfare.

For purposes of annual target practice only a half, or even smaller charge of powder was used, and the lapse of years under these less trying conditions had not improved the rifling.

But Major Humphreys, R.A.—a tall, stern-looking soldier, with the reputation of a scientist even in the scientific arm—who was in charge of the gun that day, believed in it fully and fearlessly, and his cold, impassive face relaxed into a lover-like interest as he cast an approving glance over the superb contour of the placid giant which was so soon to bear testimony to its worth.

The opposing squadrons drew momentarily nearer. In the heat and fury of the combat, the French Admiral did not note the skilful manner in which he was being driven into the eastern portion of the bay.

Within the bastion the knot of men drew back in response to a quiet command from the Major. The latter, paying no heed to the actualities of the conflict from which the others could hardly tear their eyes, calmly scrutinised a small mirror which lay in the bastion, and formed the object glass of a species of camera obscura on which the Bay of Algeciras was outlined in quaintly diminutive but wonderfully distinct manner.

Another low-toned order, and the great gun swung round on its pivot to a determined point on the horizon. A slight depression of the muzzle brought it to bear upon a definite spot in the waste of waters—every superficial yard of which has long been triangulated within that bastion.

Then those who were near enough peered with the Major into the depths of the mirror, and saw the stern of a German battleship slowly cross a meridional line shown in the picture.

Major Humphreys placed the forefinger of his right hand—without the slightest apparent tremor in his frame, though every other man in the battery was shaking with excitement—upon a small white electric button at the side of the mirror. When he funnel of the warship intersected the vertical line he pressed the button home.

In that instant an appalling crash rent the air. Several heavy stones were dislodged by mere shock from their firm beds in the casement. Large masses of turf and grass grown earth fell into the sea from the top of the bastion, and a great cloud of dust and smoke momentarily obscured the view.

When this had cleared away, the stern of the Kaiserhof was seen to rise high in the air, with twin screws spinning madly round as she dived through the swirl of waters caused by the explosion of her boilers, and disappeared from sight.

A loud cheer went up from the other officers and men in the small inclosure, but the Major only took his handkerchief from his breast and carefully dusted the face of the mirror, upon which some specks of dirt had fallen.

The colossal cannon listlessly dropped back into the bastion by the force of the recoil. It was sponged out, reloaded, and rapidly hoisted into position.

Again a ship, the Sadowa, drifted across the fatal line, and again the enormous steel-faced projectile shrieked through the air. Striking this time a little above the water-line, it smashed right through a 13-inch armour-plate, through protective coal-bunkers, through two immense boilers, and passed out of the other side of the ship, to fall into the sea some hundreds of yards farther on.

The Sadowa did not sink, but drifted helplessly away to the Spanish coast, and remained there, her officers and crew reaching France by train some days later.

Major Humphreys looked slightly annoyed, and he sharply told the subaltern in charge of the regulating vernier to be more careful with his distance calculations.

The subaltern was more careful, and the next French ship in the enemy's line went down with commendable exactitude.

These incidents did not escape the notice of the belligerents in the bay. During a brief interval the firing actually slackened, so astounded were both parties with the effect of this new element in the fight.

Admiral des Vismes de Monthier gave imperative orders for a dash seawards, and even as the signal-flags fluttered in the breeze, and a German battleship succumbed to one of those demoniacal blows from 1,000lbs. of metal travelling at almost meteoric speed.

A German battleship succumbs.

Sir Michael Culme-Seymour saw the signal and guessed its import. He had lost two of his ships, the Camperdown and the Anson, and the Alexandra, Howe and Rodney were disabled. But six of the hostile fleet, not including the four accounted for by the 110-ton gun, had gone beneath the waves with all hands, and the British ships plunged into the contest with renewed vigour, as the battle was now won to all intents and purposes.

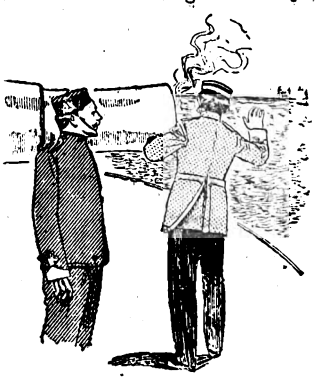
The French commander was as brave as a lion. When he found that he could not break through the encompassing ring he anchored his ship, so as not to be driven within range of that irresistible destroyer on the shore, and resolved to fight on to the bitter end.

A fifth of the allies' ships was rendered useless by a thunderbolt from the battery at the base of the Rock. But the effect of the shot called forth another sharp reprimand from the Major, and the gunner to whom he spoke replied respectfully, but firmly, that he had made no mistake in the range calculations of that he was quite sure.

The Major himself adjusted the vernier before the sixth discharge, and a great hole was knocked in the side of the Sans Pareil, but she did not sink.

The self-control which Major Humphreys had so far exhibited now deserted him. His hand actually shook as he pressed the electric communication for the seventh time, intending to finish the business of the Sans Pareil. But to the trained ears of the artillerymen in the bastion the explosion from the gun had a different sound, and the shell was seen to fall into the sea a thousand yards short of its object.

As the monster dropped back on its carriage the Major sprang hastily forward to the muzzle and gave a glance into the interior. Then he flung his arm round the grimy mouth of the gun and burst into tears.



Gave a glance into the interior.

The rifling had been ripped to pieces by the last shot, and the 110-ton gun was now an inert mass of iron and steel. The deep grooves were mangled and serrated with metal from the shells. The inside of the monster had been literally torn out of it, and the "Gibraltar Baby," as it was familiarly known in the Service, was completely disabled by its own superb power.

But it had nobly done its duty. Its cost to England was some £30,000, but its cost to France and Germany was more than three millions sterling, besides converting a possible victory into a certain defeat for the Allies.

The guns in the galleries of the Rock now joined in the fray, and there are 700 of them, big and little, new and old.

Common humanity impelled Admiral de Monthier to strike his colours, and he took such scant comfort as he could find in the fact that his colleague had slipped through the Straits, whilst the British fleet was unable to stop or pursue him.

The Polyphemus, Hawke, Fearless, and Hebe started off after the enemy's second fleet, it is true, but they were promptly recalled by Sir Michael Seymour, who ordered the Seahorse and Cockatrice to follow up the enemy, note his direction, and report at Portsmouth at the earliest possible moment. He also forwarded the Surprise with a brief dispatch announcing the result of the engagement.

When des Vismes de Monthier met the British Commander-in-Chief the latter promptly offered him his liberty on parole through the war, and the gallant Frenchman, after some demur, fell in with this magnanimous proposal.

"But," he said, speaking in broken English, "I would one leetle ting to ask."

"What is that?" said the Admiral.

"I would see ze grand canon," he replied; and he was taken to the bastion by the British Commander-in-Chief.

CHAPTER X.

A Journalistic Ally.

Unknown to the British Government, a new and terrible danger threatened one of the greatest of her colonies.

It was Russia who dealt the blow. This enormous power, which had so cleverly kept in the background whilst her allies were suffering the torments of defeat, had moved in the secret channels of diplomacy. Her powerful arm was being stretched forth in the East in an unseen and deadly manner.

Since the victory of Japan, Russia had seized her opportunity, and with fine cunning and dissimulation had advanced a step in her sleepless designs against our Indian Empire. A private treaty gave her a foothold upon the coast of China.

By dint of promises, which were never intended to be fulfilled, and partly by threats which were far more real, she had succeeded in obtaining for herself the important harbour of Port Arthur, and a railway which was being constructed across the vast country of China gave her ready admission to the Pacific Ocean. It was this private arrangement which put into her hands a formidable weapon against England

She had broken her faith, and had entered into perfidious alliance with Japan.

Adept in wild tricks of diplomacy, the Russian Government had induced Japan to hire it out to her entire navy. The bribe was no less than a solemn promise to hand over to the strong and ambitious young country, Port Arthur, with all its fortifications. Japan, still nursing her military glory and her ancient feud with her neighbour, was not slow to swallow the bait.

And thus Russia had disarmed the two nations, one by the treaty that she had already foully broken, and the other by means of a promise which she would only laugh at when she had gained her ends.

And thus, when England was driving an insolent foe from her waters, and, cut off from communication with her distant colonies, was helpless to serve them, the powerful navy of Japan, tried in war and efficient as if manned by Europeans, and led by French and German officers, was stealing through the waters to fall upon Australia, unprepared and undefended save by a few vessels which held watch and ward around her coasts. The world was now to see how far the enterprise and courage of a British Colony could prove itself when left entirely to its own resources. And a splendid example of resolution and fearless patriotism it was destined to witness.

For now a well-organised and simultaneous attack was being made upon the rich possessions of Great Britain throughout the world. And it was at just such a time that Englishmen and their enemies alike were able to comprehend, what peace had often been allowed in part to blur, the extent and wealth of a noble dominion, more fruitful and more widely strewn than even the Roman Empire itself.

There was Canada, stretching from ocean to ocean, and pressing through immemorial snows towards the Pole, loyalest of the loyal, cherishing her kinship with the mother-land as her dearest inheritance, oft suffering for her patriotic zeal, yet untempted by those who would seduce her from her allegiance or bribe her into independence.

Toward the south, too, was the Cape of Good Hope, with all the rich territory which lay to the north, the golden garden of Africa, scarcely yet tamed from barbarism, yet smiling in prosperity the home of a new and sturdy English race which could not be dazzled by its riches into forgetfulness of the country from which it sprang.

Vaster still was Australia with its neighbouring islands of New Zealand, the noblest pasture lands of earth, stirring with the restless activities of lusty enterprise, an empire in itself.

Digitized by Google

These splendid colonies, long the envy of ambitious nations who coveted their wealth and rich possibilities, were scarcely protected against the danger that so suddenly threatened them. A few ships lay in their waters, but on land there were only the volunteer and militia battalions, who had now a first and unexampled opportunity to display their valour.

India alone was secure. That great country had for centuries attracted to herself the most daring enterprise and energy of England. The countless multitude of natives had been long won over to loyalty by wise government and by obvious motives of interest. But, threatened on all sides save the sea by enemies on its borders, India was occupied by what may justly be called the finest army in the world. The opportunities for active service it afforded showed the road to distinction, and most English officers who were fired by ambition or military ardour sought to find employment there. And thus by process of natural selection, all that was most brilliant and most resolute in the British military genius characterised the splendid army of India. Always ready for action, often called to the exercise of arms, experienced in every manner of warfare, it was enough to daunt the most courageous foe.

And daunt them it did. For Russia knew and feared the discipline and valour of the British troops in India. It was for this reason that she had treacherously concealed her participation in the great war. She hoped that the stress of circumstances might render necessary the withdrawal of the troops homeward for the purposes of defence. Thus shorn of her strength, India, she fondly believed, would become a ready victim to her schemes.

England, indeed, had already to contend with the most exasperating difficulties so far as her Colonial empire was concerned.

Whilst she knew that preconcerted attacks must be then in operation against every part of her empire, she had no means of communicating with them and giving instructions for the general scheme of defence. They were everyone isolated, and the War Office was distracted at the formidable obstacles that lay in its path. There seemed nothing to do but rely on native resource. And yet, even then there could not but be such terrible dissipation of strength through lack of a general organised plan.

It was at this juncture of affairs that the British Government found, in her hour of need, a new and strange ally, whose aid was more valuable, inasmuch as it was given unconsciously.

On Friday morning Lord Salisbury was in consultation with Lord Lansdowne and the Commander-in-Chief at the Foreign Office when a well-dressed, somewhat nonchalant young man came along Whitehall, walking at a brisk pace.

His keen eyes, his face, thin and a trifle sallow, his quick and restless manner, all betokened the American. Mr. Henry P. Chauncey had indeed crossed the water only six months back to undertake the responsible duties of London correspondent to the New York World. His piquant and brilliant articles had already made him well known in journalistic circles, and the power of his pen and of the journal in which he exercised it had made him a welcome addition to London Society.

He turned as he got to the Foreign Office, and sprang lightly up the steps. Advancing to the inquiry room he stirred up the clerks considerably by what appeared to them to be the most audacious request in the history of English politics.

"I want to see Lord Salisbury," he said coolly.

The clerk he addressed looked at him in amazement. He almost expected him to faint at such an announcement.

"Lord Salisbury!" he stammered. "What are you thinking of? You must be mad."

"I reckon not," replied the American. "Take him this card. I represent the World."

"The World! exclaimed the clerk. "I don't care if you represent the Universe! Do you think Lord Salisbury is going to admit reporters to his conferences?"

"Look here, young man," insisted Mr. Chauncey, "I have no time for a general debate on hypothetical questions. I don't think you know the methods of American journalism in this sleepy institution. You're a clerk here, are you not?"

"Yes."

"Then kindly do what I ask you. I'll take the consequences."

"But Lord Salisbury is engaged on urgent war business."

"He is?" exclaimed the American gleefully. "Why, that's exactly what I want to see him about. Just you skip in and tell him a representative of the New York World requests an audience, and that he'll not keep him five minutes."

Lord Salisbury was by this time alone. The War Minister and the Commander-in-Chief had just left him for Pall Mall.

He was pondering over an awkward problem which had puzzled all three, when Mr. Chauncey's visit was announced. He turned the card over automatically in his hand for a moment, and then suddenly his eye lighted up.

"Bring Mr. Chauncey here at once!" he ordered. The clerk, amazed, stared at him blankly a moment, then turned quickly on his heels, and, subdued and deferential, though seemingly overwhelmed, he ushered the journalist into the Prime Minister's private room.

The great statesman met him with grave courtesy.

"Sit down, Mr. Chauncey," he said. "Such an interview as this is extraordinary, and, I should think, unparalleled."

Mr. Chauncey bowed.

"The New York World is honoured," he said, and his alert mind conjured up the most startling "exclusive" that America had ever known.

"I do not know," continued his lordship "whether you are aware what the precise position of yourself and your colleagues is in this country at the present moment."

"My lord," replied the journalist with quiet dignity, "I am quite aware of it. If you choose to regard our presence here as likely to militate against the safety of England you would be justified in requesting us to leave."

"That is so," replied the Premier. "But you need fear nothing. I believe in candour to the Press. It is too mighty a power for us to affect to neglect or despise it. What I propose is this—and I ask it as a favour. You shall call each day at the Foreign Office, where certain bona-fide and important news shall be given you. Call later on, sir, and an official shall give you such news as I can afford to make known. I shall trust largely to your discretion. A journalist of your standing and experience needs no word of caution."

Mr. Chauncey was profuse in his thanks, and was almost inclined to pity the Herald. Lord Salisbury also had reason to be satisfied with result of interview.

Next day war intelligence from American papers was flashed over the entire globe, save to South and East Africa, which were alone unconnected. And with it was dispatched the following simple paragraph:

"The Minister for War has sent to every Colonial governor where possible a cable containing the single word 'Britannia.' At the Admiralty word is hourly expected from Canada announcing that the fleet stationed there has sailed for England."

This item of news was read in all English colonies and dependencies, and the cabalistic word, making the message obviously authentic, was read aright by British representatives, who grasped at once the stratagem that had been used. And thus, in a moment the British dominions were prepared for the shock of war and knew the line of defence.

It was the first time in the history of nations that a Prime Minister had recognised the value of journalism as a force in war, and had used its stupendous organisation to save the fortunes of an Empire!

Asa Fleetwood's Story.

"WHAT was the queerest thing I ever seed?"

We five were lounging in the little cabin after a long day's tramp over the Canadian hills; the dogs lay sprawled on the rough boards, with weary limbs toasting before the fire; and the smoke from our pipes was poisoning the sweet September air with every degree of smoulder ng long cut, fine cut, and mixture.

The guns had been cleaned and polished and put away; the cartridges were oaded for the morrow; and we four de'egates from civilisation had been whiling away the last drowsy hour l efore rolling up in our blankets by the rec'tal of adventures real or imagined—such tales as hunters love to tell and oth r hunters love to listen to. Then the doctor, with a sly wink at the rest that signified something of interest, had called upon our guide, old grizzled Asa Fleetwood, for his contribution to the marvellous.

"I dunno if I kin give you anything that'll strike you, gentlemen, as worth the hearing on. I've seed some strange things out yere in this lonesomeness—yes, and beed in 'em too; but I can't tell you of no sich things as you've been telling on—no deers killed with popguns"—Asa s disrespectful name for our silver-trimmed revolvers—"nor no wild hosses ketched by salting of their tails"—and the old fellow grinned at his own joke—"but I kin tell you jest a plain, every-day story of something I seed onct, that I'll never forget—not to my last minute on this earth."

He paused, with a "by your leave," to fill his corn-cob from the nearest box and tapping the "bright Virginia" into the bowl, looked round at the faces silhouetted against the fire, pulled a moment at the pipe to get it well alight, settled himself back into a more comfortable position, and began his story:

"About the time I first located in these parts, when deer and b'ar, and wolves and game was p enty, and every thing a feller needs could be had for the taking on it, along over the trail one day, pack on back and a whole gun-shop of wepins stuck on all over him, kinder singing so tly to hisself as he walks, up comes a littl chap what says to me: 'Howdy, stranger?' allows as how his name was Marlow—Jim Marlow—claps hisself down by my fire like as if he was coming to a party, and jest makes hisself to home.

"He weren't much to look at; jest an ornary, homely little chap, but clear grit and a heart o' gold, as I found out arterwards. Well I won't bother you with telling how it came about, but anyway, we become pardners, Jim Marlow and me, an worked our traps in cahoots, and took turns at the cooking and dish-washing. Oh, you needn't laugh, we washed 'em all right when we wasn't in too much on a hurry.

"Bimeby—maybe two weeks, maybe more—he lets on as how he has another pard in the East, a-following him on the trail; and if I ain't convenient—which I wasn't noways—he'd be glad to have him kinder join in and be one of us. And I allowed the woods was big enough for three, and anybody as Jim had tied to would go all right with Asa Fleetwood.

"And sure enough, afore the month was out, along he comes jest of a nightfall, a leading of one hoss and a-riding of another: and when he sees our camp smoke, out he lets a great 'halloo' that sets the woods a-ringing, and when Jim hears that, up he jumps and tears away down the hill like mad; and this other he off his hoss and runs to Jim; and sich a shaking of hands and clapping each other on the back I never did see in all my days!

"Well, presently along they come up the hill, and Jim allows as how I was Asa, and this other, he was Rube; and we onpacks his hoss and stows his kit comfortable-like, and inside of two days we might ha' been three brothers, Reuben Weathersbee, Jim Marlow and me, so snug and smooth everything was a-running.

"And one day, along in the fall, and the leaves turning brown, and some on 'em red on the trees, and the squirrels a-lining up their winter nests with acorns and a-chirp-chirping all the day long, and the chick-partridges a-skurrying arter the old birds pretty nigh under your very feet—which I s'pose made him think of his own little chicks—Rube says: 'Boys, this yere thing is gelorious, and I don't want nothing better than for to spend my days right out yere along o' you and in this yere clearing.'

"And we was agreeable, sure enough, and he goes on to say as how he'd a mind to build hisself a little home and slick everything up fine, and when he got her done, why he'd send away to the States for his wife and little ones. Well, sirs, that thing gave me a kind of turn, for let alone the building of a house out thar in the woods, and a rough feller like me a-sleeping anywhere but out o' doors like I'd been used to, I weren't much on a hand for women folks noways.

"But when I looks at Reuben, and sees his face all lit up and the tears a-shining in his eyes, I jest gives in right thar, and lets on as how this yere thing was downright mostly needful for to perfectify our little camp.

"And every spare minute arter that we was a-working on the litt e house and a-widening out the clearing. And sich a chopping down of trees, and sich a hauling of 'em yere and a histing of 'em thar, you never hearn tell on. And bimeby she beg ns to look like a house; and Jim Marlow and Rube and me was a-riding over to the settlement, twenty mile away, and a-swopping pelts and sich for doors and windys and pots and kettles and fixings; and a-toting 'em back over the hills, and a-bumping 'em agin the trees, and a-yanking 'em through the brush till it was a wonder we didn't smash the whole outfit.

"And all this while we was a-guessing, Jim and me, how he was a-going to let 'em know ab ut it, away off thar in the States for, bar making a good black mark on a paper when we took up the land, we was no scholars, neither on us, nor had no book-larning, though I've picked up maybe a smattering since. And we knowed a whole wilderness of them little black crosses wouldn't tell her nothing of the little house, nor of Jim Marlow nor me, nor how to get whar we was, unless she was to take 'em for blaze marks on the trees.

"You see I was dreadful ignorant in them days. But Rueben, he was eddicated, and when the time comes, but he gets a bit of board by the firelight, and a piece of paper, and a thing he calls a envyloop, or some sich name, with a little pictur pasted in the corner, all handsome and convenient, and he falls to a-writing of his letter; and Jim and me, we helps with our idees quite promiskyous, and when at last he gets her done, and folded up, and sticks her in the envyloop, all hands takes a lick to wet the gum, and seal her up, so as to say, the whole on us, for this yere invitation was our sentiments.

"Then we gives three cheers for the little house and for the little family a-coming out to live in it, jest for luck and g od feeling, you know, and next morning Reuben rides away over the trail to ketch the Wednesday stage and post his letter.

"Well, about a month afterwards—and Rube a-riding in to the settlement every time the stage comes through to get his answer—one night, back he comes a-whooping and a-le ting out halloos and hollerings for very joy; and when he comes in sight o' us, he waves a little white thing in the air; and then we see he'd got his letter.

"But we had a time a-reading on it, for it's a durn sight easier for to write a letter—what we said ourselves—than to read a letter—what other folks said? And Jim and me a-helping all we could, and a-looking at it wrong side up, and hind side afore—I knows be ter now-a-days—and a searching for crosses, which thar wasn't nary one in the whole letter, and all on us mostly skipping the long words; anyway we made out the sense of it, and she was a-coming, she and the little ones, in the next stage to foller.

"Well, I don't s'pose you ever see sich fools as we was a-trimming up that cabin in and out with spruce boughs and a-nailing up shelves and women's fixings: and it was jest hammer, hammer, hammer, all the day long, and pretty much all the nig t, too, and then up at it a in in the morning, till our fingers was that sore with missing the nail-heads and a-pounding of ourselves—and the cabin that stuck full of nails I don't believe you could ha' clapped a squirrel-skin up anywhars without you'd touch a dozen 'n 'em.

"And when the time comes nigh and the hours was getting shorter. Reuben was a-running out-door to take a look, and a-running back in-doors to take a look, and a-changing this yere and a-moving that thar, and a-fidgeting about the whole place till Jim and me was near druv wild.

"And the day afore they was to come, and Rube sorter standing all by hisself and a-thinking, and a-thinking, all of a sudden he says, along o' nothing: 'Boys, I—I can't go down thar in the settlement and meet 'em first—afore all those folks—I—jest can't do it. Why, I about know I'd make a varm nt of myself, a-hugging and a-kissing 'em, and like as not I'd go to crying and disgrace 'em—when I sets eyes on them babies.'

"And Jim and me, we sees his heart wa- in it, so Jim, as knowed 'em anyway, why he allowed he'd go down and meet 'em at the stage and borry a waggon, and bring 'em out as far as the trail would let a waggon come.

"And Reuben and me was to walk over and meet 'em at the big divide, jest where the trail dips down into the ford and then falls a zig-zagging up the foot-hills. For you see when you gets a-top of them hills, the trail was fair and straight for quite a piece, and we could see 'em coming a long ways off.

"And so we fixed it.

"And that night the snow came, and in the morning it was a-laying so t and white all over the trees and over the trail, and everything jest a-shining in the sun, sorter joyful like. And Jim, he says as how we needn t be surpr sed to see him coming back a-sledding, and if thar was any jingle-bells in the place, why he would have 'em. And he rides away on the old roan hoss, a-leading of the bay, and both on 'em a-swish-swashing through the snow, and we a-dancing and a-shouting on the hill to keep him company as long as he could hear, jest like two children.

"Well, sirs, thar was more come with that snow than we first thought on; for along about two o'clock, jest arter we'd lit the first fire in the fireplace, and was a-standing out-o'-doors to see the smoke pour out the chimbley, we hears a howl, and then another—long and shrill and dismal-like. And Rube turns white as the snow thar, and jest says one word: 'Wolves!'

"Now a wolf ain't no great critter for a man what's well and strong, and got a gun, and, maybe, could climb a tree, to be afeard on, but when he's got a wife and babies coming through the woods to meet him, and they not knowing the ways of wild things anyway, and Jim with nothing but a little popping six-shooter for to defend hisself on—then I tell you wolves is different! And every time they yelled away off thar atwixt us and the settlement, some way our hearts jest clim' right up in our throats and stuck thar, and we a-pant ng.

"Gentlemen, it takes a tidy while to tell about it, but it wasn t two shakes afore we was in the little cal in, and we grabs a gun yere and a hatchet thar, and I don't know what all, and then away we goes a-tearing down the trail, teeth shet hard and nerves and muscles braced for a long race over the white snow. And all the while that wild howling a-getting nearer, and a-getting nearer, and the cold chills a-creeping up my back and a-shooting down agin' and the agony in Reuben's face a-deepening, ever' time we hears that distant yell.

"The good Lord only knows how we got thar, so scared and tremblyous and all onfit for running as we was, but anyway we reached the last hill over the ford, and jest as we was a-going to plunge down the trail, Rube stops short and throws up one hand, and says with his lips as plain as though he'd said it with his voice—for we had no breath left for talking with—'Listen!' And sure enough, away off that we hears, faint and distant-like, a little 'crack!'—and then another and another—six of 'em—about as loud as snapping of a little twig. But we knowed what it meant: it was Jim's six-shooter a-speaking bravely for the wife and little ones, a-coming on the trail.

"Then down we goes over the hill, and splash, splash, into the ford, up to our knees, up to our waists, up to our arm-pits in the icy water—but a-holding our arms up high and a-keeping our guns and amynition dry for to do death on them yelping fiends! And when we gets atop of the hill, we hears 'em coming 'round the bend, the little gun a going zip-bang—agin—six times; and then a little space for him to load, and then onot more, six times.

"And all the while the wolves a-keeping up that yell, howl, and yell agin—that turned our blood to ice; and we a-going on, a-staggering, and a-stumbling, and a-straining of our ears to listen.

"And jest then they comes in sight, a good mile away, but seeming nigh almost enough to touch 'em in the cold, clear air—the hosses all alash, the low sled a-bumping on the fallen logs, Jim a-standing up and laying on the whip—and every little while a-throwing back his arm—and then would come a little puff of smoke—and then we'd hear the piff-bang a-floating on the air; and in the sled, all of a huddle on the floor, a tumbling, bouncing heap we knowed was Rube's wife and babies.

"And Rueben gives a awful groan, and stops, and throws up both arms, dead-beat and all unnarved, and looks at me appealing-like, but I could only shake my head, and drag him on. I knowed they never make it to get in shot of us the way it looked, afore the wolves would be upon 'em; for they was gaining now—and coming up with every stride—and we so helpless.

"And jest then Jim fires two shots, snap-bang, at a wolf as was a-getting up abreast of him, but only twice, and part of the pack stops and pitches on this dying one; but the rest keeps on, and Jim flings something bright and sunny in the sun squat in the face of one a-coming up on t'other side; and then we see his last shot was gone, and he'd throwed away his wepin—for every pound counted. Then presently, out goes the buffalo-skin—and then something else; and each time the pack stops, and some on 'em rolls over and goes heels up in the sudden check, and back agin and take a sniff, and when they finds their bite don't draw the blood, then bark back arter the chase, and a-getting nearer, nearer all the while.

"And now we kin see Jim's white face, kin hear him shouting to the horses, and shouting at the wolves a-gaining grim and deadly—and Rube kneels down and throws up the barrel of his rifle—but drops it quick agin and gives a moan; he darsen't fire for fear he'd hit something else, dearer a thousand times than his own body.

"And then it was, gentlemen, I seed the strangest, queerest thing I ever see in all my living days; for Jim, he sees he'd never win the race with all on 'em, and he jest up and stands on the seat, sharp and clear ag inst the white sky, gives the horses a last clip with the lash, kinder kiss s his hand to the sunshine he never was to see agin, whips off his hat, and waves it—jest like this—twice or maybe thrice around his head, gives us a ringing cheer across the snow, and turns and vaults back among those yelping, shrieking fiends. They climb on him and tear at him; he fights 'em with his bare hands, strikes 'em with his clenched fists, and jest then, while we was glaring at it all, so helpless and so hopeless, along come the panting horses and kinder slows up.

"Some way or other I bundle Reuben in and he grabs the reins, flings me his gun and cartridge-belt, and then away, away with his wife and babies for the home on the distant hills, while I goes rushing back, shouting, screaming, but too late. I never seed dear, old, trusty, homely Jim agin; never heard his bonny voice arter that one cheer; jest seed a shapeless something on the bloody snow, heard them fiends a-crunch-crunching that I hear again in dreams until this day. Then all the snow and trees and hills and sky turns kinder black afore my eyes n I give one yell to Jim that I'm a'coming—and knows o more until I finds myself, knife in one hand and hatchet in the other, a-hacking and a-stabbing and a-chopping those hounds of Satan—shouting, drenched with blood—theirs, and his, and mine.

"But I'm alive to tell on it. And—Jim—don't mind an old fool's tears—I—I've seed the winter snows fall soft and white this twenty year upon the little pile of stones that marks the spot; but Jim don't need no monument, for in our hearts he's living still—and loved—and unforgotten."

HOW HE WON.

When a girl puts both arms round your neck and buries her face on your shoulder and tells you that she can never, never care for you in that way, you don't feel absolutely discouraged. Heaton didn't, anyway. He kissed her hair, very mildly, so as not to call her attention to her position, and asked for an explanation.

"Why, it's all so light and jolly, what I feel for you," she said unhappily. "I never have cried about it, or lain awake over it or anything. When you come, I m so happy I could jump up and down, but when you go, really, I don't much care."

"Don't you miss me?" he asked.

"If you are away long, I may think about you a good deal, but I don't miss you with an ache. Why, when you're nice to another girl, I only feel a vague prick or two. I don't in the least want to scratch her eyes out."

"Did you ever care the other way for any one?"

"No. That's the worst of it," she sighed. "I used to think I hadn't found my soul, but now—oh, my dear, I'm afraid I haven't got any. Perhaps I'm just naturally shallow. If a little, cheerful, easy going, half-a-crown love like this is all I can feel, well then, I won't marry at all."

And she drew herself away, to drop down into the big chair.

He came and sat on the arm unrebuked. She even leant against him a little, as though refusing a man gave him privileges.

"Isn't it possible, Amy, that you care more than you think?" he ventured. "Perhaps if it were tested——"

"But I have tested it, a hundred ways. For instance, I play that I meet an acquaintance, and she says, 'Oh, by-the-way, did you know that Mr. Heaton was engaged to be married?' I feel a queer little squinch, but I can always answer instantly, 'No, indeed, who is it? Do tell me about it,' and listen to all the details without giving a sign. If I cared the right way, why, I'd be simply overwhelmed. No amount of pride could make me hide it. You see, I'm perfectly honest with you."

"But I'd rather be loved laughing than crying," he protested.

"And you may like sunshine better than shade," she answered; "but it's only on the surface of things, and doesn't last. Darkness goes right to their centres. There's no use arguing. It isn't real love if it can't hurt. If you can make me unhappy about you, then——"

"Then?" he repeated, lifting her face. Her eyes were as frank and innocent as a child's.

"Yes, then," she said.

Heaton had always thought wooing was merely a matter of loving, but he now turned to artifice and did his clumsy best to awaken his princess by worked up effects, since the simple, time-honoured kiss had failed. Remembering a hackneyed saying, he tried for pity first, but it refused to come to the aid of its kin.

When he sat looking at her in moody silence, turning away occasionally with set lips and deep, quick breaths, Amy found him "too sleepy to be interesting" and sent him home.

And when he flattered himself he was becoming effectively pale and wan, she told him he was losing all his good looks.

Jealousy was equally disappointing. After he had bored himself by making a beginning with another girl and flaunted her in the face of his lady-love, entirely for the latter's own good, the two girls took a sudden violent fancy to each other, and spent all their spare time talking in low, intense voices that dropped back into commonplace on his approach, so that it was he who felt de trop. The jealousy all came back on his own head, and Amy was frank and friendly and fond, but nothing more.

He alternated weeks of devotion with weeks of neglect, and she did not seem to notice the difference. Nothing piqued her, and she refused to quarrel.

Neither moonlight nor firelight affected her mood, and when he caught her hand with sudden fierceness she smiled serenely and said he was a dear boy. It was like trying to cut a hole in water.

At last, utterly discouraged, he gave up. He could not hurt her, could not even touch her inner self. He flung aside his poses, bravely accepted his failure, and met her as he had before, without ruse of any kind.

This went on for a week. On the night of the seventh day, Amy faced herself in the mirror with a new expression.

"Well, he has given it up," she said. "He has decided that I'm not worth winning, and he's not going to try any more. I hope you're satisfied."

She turned out the light and crawled into bed.

"Oh, I don't blame him!" she said to herself. "I wouldn't be sorry for him, and I wouldn't be jealous, and I wouldn't understand. I was simply hateful. And he has given up trying. He doesn't care any more. It's —it's all ended."

And now she was groping under the pillow for her handkerchief. An hour later she gave an impatient sigh

"If this is the way it hurts, I wish I'd never found out," she said.

The night went by very heavily and in the morning her eyes were lame. When he came she was cool, distant, and inclined to sarcasm, and the stupid man thing went away hurt. Then she sent him a little note, and after it had gone burnt with shame and resolved to meet him more coldly than ever. But a glimmer of sense was dawning within him, so he kissed her before she could show her attitude. And after that she didn't have to.

"So my wooing wasn't altogether wasted," he said later.

"Yes, it was," she answered. "It was the stopping it that did it." And she never understood why he laughed.

MARIAN WEST.

Revealed by Accident.

I MET Louise Elkins in the street to-day. Louise is an old maid now—she must be, for she is older than I, and I am nearly forty—and nobody would believe that she was ever pretty. Yet she was once called a beauty.

But I did not intend to say anything against Louise. She was my intimate friend once, then my "intimate enemy," then the object of my unmitigated and outspoken displeasure and contempt, but for a long time even the last phase of emotion connected with her has subsided into the most perfect indifference. She cannot harm me now, and she, doubtless, has long lost all desire to harm me. Once, however, it was different.

I first met Louise Elkins when I was a girl at school. We became intimate, and I learnt to love her, to feel a want when she was absent, and to enjoy perfect satisfaction in her presence. She was my confidante, and I thought that I was hers. The time came when I knew that she had never confided in me, but had shown me only the surface of her thoughts, and deeds, and purposes.

How many times she comforted me with words and caresses, hypocritical as they were sweet, for the very disappointments that she had carefully and remorselessly prepared for me. How many times I was tempted to believe that a malignant fate pursued me, thwarting all my most cherished plans, when it was my "friend" who thus coolly and silently stood ever between me and the accomplishment of my desire.

But the final act came after school life.

Two years after I left school, Louise paid me a visit. We had met but once during this period, when I paid her a visit of several weeks at her father's house, in a pretty suburban town. This visit she had come to return; but in the meantime, our correspondence had been so frequent and uninterrupted, that my affection for my dearest friend, as I loved to call her, had never flagged.

I welcomed her with delight. There was but one person whose presence had ever given me deeper joy, but even my love for Guy Carleton, absorbing as it was, had not weakened this long cherished, but widely different affection.

We had much to tell each other and we had to hurry away, finally, to dress for dinner.

I had scarcely finished when Guy was announced.

I stole down for a moment before going to Louise. It was to tell him of her arrival; how disappointed I was to perceive that he did not share my delight, and that his fine face clouded as I spoke rapidly and joyously of the long-desired pleasure of introducing my two loved friends.

I checked myself in alarm as I saw this.

"What is the matter, dear Guy?" I asked anxiously. "Are you not well, or does that horrid business trouble you again?"

"I am quite well, Dolly," he replied, "and the business which has given me so much annoyance will soon be satisfactorily settled. But I am sorry this girl has come. Forgive me, dear, it may be selfish, but I cannot resist the premonition that she will come between us—perhaps to destroy our happiness for ever."

I laughed gaily.

"Louise come between us—the best and dearest of girls to destroy our happiness! Why, Guy, can you believe any friend of mine, anyone so loved and trusted could do that? But you do not know Louise. She will rejoice in our happiness as if it were her own—she is the most unselfish creature, the most——"

"There, that will do!" interrupted Guy, with a laugh. "I did not mean to set you off in defence of your friend, but might have known what I would draw down upon myself. I am sorry I annoyed you, but I cannot think of having a third person always in our way, for weeks perhaps, with every patience. Pardon me, dear, for if I had loved you less, I should not have cared."

Louise made a decided impression upon Guy Carleton.

His opinion of her changed even during the first evening of their acquaintance, for as we parted he whispered that she was a charming girl, and would be a most agreeable addition to our small circle.

Imperceptibly the change increased. Guy was our constant visitor, and was necessarily much in the society of Louise.

He paid her marked attention, but she was very quiet, and I said he owed it to me to do so.

Still, when in our walks I was suffered to fall behind, alone and unheeded, it required all my affection for my friends to look calmly on, and see them so absorbed in their conversation as to forget my very existence.

Louise had a rich voice, the rarest I ever heard from one who was not a professional singer, and Guy was passionately fond of music. I could not sing, but I played well, at least so I have often been assured. In the early period of Louise's visit I often accompanied her upon the pianoforte, but at length she discovered my accompaniment did not suit her voice, and Guy joined in her criticism. I relinquished my seat to her, and never again was asked, or offered to play while she sang.

Nor was I missed, apparently. I used to sit for hours in some obscure corner, or out upon the vine-shaded verandah, while Guy bent over the instrument, so close that his dark locks seemed to mingle with the brown curls of Louise.

Guy was not less kind when we met alone. He was even more demonstrative than of old, as if thus he would atone for enforced neglects. I remembered that Louise had sneered at lovers and their absorbed ways, living for and thinking only of each other, and tried to believe that this was the cause of all that gave me so much suffering. But our next meeting, when I remained apparently forgotten for hours, would destroy this illusion.

At length a slight illness of my mother compelled me to attendance upon her for many days. While I was thus employed, Louise and Guy were left almost entirely to each other's companionship. Sometimes Louise would creep into my mother's room, and in her soft, caressing manner insist upon sharing my watch, but invariably, ere half an hour had elapsed, Guy would come to remind her of some forgotten engagement, and with a promise to take good care of my lover, she would run away to join him.

I seldom saw Guy during this time, and then, in one of these rare meetings, instead of noticing my pale cheek he chided me for allowing Louise to spend so much time in the sick-room.

I was too much surprised at this, as well as grieved, to tell him the truth at once: and before I could speak, the opportunity was lost. Louise had called him, and he had moved to her side.

But my eyes that had before begun to be unsealed were now fully opened.

I saw that Louise was false, that she was putting forth every art, even to imputing to me selfishness, to deprive me of the affections of my lover.

The revelation gave me the hitherto hidden key to her character. In all our intimacy of years I had never read, never known her before. But now, clear as if traced upon the printed page, I saw the record of the long series of her deceits and shameless perfidy.

I watched her more closely, and, with my new comprehension of her character, saw more clearly her motives, and the malignant triumph with which she beheld her victim each day more inextricably involved in her toils, while the friend for whom she still professed the warmest affection, was suffering agonies.

I prepared myself to what I believed must come. The period of Louise's visit as first arranged had passed, but she did not speak of departure, and I felt sure that she only delayed until Guy should be lured on to the point of proposal.

But an accident, one of those strange contretemps that even the most wily cannot always avoid, at last intervened to destroy her plans and reveal her character in all its deformity.

One morning I was passing languidly through the wide entrance hall, and saw Guy's small office boy, his Mercury, standing there, and holding two bouquets, which he presented to me. One was for Louise, and a little note accompanied it. With mine there was no message.

I called Louise from the parlour, and gave her the note and flowers. A wicked glance of triumph, disguised by a smile, was my reward, and she ran away upstairs to answer the missive.

Half an hour passed before she came down, and I saw her give two notes to the boy, telling him that one was for his master, and asking him to drop the other at the post office which he had to pass on his way homewards.

Another hour had passed, when from my post by my mother's bedside, I saw, through the open window, Guy Carleton coming hastily along the avenue. Louise was playing and singing in the parlour, but to my surprise he did not join her, but sent a servant to ask if he could see me for a few moments in the breakfast room.

"She has accepted him," I thought, "and he has come to be released from his vows to me."

But I was mistaken.

It was to the confessions of a penitent I had to listen. Louise had betrayed her true character to him.

The letter she had inclosed in the envelope to him had been intended for another, and had exposed her plot, and dilated upon her triumph.

Guy had read enough to show him all, before he recovered from his surprise, and comprehended how that letter had fallen into his hands.

So small a mistake revealed all, and set my lover free.

Guy inclosed the letter to her without comment, and that very afternoon she left us, without even the ceremony of a farewell.

I could not offer to see her, and she did not ask that I should.

Much as I loved Guy I could not readily forgive him for all he had made me suffer; but our great mutual happiness has long since eradicated every root of bitterness from my heart; and I can now only look with pity even upon the forlorn spinster, Louise Elkins.

BY HER OWN HAND.

THE Cowes week had been over a good four days, and the party that had been g thered together on board the Cynthia, Lord St. Ervan's cruising yacht, had had such a very good time of it so far that they had unanimously fallen in with their host's proposal to take a run round the Channel Islands, and then to St. Malo, and up the Rance, instead of scattering, as most of the other yachts' companies were on the point of doing, either to Homburg and Spa, the Italian Lakes, or the Scotch Moors.

The Cynthia had left St. Peter's Port in Guernsey, and was slipping along quietly over a smooth sea under the long slanting beams of the setting August sun, on her way to St. Helier.

The guests had disposed themselves in little groups about the ship's deck, according to their fancies, their social preferences, or their little designs upon each other.

One of the groups was composed of a dark-eyed, distinguished-looking man of thirty-eight or so, and a pretty petite Frenchwoman in a delightful sea-costume, whose complexion was so excellently preserved, whose general tenue was so perfect that the casual observer might well have been excused for knocking half-a-dozen years off the thirty-five which she was a long way from owning up to.

Madame de Bonneville was the semi-detached wife of a French diplomatist, who was just then pursuing his vocation at the other end of Europe. She was a good little soul, as Frenchwomen of the grande monde go, and though she was capable of holding her own in any sort of fun or adventure that was not hopelessly compromising, she was not more unscrupulous than the majority of women of her nation and position in life.

Her companion was Major Denver, of the ——th Regiment of the Line, in the forces of Her Britannic Majesty. He was a man who had seen plenty of service in different parts of the Empire; a thorough gentleman, with no more of the man of the world in him than was absolutely necessary for him to hold his own among his fellows. In addition to being a smart officer, and an altogether charming man in society, he was the possessor of a very considerable private fortune, and no less considerable personal advantages.

In fact, if Madame de Bonneville had only been the well-dowered widow that she would be some day and wanted to be at once, there was no other man she had ever seen with whom she would so willingly have tempted the lottery of marriage a second time than this dark-featured, strong-natured Englishman, who seemed so strangely, and yet so politely, indifferent to his very obvious opportunities in the matrimonial line.

The two were watching another group, seated aft near the wheel, composed of a very pretty English girl, who seemed to be still in her teens, l the of form, brown of skin, and of very manifest vivacity of character, and a couple of men, one youthful, almost to boyishness, and another well on towards middle age, with whom she was considerably more than holding her own in what seemed to be an undisguised three-cornered flirtation.

If Madame de Bonneville had been paying less attention to the girl and more to her companion, she would have noticed that every time he looked towards the other group his brows contracted almost imperceptibly, and a dusky sort of shadow, as if of repressed anger, stole into his dark blue eyes, turning them almost to black for the time being.

Even if she had noticed this, she gave no sign of having done so, and rattled along with her share of the conversation, which was naturally the greater, because the woman's share, in a pretty medley of good English and appropriately French idioms, that made her chatter a good deal more entertaining than it appears when necessarily translated into simple English.

"Really, Major, you know I find it quite impossible even yet to understand the extraordinary way in which you always extraordinary English bring up your young marriageable girls. Now, that young lady yonder, Miss Maud Driscoll, just look how she is carrying on with those two men! Of course it is all perfectly proper according to your ways, but, ma foi, it would be enough to turn the hair of a French mother grey with anxiety, and here you don't seem to think anything of it at all.

"Your English misses must really have the most charming life imaginable. They go about quite untrammelled, they talk as they choose to any men of their set that their fancy selects, they walk, they ride, they go boating and cycling without being worried in the slightest by chaperonage, and generally seem to carry on according to their own sweet will.

"Now, if that young lady had been born and bred in France she would now only just be coming out of a convent school, she would scarcely know how to waltz. A picnic or a boating party or a bicycle-ride would be a revelation still in store for her, and her knowledge of men would be confined to the male members of her own family and their most intimate and respectable friends —while here, she is at liberty to flirt to her heart's content, and have as many men in her train as her fancy dictates. But I am afraid that even among English young ladies, that Miss Driscoll must be something more than ordinary of what you call a flirt. Is that not so?"

"No," replied the Major, concealing his desire to say something rude under a drawling affectation of lack of interest in the subject, "I don't think Miss Driscoll is exactly a flirt, at least not more of a flirt than her opportunities compel her to be.

"You see, if men will openly proclaim themselves the willing slaves of a very pretty girl, it's a difficult thing for her, without making herself absolutely unpleasant, to avoid the appearance of flirtation, in fact she is almost driven to it; she must play one man off against another to a certain extent, if only in self defence, and to keep the balance of favours fairly equal. At the same time, I must confess that there is something about Miss Driscoll that I don't at all understand.

"I don't know any other girl who has refused as many and as good offers as she has during last season and this. She has had two or three coronets laid at her feet, and quite half a dozen very respectable fortunes, usually with very decent fellows attached to them, and yet I think she could honestly say that she has steered her course so well, to use a yachting term, that she has never given any one man real reason to believe that she has in any sense trifled with him.

"The girl's a perfect mystery, and—well, I don't think there's anything more to be said on the subject, for, after all, the same description applies pretty equally to all the members of your delightful sex."

"Very charming, if a trifle vague, Major," replied Madame, looking up with a pretty little moue; "but I suppose the explanation of the mystery, after all, is that she is in no hurry to marry, and has not yet found what the modern novelists call her affinity."

"Very possibly," said the Major, with the air of a man who has had enough of the conversation, "very possibly; I don't suppose she'll be found more intractable than any other woman when the hour and the man arrive."

"No, I don't suppose she will, provided always that the hour does not come too late, and that the man is possible."

"Ah!" The Major let out the ejaculation involuntarily, and Madame distinguished a ring in it that told her quite as much as the plainest of words could have done. With the perfect tact of a well-bred Frenchwoman she promptly changed the subject, and the conversation ran along on more trival matters, until Miss Driscoll caught the Major's eye, and beckoned to him with the pretty assurance of a girl exercising a privilege which she knows will not be disputed.

Madame de Bonneville at once rose from her seat, and said, as though she had not noticed the signal, "Well, I must go into the saloon, for I promised his lordship that I would superintend the decoration of the supper-table, and after supper, you know, we are going to get out the roulette wheel, and indulge in a little pleasant wickedness at each other's expense. You don't gamble, I believe? but I have no doubt you will find something more interesting to do."

With this parting shot Madame vanished down the companion-way, and in another minute the Major had obeyed Maud Driscoll's summons. With dainty tact she somehow managed to give her two admirers to understand that their audience was over, and as soon as they were out of ear-shot she turned to her companion and said:

"May I ask, Major Denver, why you were regarding me with such an obvious air of disapproval from over yonder? Was that spiteful little Frenchwoman drawing any unpleasant comparisons between the freedom of the English girl and the artificial propriety of the French damsel in leading-strings?"

Denver laughed much more pleasantly than he had done a few minutes previously, as he replied:

Divination would seem to be one of your many accomplishments, Miss Driscoll, unless you heard what she was saying, for that is just what she was doing, only I can assure you, in the pleasantest fashion possible.

I think you are rather prejudiced against her. If I am any judge of female character, she is one of the best natured little women alive, and I believe would do almost anything to oblige anyone that she had really taken a fancy to."

"Then, if ever you stand in need of her assistance, I should think you are pretty sure of it, for she certainly seems to have taken a very strong fancy to you."

"Nonsense, child!"

The words came almost rudely from Denver's lips, and then, seeing a curious, half-scared expression on the lovely face that was upturned to his, he went on in strange confusion for so self-possessed a man, "On my honour, I beg your pardon a thousand times, I quite forgot myself. I——"

"Oh, never mind, I'm not at all offended; in fact, I suppose you do really look upon me from the altitude of your superior years as a sort of spoilt child, whose behaviour shows that she ought still to be in leading-strings herself. I suppose that is why you always treat me so differently to all the other men I know.

"No, no, that is by no means the reason," he replied with sudden vehemence, that hardly seemed warranted by the circumstances.

Then he checked himself and went on more quietly, but with an earnestness that looked very like strongly repressed passion.

"I do not treat you as other men do, because—because—I—that is—I mean to say you——"

"Are quite indifferent to me, and you are not so to some of the other men," she broke in almost petulantly, and with a sudden blush that turned the clear, healthy glow of her cheeks into a deep, rosy red. "Is that what you were going to say?"

He looked at her in undisguised amazement for a moment.

The words spoken otherwise might not have meant very much, but they were spoken in a tone that sent the blood flying through his veins as it had never done before, and showed him that what he had scarcely permitted himself to dream of, either was, or might be made into a fact—a fact that was at once delightful and yet horrible beyond measure for him to think of. The few petulant words, spoken in a moment of unguarded haste, had told the secret, which otherwise might never have been uttered.

True, nothing specific had been said; for Maud Driscoll was a girl who would have bitten her tongue in twain—as she now wished she had done—before she would have given him a hint as to the truth. But it was out now, and their eyes had met in a glance which told both of them that there was no further need, or even possibility, of disguise between them.

Denver drew a deep breath, as he might have done under sudden and intense physical pain, and then he put his hand on her shoulder, and said slowly and almost solemnly:

"I see that I must tell you the reason you ask for. It is not the one you imagine, or expect, but there is no time to tell you now. We shall have to go down to supper soon, and those fellows will be back in a few minutes.

"They are going to play roulette after supper, in the cabin. I'm not going to play, and I don't suppose you are. If you will come up on deck as soon as they are settled with their game, I will tell you what, after all, it is better that you should know; nay, what I fancy you now have a right to know, and then—well, then I will go ashore at St. Helier and the Fates must take their course."

While he was speaking she had looked him full and unflinchingly in the eyes, but with her little hands clenched, and her pretty lips drawn tight over her closed teeth. She knew that something that would be terrible for her to hear was coming, but she felt that it was inevitable, and she was too brave to shrink an explanation, which, if left unsaid, would leave even more torturing doubt in its place, so she simply said, in a low, steady voice:

"Yes, I will come," and then she got up and walked slowly and not very steadily towards the companion-way.

As soon as supper was over, and the table cleared, the roulette wheel was ready to spin, Madame de Bonneville was installed as banker, and in the brief confusion of the players taking their places round the table, Denver and Maud Driscoll found no difficulty in leaving the saloon to keep their tryst on deck. It was dark now, and the deck was deserted, save by the man at the wheel and the look-out in the bows.

Both knew what they had come there for, and there was no need for any preliminaries, so Denver went straight to the subject at once, speaking in the slow, deliberate tone of a man who was forcing himself to say that which he would infinitely rather have left unsaid.

"Maud—for I am going to call you Maud to-night, if you will let me—you said before supper that I looked upon you as a child; well, now I am going to talk to you as a woman, and you must listen to me as a woman. But tell me first, as a woman to a man, am I right in concluding from what you said just now, or, rather, I should say, from the way in which you said it, that—well, if I had behaved to you as some other men have, you would not have dealt with me as you have with them?"

As he spoke he felt her hand laid upon his arm; it closed with a firm, nervous grip, and she said:

"No, Frank, I should not, and—and—after that, there is no need for me to tell you that that is the explanation of what most people have, no doubt justly, considered to be my flirtations."

"Even so," he said, putting his hand on hers, and after a single pressure removing it again. "No sweeter words than those could have been spoken to me, and yet I would have given all I possess to have avoided the necessity of your speaking them. Now, listen, and, for Heaven's sake, don't interrupt me or I shall never get said what must be said now, in justice to us both."

"Go on," said she, "even if it be a death-sentence, let me hear it and know the worst."

"A death sentence it may be, so far as I am concerned and, if it is, all the better, for I have loved and lost even that which I can never possess. To-morrow I am going ashore at St. Helier to go back to Southampton, for before we left Cowes I had a letter telling me that my regiment is under orders for Burmah, and we are to sail in a week. There'll be some pretty smart fighting out there and—well, never mind that—that's only the least important part of what I have to tell you."

There was a deck chair under the bulwarks opposite to where they were standing. He crossed the deck, and brought it over. He put her unresisting and still silent into it. Then he sat down on the deck with his back against the mast, and began the story of the ruin of the life that he would so gladly have devoted to her in return for the unsuspected love which she had confessed for him.

He began at the beginning, and spared himself nothing in the recital, so that she might, at least, have the poor consolation of knowing fully the whole chain of miserable circumstances which was drawn like an impassable barrier between them.

He told her how, when he was a young subaltern fifteen years before, he had been entrapped into a marriage with a pretty, fascinating and worthless woman, who, after five years of wretched married life, had taken to drink, and who, for the last ten years, had been drinking herself to death by inches.

For the last four years, he had been separated entirely from her, and all he knew of her was that she was living in Paris on an allowance that he made her, a mere wreck of what she had been, and yet with an indefinite number of years of life before her, life that she clung to tenaciously, even to some extent restraining her passion for liquor in order that by going on living she might, as she told him with brutal frankness, revenge herself on him, for, as she called it, his betrayal and his desertion of her.

Told in detail, as he told it, it was a long and terrible story, which occupied nearly an hour in the telling.

Maud Driscoll listened throughout in silence, broken only every now and then by a quick, half-choked gasp of pain, that she could not altogether stifle, and so engrossed was he in telling and she in listening that neither of them noticed a light foot-fall on the other side of the sail, or was aware of the presence of a listener.

When at last the story was ended, there was silence between them for several minutes.

Then they both rose to their feet and Maud slipped her hand through his arm and led him towards the companion-way, saying as she did so:

"It is enough, it is the inevitable, and neither you nor I can struggle against it. I have loved and lost in the same moment, so have you, and now we must say good-bye."

Yielding to the ungovernable impulse of the moment, he caught her in his arms, and kissed her once, and so the good-bye was said.

Maud went below and at once retired to her own state-room, and to the surprise of the rest of the guests, Denver did what he had never been known to do before, joined the roulette-players and punted with a recklessness that won smile after smile from fortune until the growing pile of notes and gold before him prompted a lady loser to say somewhat spitefully:

"If there's any truth in the proverb 'Luck at cards, unlucky in love' Major——"

"It's a lie, like most proverbs!" laughed Denver with a savage ring in his voice that made everybody at the table look up at once. "If it's true here's a challenge to the Fates!"

As he spoke he put the whole of his pile on 13—and lost.

You would have broken the bank, mon ami, if you had won that coup," said Madame de Bonneville's voice at his elbow. "I wonder if that means a turn of luck both ways? I am glad I got sick of the bank before you began your plunging. You would have ruined me before this. Happily, I had more prudence than you, for when I had won twenty pounds half an hour ago I retired on my laurels."

"Would you like to try again?" said Denver, moving back from the table. "I have had enough now, and am off for a smoke on deck."

Madame yielded to the temptation, and the Major went on deck again to smoke the smoke of bitter reflection. The next day he went ashore at St. Helier, and took the first boat back to Southampton.

Three months later he was hard at work in Burmah. Maud Driscoll had refused two more brilliant offers of marriage, and Madame de Bonneville, with the assistance of a private detective agency, had made the acquaintance of Frank Denver's dipsomaniac wife in Paris. She seemed to take a strange fancy to the wretched creature, and listened without apparent weariness to the story of her wrongs, told over and over again with the half-incoherent garrulity of a mind steeped in alcohol, and always ending with the same savage sentences:

"Yes, I must drink—I can't live without it—but I won't drink myself to death as he wants me to, though I often feel I should be glad to be done with it all. I am his wife, and he may cast me off, but he cannot get rid of me that way. I will live for years yet to spite him, and keep him chained to me. I dare say he has often wanted to marry someone else, but he shan't. I'll live to be a curse to him yet."

But in spite of this resolve, the miserable woman drank very hard at times, and before Madame de Bonneville had known her a month she was turned out of her lodgings for a worse drunken bout than usual. As a sequel to this, she was arrested for making a disturbance in the street, and would have been sent to the Salpetrière, had Madame not come forward, and, on the plea that she had known her in her better days, persuaded the police to hand her over to her, so that she might make one more attempt to reclaim her.

She gave her a couple of rooms in her own house, and armed with the police authority, kept her confined to them for a week, with the exception of necessary exercise under her own supervision. She did not allow her a drop of alcohol, and, replying to her passionate appeals for 'just a little with her meals for the present,' she told her that she must choose between total abstinence with her or the règime of the asylum. The dread of what was really prison enforced submission, but it did not quell her terrible cravings. On the contrary they grew fiercer and fiercer as each day of enforced sobriety passed.

This discipline had lasted seven days when Madame went to Versailles to spend two or three days with her sister.

Before she left home she gave strict orders that "Madame Denver" was not to be permitted to leave the house until her return, and that she was not to be allowed even to catch sight of any alcoholic drink. To make assurance doubly sure the housekeeper locked the outer door of her apartments, determined not to allow her to cross the threshold until her mistress returned.

The prisoner bore her confinement fairly well until the evening of the second day, and then she got restless.

There seemed to be something unaccustomed in the air of her room which excited her almost to fever point.

Some subtle aroma kept stealing to her nostrils, and she sniffed at it as a wild beast might have sniffed the taint of its prey on the air. The housekeeper brought her her supper, and then left her for the night, locking the door after her as she took the supper things away.

Still that faint but penetrating aroma in the room! It seemed to grow stronger after the lights were lit.

The dipsomaniac sniffed eagerly at it, wandering about the room to try and find its source.

Before long she found that it was most pungent near a little cabinet that stood in one corner of the room. She opened it and looked in, still sniffing. Then she put her hand in and when she took it out the fingers were tightly closed round the neck of a daintily chased decanter full of a bright green liquid.

She took out the stopper. Ah! there was no doubt now what the faint subtle smell had been. She stared with glittering eyes wide open in wonder at her fatal good fortune. Her nostrils dilated and her breast heaved as she carried the decanter to her trembling lips, muttering:

"Absinthe! absinthe! I wonder how it got there? They can't have known anything about it or they would have taken it away. I must have just a drop. I can fill it up again with water, and they'll never know. But I mustn't take too much, no not too much, for I have not had any for so long, and it might be dangerous. Absinthe is terrible stuff when you're not accustomed to it. Stop, I'll get a glass and take it comfortably. Just a drop, only a little drop!"

She went into her bedroom and got a glass off her dressing-table. She poured out about a couple of tablespoonfuls of the green liquor and tossed them off. She gasped for breath and stifled a cough for fear she should be heard and someone might come to see what was the matter. Then she got some water to fill the decanter up again. As she was going to pour it in the pungent smell rose to her nostrils again.

She paused irresolute for a moment, and then she put the water down and poured some more absinthe out into the glass, put a little water in and drank it. It was a bigger dose this time, and it was barely swallowed when the starving drink demon within her woke into frenzied and irresistible longing. She didn't think of filling up the decanter now. Even her revenge was lost sight of in that mad moment of re-awakening passion, tenfold intensified by the privation of the past week.

She drank again and again, taking more and more every time, till her throat was burning and her brain reeling, and her shaking hand could hardly carry the glass to her bloated lips.

They found her in the morning lying dead and stiff on the floor with the empty decanter still clutched tightly in her hand and the fragments of the shattered glass beside her. Madame de Bonneville was at once telegraphed for, and as soon as she got back and learnt the news she dismissed the housekeeper on the spot and rated the other servants furiously for leaving the wretched woman alone.

It was in vain that they denied all knowledge of the liquor. Madame vowed that she had left it safe under lock and key, that only the housekeeper had access to it, and that she must have been bribed to betray her trust.

Major Denver's agents, through whom his wife's allowance had been paid, were at once communicated with, and the next day a quiet funeral at Père Lachaise ended the last chapter of the story that Madame de Bonneville had overheard on the deck of the Cynthia between Guernsey and Jersey.

Frank Denver did not find the fate he went to seek in Burmah. "The luck had turned both ways" after all, and he came back with the Victoria Cross to find Maud Driscoll still waiting for the man and the hour—both of which arrived very soon after he landed in England.

Madame de Bonneville was invited to the wedding, but, to her very great regret, other engagements prevented her leaving France just then. She sent wedding-presents to both, and the bridegroom's was a pretty silver-mounted spirit-case, containing three beautifully chased little decanters.

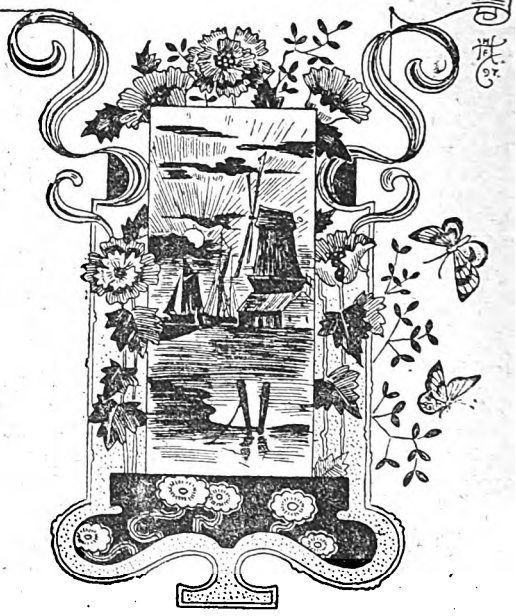
AVENGED BY A SERPENT.



WHEN I got George's letter, telling me that all was now ready for our reception and we were to come at once, I was delighted. Within a week we—mother and I—were on our way out, and in about three weeks' time found ourselves between the swampy shores of the Essequibo, nearing Georgetown in the United States, where on the quay the dear fellow was waiting to take us up to the home he had made for us on his plantation.

George Haden and I had met a year before during his visit to England and the big, quiet, sunburnt man and I, who tell his story, had fallen in love with one another almost at the first sight.

We were to have been married before he returned to Guiana, but he was recalled suddenly by the death of his only brother at Rio, and it was arranged I should follow later with mother.

You can—or, rather, you can't—imagine how delighted I was to see my sweetheart again. But I was startled and a good deal troubled by his appearance; he looked thin and worried. At first I put it down to his grief at Harry's death; but later, after our quiet wedding, on the way to my future home, I gathered by degrees there was more than that.

His brother Harry had married a Spaniard—a beautiful woman—who had died nearly eighteen years before, leaving him with one daughter, Teresa. It was chiefly on this girl's account that George had hurried back, and he had mentioned in writing to me that he had brought her up from Rio to stay with him in Guiana until other arrangements could be made. Since then I had heard little of her, and almost, indeed, in my own happiness and excitement forgotten her very existence.

Now my questions elicited from George that she was not a pleasant tempered young woman, or easy to get on with, but my worst anticipations did not touch the reality.

We came up the river in a small steamer, which dropped us at my husband's very wharf, and we three walked up a slope through a wonderful tropical garden to where a long, whitewashed, green-shuttered house shone clean and bright in the evening sun.

On the veranda stood a tall figure in a pale yellow gown, her black hair crowned with crimson hibiscus. A splendidly handsome woman.

She looked at me in a half-disdainful way.

"So you're my new aunt?" she said casually. "And how do you do, Uncle George?"

Her calm assumption of superiority was unbearable. George—big, steady, good-tempered man that he was—flushed with anger.

He whispered to me:

"Never mind, my dear. She knows no better; and it won't be for long."

But it was for longer than we reckoned. She was to have been sent to her godmother, who lived in Madrid. But the old lady was ill, and begged us to keep the girl a while longer.

It was trying to a degree, and each day got worse and worse. Teresa's temper was something unbearable, and her general lack of manners only equalled by her sweetness when there was anything to be gained by it. Still, for my husband's sake, I bore with her.

Toward the end of the cool weather our old English overseer died, and, as a stop-gap, George took on a young Spanish-American, Ramon Martinez.

Ramon was a smart-looking fellow, but there was something in his black eyes which repelled me. I always felt a shrinking repulsion for the man, and George didn't much care for him. Still, it was necessary to have some one who understood the sugar, and men who knew anything were so scarce you couldn't pick and choose.

Teresa, who loved the cheap gaieties of Rio, had been simply bored to death all the winter. Ramon was a godsend to her, and the two used to chat in Spanish every evening over their coffee on the veranda.

Sometimes I blame myself for letting them be so much together, but, to tell the truth, the relief of getting rid of her even for an hour or two was very great. And how could I know what a scoundrel the man was, or what unspeakable wickedness those two were brewing together?

And now I must pass over the events of the next ten months, and tell you what happened on that dreadful day which so nearly proved fatal to all my happiness.

Digitized by Google

Old Juan, a half-caste Indian employé on the place, came up that morning wanting to see my husband. They talked for a time, and then I saw George go out with a gun on his shoulder.

He saw me at the window and called out something, but I could not hear what it was.

He was a keen collector, and I supposed it was some rare bird or beast he was after.

The day passed, and the short, tropical twilight was closing over the forest when I saw George returning. He was followed by two negroes, who slowly dragged some long, heavy object up the path to the house. This they pulled along, trailing in the dust, round to the south end of the house, where George's big so-called study, really a sort of museum, opened by two French windows on the lawn.

I was dressing for dinner, so did not go out.

Soon I heard George's long stride pass upstairs by my door to his dressing-room, which lay beyond my room at the extreme north end of the house.

To make you understand what followed I must partly explain how the house was built. It was from north to south, long and narrow, with a verandah all the way round.

A wide hall ran through from east to west, and a long narrow one from north to south. The dining-room was the front room at the north end, under my room; George's study at the south, under the room Teresa occupied. There were two staircases, one at each end of the house. A couple of hundred yards away, higher up the slope at the back of the house, was the cottage where Martinez lived. He, Martinez, generally dined with us, and was to have done so that night.

Now, so far as I know, and judging from what we made out afterwards from letters we discovered in the cottage and in Teresa's room, this is what brought about the tragedy that followed:

Ramon must have long before this have made up his mind to marry Teresa. Her small fortune was an irresistible bait to the indolent Southerner. The only thing that troubled him was that she was not of age for another three years, and George was her guardian and sole trustee.

He knew well enough what George would say or do if he once heard of his pretentions. With a man of Ramon's type—almost conscienceless—the next idea was simply to get George out of the way. Once get rid of the uncle and what was there to hinder his making off with Teresa and her money?

Undoubtedly he instilled these ideas into Teresa's mind, and she, her sullen temper already aflame at the hint of opposition, was soon ripe for any mischief. Whether this precious pair had already concocted any definite plan I don't know, but that they were only waiting a chance what follows proves.

On this particular evening Teresa had dressed earlier and gone down. For some reason—I don't know what—she went to the study and opened the door.

A French window was open, and in the moonlight which had already succeeded the dusk she caught sight of something moving through it, undulating in rustling coils up from the grass beyond.

Terrified, she closed the door and stood an instant panting with fright.

What was it?

Suddenly it flashed across her.

She had just before seen from her window the men bringing in her uncle's spoil, a great anaconda, or water-boa, the largest and most powerful constrictor in the world.

This was his mate. Her chance had come.

Always before dinner her uncle would go to his room to fetch the cigar he lit immediately dinner was over. He would go once more—for the last time.

How I can imagine her stealing quietly away from the door back with stealthy footsteps up the stairs to her room and sitting there watching the clock, counting every moment till the gong should summon her uncle to his fate behind that closed door.

Closer and closer crept the hands to eight o'clock, and still she sat and watched.

Suddenly in the hall below sounded footsteps across the polished boards.

Unnaturally loud they seemed as they passed slowly down the passage beneath. There was the sound of a turning latch, an instant's pause, and then—one long, horrible sound, half shriek, half yell, which grew shriller, then muffled and then abruptly ceased.

The shriek I heard with almost equal distinctness away at the other end of the house. To this day I can sometimes hear it, and it comes back to me in dreadful dreams.

I heard my husband rush from his room and his flying feet down the stairway. Other sounds I heard—cries of terror and alarm, hurrying footsteps and slamming of doors.

Then I summoned courage to follow. As I ran through the hall two shots rang out in rapid succession. A frightful pounding, like a dozen sledge hammers going at once, ensued; and next I heard a scream of maniacal laughter, and Teresa rushed by me and out into the night.

The next thing I remember is George's voice, in tones of strong command:

"Keep back, Marian!" he called; "it is no fit sight for you."

I stood there in the middle of the passage, while round the open study door stood a little knot of our black servants. Their faces were ashen with terror, and the whites of their eyes goggled horribly. A thin smoke floated out of the room and the keen smell of gunpowder filled the air. The throbbing beat had almost ceased, and George passed into the room, while I staggered back, and, sinking into a chair in the hall, fainted dead away.

I need hardly explain what had happened.

The wretched Ramon had come in earlier than usual to dinner; had, contrary to his usual custom, gone to the study, evidently to leave the pass-book for the day, and had walked straight into the trap set for another. Those horrible coils had crushed him to death long before even George could reach the spot, while the great snake in its terrible death agonies, had rent the wretch's body in a shocking way, leaving an unrecognisable mass.

That was what Teresa had seen. The shock no doubt had driven her mad.

When she ran out she went straight to the river—at least, we suppose so, for we never saw anything of her again.

There are alligators in those waters.

Since then my husband and I have almost forgotten the tragedy. We are very happy alone together in our sunny tropic home.

A Cigar and a Moustache.

As the coffee was being served, the lady of the house said: "You need not refrain from smoking, gentlemen, it is not in the least disagreeable to me," at the same time making a sign to her husband.

He left the table, and in a couple of minutes returned with a box of magnificent cigars, which was passed round from guest to guest. When my turn came I tendered it to my neighbour on the left, he gently declined, saying:

"Thank you. I do not smoke."

"You do not smoke," remarked our hostess, "how has that come about?"

"It's a penance, madam."

"A penance! I do not understand. Can you explain the mystery?"

"Certainly. Here's the story!

"Twenty-five years ago I was, at least so people told me, a fine-looking young man. I had at any rate a pretty fair moustache. It was quite thick in the centre, and graduated into two little sharp points at the sides which I used to twist cavalierly in the air. My friends said that no lady's heart could resist such moustaches. They perhaps, exaggerated, but I certainly captured a few.

"At last, one fine day, or rather one fine night, for it was at a ball—I fell in love. She was an adorable young girl. I danced three waltzes with her, and from the first I knew my heart was lost.

"When I made inquiries about her next day I learnt she was the daughter of a millionaire—a very honourable family—and that her parents expected something wonderful in the way of a son-in-law—a pearl in fact.

"A pearl! I was too modest to expect to realise the ideal demanded; and even though I were a pearl, as I had very little money I thought it better to abstain from all further advances.

"When one is in love it is rare—it is not easy—to keep the secret hidden. In short, mine went from friend to friend, and salon to salon, until at last it reached the ears of Mlle. Genevieve that a young man with a fair moustache was dying for love of her. It seems I had made an impression on her too."

"Your moustache?" I interrupted.

"Yes, my moustache. Whatever it was, Mlle. Genevieve made her papa understand that she wished to marry me.

"Our engagement lasted six weeks. Six weeks of paradise for me! Six weeks during which I was willing to sacrifice the world for Genevieve!

"Her saying, one evening, 'I beg you, my dear, not to smoke any more,' was enough to make me throw away at once the cigar just commenced, and I even determined not again to touch the box I had broken into that very morning.

"I expressly left it open within reach of my friends, of my concierge, of my servants, and I must say all these good people, as if they guessed my desire, did their best to diminish my chances of falling into temptation.

"At last the great day arrived, I mean the day of our marriage, before the Mayor.

"It was arranged that I was to meet Genevieve at her home at half-past one. I got up early, I shaved, dressed, breakfasted, put on my new dress coat, made expressly for the occasion. Then ready, having given the fancy twist to my moustache, I looked at my watch—twelve o'clock. An hour to wait. I was burning with nervous impatience. I went backwards and forwards. I sat down, I jumped up. Looking for some distraction to help to pass away this hour of waiting. My eyes fell on the mantelpiece and the cigar box. Mechanically I went towards it. I opened it. One cigar remained in the bottom. I took it out. I fingered it. It was of the choicest quality. I let it fall quickly back into the box again, and moved out of the way of temptation! I looked at my watch half a quarter past twelve. More than three-quarters of an hour still to wait. I returned towards the chimney, again took out the cigar, and bit the end off with my teeth. I lit it, and, stretching back in an armchair, I commenced to smoke. It was delicious, I leant back my head, closed my eyes, and in a couple of minutes I felt that sweet sensation, neighbour of sleep when thought ends, and dreams begin.

"I was suddenly roused by a slight smell of burning. I got up, examined everywhere hurriedly—the curtains, the draperies, my coat, waistcoat! Nothing! I must have been dreaming. I looked at my watch—twenty-five minutes past one. I rushed out, drove like fur to the house of my intended wife—both the concierge and coachman were trying not to laugh at my haste.

"When John, the porter, opened the door for me, he almost fainted with surprise.

"'Everyone has gone, monsieur. You are to follow on to the Mairie, so Mdlle. Genevieve told me to tell you. She did not seem pleased, monsieur.' I saw that the fellow could not keep from laughing.

"'Is it at me you are laughing, boy?'

"'Monsieur knows I will not do any such thing. Besides, he knows what pleases Mademoiselle, and if she admires them like that!'

"As I hastened off I heard a general tittering.

"At ten minutes past two I was at the Mayor's.

"'The registry of marriages? Not for yourself, perhaps?

"'Yes, for myself,' I replied.

"'For you?—Ah, she must be very good, very good!' And he fell on to a bench holding his sides with laughter.

"I don't know how I kept from boxing his ears. However he showed me the registry.

"I ran towards the door indicated, and entered.

"'Ah! Here he comes at last!' exclaimed my father-in-law.

"I advanced towards the table. Shrieks of laughter arose on all sides, The Mayor seemed smothering in his chair. Genevieve buried her face in her hands. Her mother gesticulated indignantly. As to her father, he came towards me, and said in a tone which showed he meant it:

"'Monsieur, everything is over between us.'

"'But what's the matter?'

"'The matter is monsieur, that marriage is a sacred thing—and that we are not going through the Carnival.'

"'But I cannot understand!'

"'Look in the glass, then!'

"I went to the glass and uttered a cry of surprise and horror at what I saw. All the right side of my moustache was burnt off.

"I made my escape as quickly as possible. Do you understand now why I never smoke cigars?"

"And is that all?" said I to the narrator.

"No. Six months after I met Genevieve again!"

"And we had an explanation, Monsieur," said a handsome and attractive lady opposite.

The Deceiving of Mère Marchette.

I.

It was half-past eleven on a hot July day in Paris. The sunlight lay over the whole city, and shone nowhere more strongly than upon the great hospital of the Salpêtrière. Nobody was stirring unless forced to activity by some pressing duty. In the long white wards the patients were asleep or lying quiet in exhaustion under the burning fervour of the summer heat.

Down one of the corridors, where it seemed refreshingly cool after the warmth of the outer air from which he had come, a young man was passing. His step, though rapid, had the noiseless quality which bespeaks familiarity with the sick room and the hospital. His figure was compact and nervous, his glance clear and keen. Dr. Jean Lommel was one of the house physicians of the Salpêtrière, although that he was not now making his regular rounds was evident from the fact that entering a certain ward he passed quickly to a bed near the middle of it without stopping at any of the others.

On the bed lay an old woman. Her face was one which showed great strength of character. It was of a marked peasant type, and for all its innumerable wrinkles, its sunken temples, the coarse texture of its skin, and the shrunken lips which showed the lack of teeth behind them, it was full of a nobility and kindliness which no ravages of time or disease could wholly hide.

The hair that straggled in thin locks from beneath the white cap was hardly less snowy than the material which covered it; and when the patient opened her sunken eyes, as the doctor stopped beside the bed, they were bright and shining with a lustre which was not all either fever or anxiety. Her glance was one of intense and pitiful inquiry. The young man touched her white hair with the tips of his long fine fingers in a pitying caress, before he took hold of the withered wrist, shrunken and marked with blue veins, that lay outside the coverlet.

"In an hour, Mère Marchette," he said, answering her look—"in an hour he will be here; keep up a good heart. You do not suffer?"

The old woman feebly shook her head. The ghost of a smile, faint, but full of happiness, shone in her face. She did not speak, but she thanked him with a look before she closed her eyes, and lay as motionless as she had previously been.

The young man looked at her a moment, an expression of pity in his brown eyes; then with a sigh he turned away, and moved softly down the ward again. By the door he encountered one of the nurses, who had risen and come forward to speak to him.

"Will she live, M. Lommel?"

"Yes," the doctor answered. "She has given all her energies for days to keeping alive till her grandson gets here. It is very singular," he went on, in a voice of low distinctness that could have been acquired only in sick rooms, "how her instinct has taught her to save her strength. She never moves nor speaks; she simply lives."

"She has been that way," the nurse returned, "ever since we told her that Pierre was coming. Will he be here by twelve?"

"Not till half-past twelve," Dr. Lommel replied. "I will return before then."

And he went out into the hot sunshine.

II.

Everybody connected with the ward of Salpêtrière, wherein she was, held a kindly feeling for poor old Mère Marchette. The doctors and the nurses could not have been more kind or more tender had she been of their own blood. She was one of those who always win affection. She was so patient, so simple, so kindly.

She was a peasant woman from Normandy, who had in her old age drifted to Paris with her grandson Pierre, a lad of sixteen years.

All the rest of the family were dead. Pierre's father had been a soldier, and it was with the hope of securing a pension for his son that Mère Marchette had left her home and the life in Normandy she loved, to throw herself into Paris as into the sea. The dead soldier, however, had been mustered out before the malarial fever, contracted in the swamps of the Landes, had developed itself, and the pension could not be obtained. The disappointment was a bitter one, made worse by the fact that Mère Marchette had been told by one and another that the claim would have been granted had the case been properly managed.

The poor old creature could not escape a feeling of self-blame in thinking that it was her want of keenness which had deprived Pierre of his pension. Her grandson for her represented the world, and to him she devoted all her energies. She toiled for him, and watched and suffered with that unselfish egotism possible only to the old and lonely.

Fortunately Pierre was a good lad, who returned his grandmother's love with a devotion hardly less complete than her own. They lived together in two attic rooms, where they passed the evenings sitting in the dark, and talking of their Normandy home. They recalled the past, and built endless air castles of the time when they should be able to return. They had grand plans of repurchasing the old cot where both of them had been born, and which had been lost by the foreclosure of a mortgage after the long illness of Pierre's father had ended.

They were never tired of talking of what they would do then, and of devising little ways in which the worn-out old farm might be made more profitable.

In the daytime Mère Marchette went out to do work as charwoman, while Pierre had been fortunate enough to obtain a place as assistant in a little grocery in Rue M. le Prince. It was in connection with this that Pierre gave his grandmother the only real grief he ever caused her while they were together. Suddenly the boy began to stay away in the evening, and when Mère Marchette sought to know the reason, he put her questions aside.

One evening, as she was making her way home, she saw her grandson chatting with a girl at the door of a milliner's shop. The heart of poor old Mère Marchette sank within her. The castles in the air, from whose glittering towers had shone delusive lights to strengthen and encourage her, fell in ruins before her eyes. In a moment the burden of her age, her poverty, her weariness, seemed increased tenfold.

She had all the peasant's instinctive distrust of Paris; she had not been able to live in the Latin Quarter without comprehending something of the evil about her, although, happily for her, the worst features of Parisian life would have been so unintelligible that she might have seen them unmoved. She thought no evil now of Pierre but she was seized with a terrible fear lest he might fall a victim to one of the sirens of the Latin Quarter, who, to Mère Marchette's thinking, destroyed soul and body alike.

Mère Marchette did not tell Pierre of the discovery she had made. She was only more gentle with him, while in secret she prayed more fervently. For some days longer the lad's mysterious absence continued, the sad hours of the evening stretching like long deserts of agony, over which the soul of Mère Marchette walked painfully with bleeding feet. And then one night Pierre came home with eyes aglow, and all was explained. He put into his grandmother's hand a little pile of francs—a sum pitiful enough in itself, but large to them—and told how a milliner in the street beyond had employed him in moving boxes and clearing out the attics of her house, which were to be remodelled into lodgings.

This had been his secret, and in his thought of the joyful surprise he was to give his grandmother, he had forgotten the pain she might endure by misunderstanding his absence.

It was such trifles as this that were the great events in the life of Mère Marchette and Pierre. There was a tenderness, an unselfishness, an idyllic devotion in their love which no amount of wealth, or culture, or rank could have heightened; but in the lad's veins was the blood of a soldier, that stirred hot with the currents of a vigorous youth. Of the army he had dreamed from his cradle, and strong as was his love for Mère Marchette, the force of destiny was stronger. It was the old tragedy of youth and age, of the absorption of maternal love and the restless impulses of the boy's heart.

Pierre justified his desire to himself with the excuse that he could earn more money in the ranks; but his grandmother knew only too well the force of the instinct he had inherited. She had seen the same struggle in the life of his father.

When Pierre was eighteen he shouldered his musket and marched away, leaving poor old Mère Marchette as much a stranger in Paris as when she had come to it two years before, to weep and pray alone. It would hardly be within the power of words to paint the anguish which lay between Pierre's departure and that hot July noon when Mère Marchette lay dying at the Salpêtrière.

Always in Paris she had been like a wild thing, caged and bewildered, confused by the life that swirled about her in the great city, even when she had been sustained by the presence of Pierre. When he was gone the gentle old soul began to die of home-sickness and heartbreak.

For two years she fought death stolidly, but persistently, refusing to acknowledge to herself that she was breaking down under the stress of loneliness and sorrow. She came of a race that died hard, and although she was past eighty, she looked forward hopefully to the time when Pierre should leave the army and come back to live with her again.

But the struggle for existence in Paris was hard, even when the joy of working for Pierre sustained her; when he was gone it became intolerable. At the end of two years the strength and courage even of the sturdy Norman peasant woman were exhausted; and then a dreadful disease, which had before shown itself in her family, seemed to take advantage of her weakness to spring upon her. She had been a charwoman in the family of Jean Lommel's mother, and so it came about that through the influence of the young doctor she had been admitted to the Salpêtrière when she was already dying of cancer in the stomach.

There was no patient in the ward who was not of better birth than Mère Marchette. She was of all most deficient in education, in knowledge of the world, in the graces of life; and yet of them all it was only the poor old peasant woman who awakened in the minds of the attendants a glow of genuine affection. There are some people who are born to be loved, and when these rare beings remain worthy of it, neither age, nor poverty, nor sickness can destroy their power of awakening affection.

The hired nurses touched their lips to her forehead in kisses given furtively, as if they were surprised, and prepared to be ashamed, of the emotion which called from them this unwonted display. The doctors spoke to her in tones unprofessionally soft, while Dr. Lommel, who had charge of the ward, treated her with an affectionate courtesy scarcely less warm than that he would have shown to his own grandmother.

They all knew that Mère Marchette must die, and from counting the time in weeks they had dropped to days, and then to hours. Indeed it seemed only the old woman's will which kept her alive now until Pierre should come. She had borne all her sufferings without a murmur, but she had not been able wholly to repress the cry of her heart.

The young soldier's regiment was in Algiers, and there had been difficulties about his furlough. Had it been any other death-bed in the hospital to which he had been summoned these difficulties would hardly have been surmounted, but in behalf of Mère Marchette the physicians had worked so zealously that all obstacles were removed and Pierre's leave of absence granted. From the moment she had been told that her grandson was on his way she had been perfectly quiet, and, as the doctor said, had devoted her whole body to keeping alive untill Pierre should come.

And on this hot July noon the train which was bringing Pierre was drawing nearer to Paris, and Mère Marchette lay so still that she seemed scarcely to breathe—so still that one might fancy she would not even think, lest in so doing she exhausted some precious grain of strength, and so should die without the blessing of that last embrace.

III.

Whoever keeps himself informed of the course of modern scientific investigations is likely to be aware that especial attention has been given at the Salpêtrière to that strange physical or psychical fact known as hypnotism.

To the outside observer no feature of this strange power is more remarkable than the influence the hypnotist may exert over his subject after the trance is broken. A hypnotised person may be told to perform any act on awaking, and when seemingly restored to his normal condition bears the impress of that command so strongly that he is urged to obey it by an irresistible impulse. It is quite as easy, moreover, to foist upon the patients the most extraordinary delusions. The subject is told that upon awaking a bottle will seem to be a lamp, a blank card a picture, or any other deception which comes into the mind of the hypnotist; and so perfect is the working of this mysterious and terrible law that the delusion is accomplished to its minutest details.

Dr. Lommel, like all his young confrères, had become intensely interested in all these researches, so like a scientific realisation of the fairy tales of the Orient. He had even tried some experiments on his own account; and when the sufferings of Mère Marchette became pitifully intense he had ventured to attempt the substitution of hypnotism for opiates in relieving her distress. The old woman had not easily yielded to this influence. Susceptibility to hypnotism is more apt to be found in hysterical or nervously sensitive subjects than in such sturdy characters. By degrees, however, Dr. Lommel established control over her.

In the end, to throw her into a hypnotic sleep, he had only to hold his forefinger an inch or two from her forehead, so that her eyes, in looking at it, turned upward and inward a little. He did not experiment with Mère Marchette; he felt too tenderly toward the old woman to make her the subject of scientific investigation outside of the direct line of treatment.

He simply said: "When you awaken you will be free from pain, Mère Marchette;" then he would breathe lightly on her forehead, and the sick woman would awaken, to lie as peaceful as if no terrible disease was gnawing like a tiger at her vitals.

The case had attracted a good deal of attention at the Salpêtrière, and, although Mère Marchette was utterly ignorant of it, her sick-bed was a point of interest toward which were turned the thoughts of physicians over half of Europe. The unlearned peasant, to whom the simplest terms of science would have been unintelligible, was furnishing data for future scientific treatises; and people of whose very existence she was unaware read the daily bulletins of her condition with closest eagerness.

IV.

It was a few minutes after twelve o'clock when Dr. Lommel re-entered the ward. Mère Marchette lay apparently sleeping, but as he approached her bedside the old eyes opened with a piercing and eager question. The young man shook his head, smiling tenderly.

"Not yet, Mère Marchette," he said. "There are still some minutes to wait."

He sat down beside the bed, and laid his fingers on her wrist. The pulse was so faint that he could scarcely feel it, but it was steady. For some minutes he remained quiet, with his eyes fixed on the poor old face before him. There came into his mind the thought of what this woman's life had been—her childhood and youth in the hut of a Norman peasant; of what her own home might have been when she became a wife and mother; of the desolation which had come upon her in the death of all her family save only Pierre; of the strange fate that had brought her to Paris; of the terrible wrench which her old heart must have felt when her grandson was taken from her; and of the pathetic patience with which she had borne privation, loneliness, and suffering.

He knew only the outlines of her history, since Mère Marchette had spoken little of herself. What her feelings might have been he could only imagine; the old woman could not have told her mental experiences; she had never even analysed them. Unless he had been a peasant and a mother himself, Lommel could not have divined Mère Marchette's emotions; he could only reflect what he should have felt in her place. He said to himself at last that, after all, the circumstances which made Mère Marchette's lot so pathetic must also have deadened her sensibilities, and so have softened her suffering.

He sighed and looked at his watch. His assistant had gone to the railway station to meet Pierre, and the time he had fixed for their return was already past by five minutes. He felt again his patient's pulse, with a terrible dread lest after all the young soldier should arrive too late. The artery throbbed more feebly, but still steadily, and at his touch the sick woman opened her eyes with the old questioning look.

"Patience, Mère Marchette," he said, nodding encouragingly, "all goes well."

She did not speak, but she gave him a look so eloquent with gratitude that words were not needed. Then she lay quiet again, and the silent watch went on. Five minutes passed, ten, fifteen; the young doctor became extremely uneasy. At last in the distance he heard a clock strike one. At the sound Mère Marchette opened her eyes with a quick, startled glance.

"Pierre!" she cried, in a voice of intense love and terror.

"Victor has gone to the station to meet him; patience yet a little."

The old woman regarded him with a look of terrible pathos.

"God could not let me die without seeing Pierre," she murmured.

At that moment through the still afternoon was heard the sound of a carriage. Mère Marchette's eyes shone with a wild and fevered express on.

"You must be calm," Lommel said, "I will bring him to you."

He administered the little stimulant she could take, and passed quickly out into the corridor.

V.

Dr. Lommel closed the door of the ward behind him and started down the corridor, but at the first step he stopped suddenly with a terrible sinking of the heart. Victor was coming toward him, but alone, and with a white face.

"Victor," Jean cried, in a voice intense but low, "what has happened? Where is Pierre?"

"There has been an accident," Victor returned. "A bridge broke under his train."

"But you do not know—" began Lommel.

"Yes," the other interrupted; "M. de Brue, who was on the train and escaped with a broken arm, was in the same compartment with Pierre. He rode through on the engine that came in for help. Pierre had told him I was to meet him, and so when M. de Brue saw me he stopped to say that the soldier was struck on the chest and killed instantly."

Dr. Lommel stood regarding his companion with terror and compassion in his look.

"Oh, mon Dieu!" he said; "poor Mère Marchette!"

"It will kill her," Victor responded.

"That is nothing," was the doctor's reply. "It is not death, but the agony she will suffer."

At that moment the nurse came out of the ward and hurried down the corridor to join them.

"M. le Docteur," she said, "I beg your pardon, but the excitement of Mére Marchette is so great that I venture to suggest that her grandson hurry."

She glanced round as she spoke, and saw that he was not there. An exclamation rose to her lips; the doctor checked her by a glance.

"Go back to Mère Marchette," said he, "and say that I am cautioning Pierre——stay, I will go myself. Wait here, Victor."

He went back into the ward, and passed down between the cots, from which eyes, that the indifference of illness scarcely left human, watched him with faint curiosity. Mère Marchette was sitting up in bed, trembling with eagerness and excitement. All the reserve which she had maintained for weeks had been swept aside. The moment for which she had kept herself alive had come at last, and there was no longer any need to save her energy. Her eyes shone, a feverish glow was on her cheek, even her withered lips had taken on for the moment a wan and ghostly red. It seemed to the doctor, as he looked at her, as if all the vitality which remained in her feeble frame was being expended in a last quick fire.

"Ah," he said, "I have been warning Pierre to be calm, when it is you to whom I should speak. Come, it will only take a moment, but I must give you treatment before I can let you see him."

As he spoke he put his forefinger up to her forehead with a gesture he always used in hypnotising her. Mère Marchette struggled a moment as if she would not yield to anything which delayed her reunion with Pierre; then she sank into a hypnotic sleep. The doctor leant forward, and spoke with an emphasis which he had never before used with his patient.

"When you awake," he said, "you will see Pierre; the person I shall bring to you is your grandson. Remember," he repeated, "it is Pierre who will come in with me."

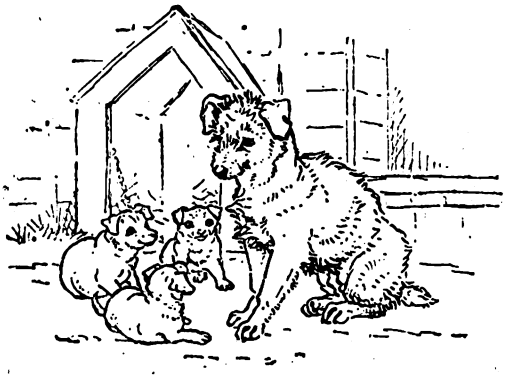
He breathed on her eyelids in the usual method of awakening her.

"Now," he said, "I will bring him here, Mère Marchette."

He went back to where Victor and the nurse were awaiting him.

"Victor," he said quickly, "you know the experiment

Digitized by Google



M. Charcot tried yesterday when he made a hypnotised patient believe one person was another: I have told Mère Marchette that you are Pierre. You must take his place; come quickly."

The young man drew back.

"I cannot," he protested.

"You must," Lommel returned, almost fiercely. "Come."

VI.

It was with terrible inward misgiving that Jean and Victor entered the ward; but as soon as the eyes of Mère Marchette fell upon the latter, they knew that the experiment was a success. Such a look of yearning love illumined the withered, old features, such an unspeakable joy shone in the sunken eyes, such quivering eagerness was expressed by the outstretched hands, that the young men found their way to the bedside blinded by tears.

An inarticulate cry, that was half moan and half sob, burst from the lips of Mère Marchette as Victor fell on his knees by the bedside. Carried out of himself by genuine feeling, the young man had no need to simulate the emotions necessary for the part he was playing. Seizing the wrinkled hand which lay before him on the bed, he covered it with tears and kisses; then with a cry of piercing sweetness, Mère Marchette flung herself forward into his arms.

"Oh, Pierre, Pierre!" she sobbed. "Oh, the good God, the good God!"

She clasped her arms about his neck, she strained him to her breast, the feebleness of her dying embrace transformed to strength by the divine fervour of maternal love. She mingled her kisses with a soft and hardly articulate babble of endearing words; the terms which she had used over his cradle she mingled with the pet names of his childhood, and the loving speech which belonged to maturer years. She held him away from her that she might look at him, and her eyes were holden so that she saw in his face the changes that her fancy had pictured in thinking of the real Pierre.

"Ah," she said, "how brown thou hast grown; and thou art such a man now! Ah, thou rogue," she went on, laughing softly, "I knew thou hadst grown a beard—and not a word of it in thy letters. But I knew."

She put her thin fingers under his chin, and with a sudden gravity lifted his face.

"Look in my eyes," she said; "why dost thou turn away? Hast thou not been a good boy? Hast thou not loved the good God?'

Poor Victor, overwhelmed with the dreadful consciousness of deceit, found it almost impossible, in face of this touching and pious affection, to meet the old woman's glance. He struggled to force himself to look into her eyes unwaveringly. Dr. Lommel laid his hand upon his companion's shoulder.

"Yes, Mère Marchette," said he, "Pierre is a good lad, that I will answer for."

The old woman raised her eyes towards Heaven, and her lips moved. She was evidently praying. She had received extreme unction just before noon, but this moment in which she commended her grandson to God was to her no less solemn than that of her own last communion. Then she put out her hand to Dr. Lommel with her smile of wonderful sweetness and an air of noble simplicity.

"You have been so kind to old Mère Marchette," were her words; "the good God will reward you."

He looked at the old dying peasant woman and tried to speak, but his sobs choked him. He bent and kissed her hand, and laid it gently in that of Victor. Her little strength was evidently failing fast. With a last effort she made a movement to drag herself nearer to Victor. He understood her wish and supported her in his arms.

"Promise me," she murmured, her voice wasted almost to a whisper, "that thou wilt be good."

"I promise," he answered.

And the words were no less sincere because she mistook the speaker. A smile of heavenly rapture came over her face; she tried to speak and failed. But Victor understood her wish and kissed her. As their lips parted she sighed quiveringly.

"She is dead," said Dr. Lommel.

VII.

Victor laid the body gently back upon the bed, and rose to his feet. He seized his friend by the shoulders; the tears were streaming down his cheeks.

"Oh, mon Dieu, Jean!" he cried. "To deceive such trust. I feel as if I have been violating a sacrament."

"I know," the other answered; "but ah, how happy she was!"

OUGHT YOU TO HAVE HAD ONE OF THOSE FIVE POUNDS?

The result of the distribution in connection with the ten £5 notes offered every week in P.W. appears in the current issue of that paper. Two out of the ten people selected have been fortunate enough to secure £5 each by forwarding their names to this office. There are eight others, who, by failing to apply, either through indifference, or through their not being readers, did not secure their money. Their names and addresses are also given. Are you one of them?

WHY INDUCE HEART DISEASE TO CURE YOUR HEAD
When you can get a real safe remedy like KAPUTINE?
Dr. Thurston, Licentiate, of the Royal College of Physicians, writes November 16th: "Knowing the formulæ from which KAPUTINE is compounded, I unhesitatingly recommend its use in preference to crude Antifibrin and other synthetic drugs which, unfortunately for sufferers, are so commonly used for Headache, and which have undoubtedly injurious effects on the Heart, Brain, and Vesicle tissues generally."
NOTHING LIKE KAPUTINE. NOTHING SIMILAR. NOTHING AS GOOD.
All leading Chemists sell it. Packets of 18 doses 1s. Sample 1d.
After 13 Years' Suffering, Cured for 1s.
The Rev. T. TAYLOR, Vicar of St. Bredward, Cornwall, writes: "Owing to a severe accident while riding, my wife has for the past thirteen years been subject to violent attacks of neuralgia. The relief she has experienced from KAPUTINE has been speedy and effectual. KAPUTINE, while it is efficacious in its use, is attended with none of the disagreeable after effects which she has experienced in the case of other drugs."
After 10 Weeks' Suffering, Cured for 1d.
DEER RECTORY, MINTLAW, ABERDEEN,
From Rev. J. H. BURN. NOVEMBER 8TH, 1897.
"My own cure with one dose of KAPUTINE was marvellous after ten weeks incessant neuralgia.
Used also by Her Grace the Countess of Cavan, Lady Dashwood, The Countess of Munster, Surgeon Lieut.-Col. Baker, etc., etc.

AIDS TO ACCURACY.

F. T.—Yes, it is a fact that the number of brewing licenses taken out has fallen off very much lately. During the last twelve years there has been a decrease of 10,568.

A. T. has a penny in his possession bearing on it the letter H. He wants to know the meaning thereof.———— No doubt it is one of those made by Messrs. Ralph Heaton and Sons, the proprietors of the Birmingham mint. This firm was founded by the man who invented the hot shot used at the siege of Gibraltar, and so saved the fortress.

G. H.—Every President of the United States has been either a lawyer or a soldier, or both.

Householder.—If a yard-dog is to be depended upon as a reliable protector of the house to which he is attached, it stands to reason that the better his state of health the more efficient he will be. A dog that is surfeited with indigestible and inappropriate food is no more to be expected to be alert by night and day than is one that is suffering from the pangs of rheumatism. On the other hand, a hungry dog is far more likely to accept without demur the poisonous bait offered to him by strangers who desire to silence his bark for felonious purposes of their own.

Scotty.—It takes fifty tons of paint to give the Forth Bridge one coat of paint, the area dealt with being something like 120 acres.

Waitress.—The waitresses on the terrace of the House of Commons are not engaged by session, or even by the week, but from day to day, and the number engaged depends upon the state of the weather.

B. B.—The great puff-ball increases its size more rapidly than any other form of vegetation. It frequently springs from a tiny bud to the size of a full-bodied pumpkin in the course of a night, and calculations have proved that it increases at the rate of sixty million cells a minute.

T. H.—The first printed books had their leaves printed on one side only, the blank sides being pasted together.

Economist.—One of the cheapest British towns to live in is Bristol; another Birmingham. The cheapest of all, however, is Liverpool. During the past few years rents have dropped 25 per cent. in some parts of the city, and, taken all round, meat and provisions are abnormally cheap.

D. B.—The reading of romances is forbidden by the Koran; that is the reason popular romances are never put in writing among the Mohammedans, but are passed from one story-teller to another.

Scanty Locks is anxious to know if continual cutting or trimming of the hair will make it more abundant ————Frequent cutting of the hairs cannot increase their number, although it will increase their thickness.

C. J. H.—The "Stayabed" Club, of Chicago, is not a club of lazy people, but an organisation composed of the bedridden. The qualifications for membership are confirmed invalidism, and the ability to communicate with the other members by letter. The idea of this pathetic organisation occurred to a lady who had been bedridden for fifteen years.

P. P.—You are probably thinking of the law which obtains in Italy, where, if a circus does not perform every act promised in the printed programme, or, if it misleads the public by means of pictures, it is liable to a fine of £100 for each offence.

Hair.—Wire hairpins were first made in England in 1545. Prior to that time, the ladies used fine wooden skewers to "keep their hair on."

R. G.—The case I heard of the other day seems to me to be a still harder one than that to which you refer. In China, recently, a man was executed for murdering his father, and along with him his schoolmaster for not having taught him better.

Modiste.—The idea is not new. One or two of the great fashion firms in Paris have had figures modelled in wax in order to show off their costumes to advantage. Madame Patti is one whose presentment in wax may be seen clad in the very robes which that illustrious lady has ordered, and will wear. Sarah Bernhardt is another.

I. S. wants to know how many separate railway companies there are in the United States.————There are no fewer than 1,785 such companies in that part of the world.

S. K.—According to a telephone authority, the easiest language for telephoning is Chinese. It is principally monosyllables, and is made up of simple rising and falling inflections. German, it seems, is a good language for telephoning; but French is bad, and English worse, being too sibilant.

L. O. H.—Take an apple and make a stitch in the side just under the skin, drawing the thread carefully through; then place the point of the needle into the hole from which it has just come and take another stitch, continuing this until the circle is completed, only make a point of bringing the thread in the last instance through the hole made by the first insertion of the needle. Cross the ends of the thread, and pull gently, and the apple will come in half, although the skin will be whole.

W. T. F.—About 137,000,000 blank cartridges are used every year in the German Army.

Ink Spot.—Yes; some ancient inkstands have been found in tombs at Thebes, in Upper Egypt. One, which resembles a wooden palette, and is said to date back to about 1500 B.C., has two compartments; the upper has two holes, for red and black ink respectively, and the lower contains three reed pens. Some of the dry ink remains in the holes after a lapse of 3,000 years.

E. O.—Runaway horses are unknown in Russia. No one drives there without having a thin cord with a running noose round the neck of the animal. When an animal bolts, the cord is pulled, and the horse stops as soon as it feels the pressure on the windpipe.

M. P.—In Germany, a merchant was recently fined heavily for using a quotation from the Bible at the head of an advertisement, and although such exceedingly bad taste might not meet with the same punishment in this country, it would displease the public so highly that the advertiser would do himself more harm than good. I shouldn't advise you to do it.

M. H.—Certainly it is better to keep books on low shelves rather than high ones—at any rate, those which you particularly value. The nearer one goes to the ceiling the greater the heat of the atmosphere, and heat is injurious to valuable bindings. It dries out the oil of the leather, and causes the covers to warp. Books require good air just as much as human beings.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

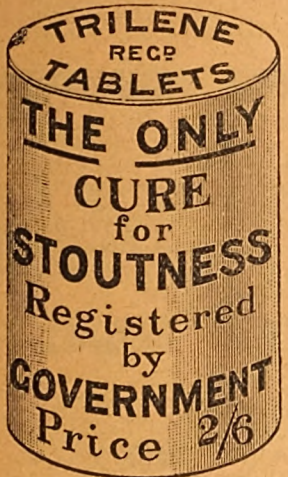
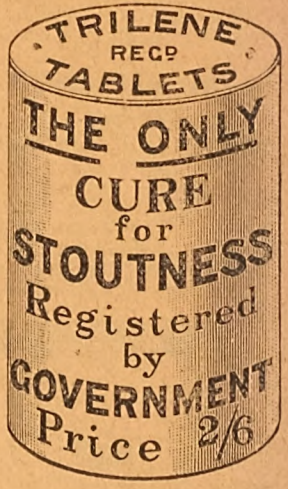
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

"Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

Miss S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

25 Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

Miss M FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2st., and am much better in health."

Mrs. F. HARPER, 61 Portland Crescent, Leeds, writes: "My doctor persuaded me to try a box, and I find they have done my breathing a lot of good and I can get about much better. My doctor did not wish his name mentioned, but they have done him good personally."

A. BROWN, of 25 Edwin Street, High Pallion, Sunderland, says: "You have no idea what a most wonderful effect the Tablets had. I am a great deal thinner, and better in health."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 2lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me. "Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 13st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity.

FATHER T. M. BYRNE, of Holy Cross Abbey, Sligo, writes: "When I began your Tablets I was 12st. 5lb.; I now scale at 10st. 11lb.—my case, too, is hereditary."

L. LUDDRINGTON, "Sunnyside," Station Road, Sidcup, says: "I have benefited greatly, and have lost a stone."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44, Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PEART, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Miss A. ATKINS, 329 Southdown Road, Liverpool, writes: "I lost nearly a stone from taking one box."

Mrs. WHITEHOUSE, of Poplar Avenue, Edgbaston, writes: "My husband is in splendid health, and has lost 15lb. in weight since taking the Tablets; I am sure I thank you on his account."

Mrs. JAMES SMITH, of Cowell Terrace, Soham, says: "Your 2s. 6d. box of Tablets reduced my weight 12lb."

Mrs. WOODS, 447 Cowbridge Road, Canton, Cardiff, says: "Tablets have a most marked effect, and I shall take every opportunity to make known the wonders of your remedy."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs, says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mr. BUTLER, Surgeon, of Hampton Manor, Evesham, says: "My patient has lost 1st. in weight whilst taking your Tablets."

"Miss HUMPHREYS, of Claremont Buildings, Shrewsbury, has lost 1st. in weight already, and thinks the Tablets deserve every success."

Mrs. O'CONNOR, 2 Kensington Square Mansions, London, writes: "I am much less stout for taking them."

Surgeon Colonel E. S. BRANDER writes from Ihansi, India, in September, 1897: "Your Tablets in my own experience form an excellent remedy for reducing weight."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Miss J. GUISE, 3 North End, Croydon, says: "I cannot speak too highly of the Tablets; I was stout all my life until a few weeks ago, when I first began your treatment. I was surprised to find they acted so admirably. I am now getting quite a slender figure, besides being better in health."

Balgowan Lodge, Methven, N.B.

Miss MCPHERSON writes: "I have taken a box, and am reduced 1st. in weight."

BICYCLE PRIZES.

Ladies' or Gent's £23 A.B. Cycles.

SEND ANSWERS EARLY.

WHAT TO DO.—Make up the best sentence you can of eleven words, the first letter of each word commencing with a letter of "COMPETITION" in proper order. Thus: "*C*yclists *O*ne *M*ay *P*ass *E*verywhere *T*hat *I*nvariably *T*rust *I*n *O*ur *N*ame." It will be seen that the initial letters of each word spell "COMPETITION." The foregoing sentence is only given as an example of what we mean, and should not be sent in.

AN ABSOLUTELY FREE COMPETITION.

We ask you to buy nothing before allowing you to participate in the Prizes. Neither after you have won a prize (if you are fortunate enough to do so) do we compel you to purchase any accessories. You pay nothing to enter, and even if you receive one of our regret notices—and we make no secret of the fact that hundreds are unsuccessful—you are only out of pocket for the cost of two penny stamps, which the Post Office gets the benefit of. Thus we can truthfully assert of this thoroughly genuine Competition that it is

ABSOLUTELY FREE TO ALL.

ALL MACHINES GUARANTEED FOR TWELVE MONTHS.

LIST OF PRIZES.

First Prize, £23 A.B. Safety, fitted with A.B. tyres.

The following ladies and gentlemen are amongst the number of persons who have recently received free bicycles, each of whom have signed a Solemn Declaration that he or she is in no way connected either directly or indirectly with this firm. We will forfeit £1,000 if this statement is incorrect. A few Free Cycle Winners: Mr. Geo. A. Haynes, 9 Windsor Street, Barrow-in-Furness; Miss Mary Page-Henderson, 8 Lexham Gardens, Kensington, W.; Mr. A. Merrilees, Harvay, Orkney; Mr. Arthur J. Woolnough, 29 Thomson Street, Govan, Glasgow; Mrs. Maria Fraser, Haglefort, Shinrone, Ireland; Mr. Robert Hughes, Llanidan, Anglesey, North Wales; Mr. L. Horne, 101 London Road, Oldham; Mrs. Flora H. Bungay, 170 Railton Road, Herne Hill, S.E.; etc., etc., etc.

Second Class (9 prizes) £23 Cycle for £9
Third Class (12 prizes) £23 Cycle for £10
Fourth Class (15 prizes) £23 Cycle for £11
Fifth Class (18 prizes) £23 Cycle for £12
Sixth Class (20 prizes) £23 Cycle for £13
Consolation (25 prizes) £23 Cycle for £14

TAKE PARTICULAR NOTICE.—COMPETITION IS NOW OPEN and closes September 19th, 1898, but do not delay sending in at once. Results will be declared as soon as possible, although it may be a fortnight afterwards before all replies are posted.

Winners of prizes must clear them within a week or ten days, otherwise machines unclaimed will be passed on to the next in rotation. Prizes may be considerably increased in all or any one class. Unless stamp is enclosed for postage of Catalogue and Result of Competition, the Company will not guarantee to inform competitors of their success. Prize-winners need not purchase any accessories with their machines, unless they so desire. As the majority of the competitors may not be able to call and inspect the machines, we guarantee to refund the full amount paid for a Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, or for a Consolation Prize if the owner is not perfectly satisfied with it on arrival. We cannot give any money or other prizes in lieu of cycles, and consequently cannot enter into any discussion relating thereto. One solution only allowed to each competitor. Disregard of this regulation renders any prize liable to forfeiture.

We offer this Reward to any lady or gentleman able to prove that we have ever in the whole course of our existence sold our cheapest machines under £15 cash either to any ordinary customer, agent, dealer or shipper. We do not allow a shilling extra discount beyond the 34 per cent. off the catalogue price to anyone, and even if we had an order for one hundred of our lowest priced machines we should refuse to supply them unless we were paid £1,500.

SHORT STORIES

No. 506. ONE PENNY.

A RIVAL'S TRIBUTE.

SEVEN or eight men, mostly members of the Venetian aristocracy, were smoking their scented cigarettes round the beautifully appointed supper table of Signorina Marina, the celebrated prima donna, who, both by her talents and beauty, had for some time reigned supreme over the susceptible hearts of her countrymen.

In the centre of the table was a magnificent wreath of the costliest flowers, which were just beginning to droop in the heated atmosphere, while countless other similar offerings, more or less withered, lay about the room.

"That has kept well," said Marina, as she removed the cigarette from her red lips and pointed with her jewelled fingers to the fragrant circle which lay beneath the rose-coloured shades of the antique silver candelabra.

"Affection's offering, I suppose?" answered the Count de Rossi, who was sitting beside her, "the humble tribute of homage from some adorer, chained by the spell of your beauty."

"It came from the Duke, after Otello last night," she replied, looking mischievously at him.

"And the others?" asked the Count, whose brows had contracted at the mention of the Duke's name.

"Oh, some of them are weeks old, those hanging over my writing-table I had three days ago, after Il Trovatore. They were lovely."

"But they are faded already. True emblems of the evanescent enthusiasm which offered them," said a langu id poet, whose pessimism was his pride, and who was writing an epic round Marina.

"The enthusiasm of Venice for her Marina will never fade," said the Count warmly, turning an adoring gaze on the dazzling figure beside him.

Marina was a creature of ever changing moods, and the poet's words came with a sense of evil foreboding. They gave expression to a terrible thought that had already risen in her mind, and in the midst of the applause which greeted her admirer's speech her face remained sad, and there was a mournful cadence in her voice as she answered:

"The poet is right. Human favour is but as a bubble and vanishes in the moment of its pride. In every outburst of applause which rejoices the artiste's heart, there lies an undertone of fear lest it should be the last. A month ago I reigned supreme; I was the idol of Venice. Now another star has appeared above the horizon, and the fickle hearts of my countrymen are beginning to worship at the shrine of my rival."

"Marina can have no rival!" exclaimed two or three at once.

"You cannot deceive me, my friends. A woman knows intuitively when the hearts of her lovers grow cold, and since Carlotta has been singing there has not been that fierce pulse of enthusiasm beating in the applause they have offered to me. They do it as a matter of course; it is cold; their hearts are not in it. I see it, I feel it; but I shall not suffer defeat. Venice will be the loser," she concluded with a proud smile.

"Carlotta was splendidly received last night," said Count Sposi, who owed Marina a grudge for having refused to share his coronet and impoverished fortunes. "She certainly sings divinely, and as to her youth and beauty there cannot be two opinions."

"I wonder you are not listening to her now!" said his hostess sharply. "Marina is not yet so destitute of friends but that she could well spare the Count Sposi. You may think, perhaps, to humiliate me, the deposed queen of song, by the praises of my successor! But, beware!" she added, and her face assumed an expression worthy of Lucrezia Borgia, "Marina is not easily slighted! At seventeen my dagger pierced the heart of my rival in love. To-day I am twenty-four, and my hand shall not spare my rival in fame."

"But why speak of yourself by so absurd a title as 'a deposed queen'?" asked de Rossi lightly. "The most Carlotta can ever hope to do is to share your throne, if you permit it."

"A throne, like a heart, can never be shared, my dear Count."

"You are cruel to talk like this to your faithful friends who are gathered round you, oblivious of the fact that Carlotta is undergoing the test which will make or mar her career."

"I am not ungrateful to you my friends," she said with one of her sunny smiles, "but something tells me that you will all go to the rising star, your voices will swell the chorus of adulation before many days have passed."

They protested with renewed ardour that none could ever take her place, they lavished eulogies and compliments upon her with unsparing hand, till, by degrees, the spoilt child of fortune was lured back to her most vivacious mood.

"There is one at least you may ever rely upon, one who will never forsake you, one who will be your slave till death," murmured de Rossi.

"You mean the Duke? He would have been here to-night only a matter of state importance kept him."

"No, I mean myself," said the other reproachfully, with a jealous pain gnawing at his heart.

She laughed merrily, and plucking a flower from the Duke's wreath pressed her lips to it and gave it to him as a peace offering.

For the next half-hour Marina excelled herself in the radiance of her smiles, the brilliance of her wit, and the witchery of her voice, till the possibility of her ever being dethroned seemed driven from all minds.

Towards midnight the door opened to admit an Austrian Count, who was generally admitted to be the best news agent in society.

"You are late, Herr Graf. You must do penance for your non-appearance, and confess what has kept you. Kneel down there, and make atonement!" said Marina with pretty imperiousness, pointing to a stool at her feet.

The Austrian let his ponderous form down with well-feigned contrition, and proceeded to relate all sorts of adventures:

"At last I turned in to hear Carlotta in the great scene of La Nozze di Figaro. I found the people going wild over her. They were behaving like lunatics, and some young fools near me were raving about her beauty, her angelic voice, and all that sort of thing. At the end of the act they called her seven times before the curtain! I can't see what they admire in her."

"They never did as much for me," thought Marina bitterly.

"I got so tired of the noise," went on the Austrian, "that I went behind, thinking to get a closer view of the syren; but her room was besieged, and after waiting about half-an-hour I saw the Duke of Acquavita escorting her and her mother to his own carriage. They say he is very much struck——"

"Ah! Diavolo!" hissed Marina through her teeth, and fell back in a deadly swoon on her silken cushions.

* * * * *

Venice was divided into two factions, and public feeling ran high between the two rivals in the city. Count Sposi had made it his business to warn Carlotta's friends that her life was in danger from the malice of her sister-singer, and the partizans of the former unwisely boasted of their favourite's conquest of the Duke of Acquavita, a man of ancient name and princely fortune, both of which, it was said, he had already laid at the feet of the young artiste.

Marina behaved with dignified reserve, and at last surprised both her friends and her enemies by requesting that a meeting should be arranged between herself and Carlotta.

There was a great contrast between the two. Marina was a woman in the full flush of her matured charms, conscious of her power, with an indomitable will, and the experience of a stormy youth behind her. Carlotta was young, fresh, gentle of heart though ardent in temperament, as yet unsullied by the garish life on the other side of the footlights.

Her sweetness and purity seemed to disarm her rival, and Marina went towards her with outstretched hands, saying:

"Forgive me, and those of my foolish friends who have tried to pain you! We must be friends, sisters in our beloved art, sharing its pleasures and cares. The world of song is wide, and holds fields of triumph for both of us. Let no petty jealousy mar the glory of our career!"

Carlotta's heart went out warmly to this generous overture, and welcomed her new friend with all the spontaneity of her nature.

"She is charming. I must be at her benefit next week," said Marina, as she drove home with the Count de Rossi. "I must add my tribute to those of her admirers, and it shall not be one of mere fading leaves."

The night of Carlotta's benefit arrived, and amid all the brilliant, enraptured audience, none seemed more carried away by the enthralling charm of the young artiste than Marina.

At the close of the opera, the fair young girl, in the white robes of the penitent Marguerite, came forward again and again to receive the storm of acclamation that greeted her. As the curtain rose for the fifth time Marina rose in her box and hurled her "unfading tribute" with unerring aim.

It was a bronze wreath picked out with gold, and it fell, not at the feet, but on the temples of the smiling Marguerite, who sank lifeless on the boards where she had scored her triumphs, felled by the hand of her treacherous rival, cut off in the zenith of her fame by the imperishable gift of an implacable foe.

MARY FERMOR.

The Temptation of Gold.

TOM JENKINS ran his hand through the gold that lay heaped on the floor of the hut.

"It seems to me, Billy," he said slowly, "that hopin' to find it is better than findin' it."

Dull gleams of light from a smoky lantern fell athwart the face of the old miner, rugged, homely, deeply furrowed by time and hardships, and offering a marked contrast indeed to the handsome, patrician features of Billy Bailey, his junior partner.

"Findin', Billy, means leavin' here. It's an end to the wants and privations I've known for nigh on twenty years. But, somehow, I've come to like these still old mountains, and the singing of the pines, and the river. They've growed like friends, and I'm never lonely among 'em. Listen! you can hear 'em now. Perhaps it's the last time they'll ever sing for me."

"We're going back to civ'lisation," continued Tom, not heeding the other's lack of sympathy with his reminiscent mood, "and that means separation. I know you like me, Billy. A feller couldn't want a better partner than you've been fer the two years I've knowed you. But with your eddication, and yer young blood, and yer ambitions, you ain't my sort in civ'lisation. We can't be the same there. I couldn't expect it. But I think a lot of you, Billy. I——"

"Oh, come, Tom," broke in his companion impatiently, "you're in the dumps to-night. Take a drink and brace up. Should think you'd look on the bright side of things now. We've worked and starved in these wilds for gold, until at last we've got it. Think of the ten thousand pleasures that this gold can buy for us. There's no life in these solitudes. It's there in the crowded streets, and it can all be ours when we've got the god of gold on our side."

Billy laughed gloatingly in anticipation. Thence once more he fixed his eyes with a glittering intensity on the yellow heap which meant for him all that life can mean to a selfish, loveless nature.

"But it ain't for me," persisted Tom. "I'm past them things. If it wasn't for the hope of finding my old mother in England and makin' her comfortable, I'd stay. I don't care for the gold after all. I've found it, and my hungerin' for it's satisfied."

Billy made no answer. He had long since become resigned to the diversity of their tastes, and to-night he was in no mood for argument. He got out some materials, and began to repair a rent in his coat. Tom rose presently, and dropped the nuggets into a sack. Then he arranged his blankets for the night.

"Put it away safely, Billy," he said jocularly; "we're already on the edge of civilisation, and must learn to be pertickler."

"I'll look after it, never fear," said the other shortly; "good night."

Billy finished his task, but his mind was still busy with the thoughts of the future. He rose and stepped out into the night. At his feet the turbulent river rushed blackly along, its foam crests gleaming like dull silver in the clear starlight. Behind him towered in silent mystery the rugged, wooded mountains. The air was heavy with the scent of the pines.

But Billy saw none of the beauty of the night. The mountains awakened memories of hardships and hopelessness; the river was only a highway to civilisation.

He lit his pipe, and began to pace up and down the shelving shore.

There was none of the stuff of which heroes are made in Billy Bailey's composition. Had the fates seen fit to continue their kindly beginning, he would probably have developed into one of the horde of whited sepulchres—those who observe the conventions to the letter, indulge every desire with a studied care that wins the approval of men, and, when dead, are respectfully buried and speedily forgotten. On the contrary, fate had preferred giving Billy a chance to prove his mettle. His college career cut short by the melting away of his father's fortune, he awoke one morning to find himself face to face with the world, his wits his only capital.

He remembered to-night his struggle to maintain his social position; the slights heaped upon him by erstwhile boon companions; the gradual sinking away of hope, until, with starvation staring him in the face, he had shipped in a vessel bound for distant lands.

But now! Yet there was not so much, after all. Would it give him all the pleasures he hoped for?

If he only had Tom's share, too! The thought startled him, and he looked furtively about, as though already under surveillance.

Well, why not? What was Tom to him now? The old man cared nothing for gold—he had said as much. Why not double his fortune by a single coup? The skiff was already for the morrow's journey down the river. By daylight he could put many miles between himself and Tom before the latter could make the trip across the almost impassable mountain trail.

He weakened for a moment as he thought of Tom's almost motherly solicitude—of how throughout their wanderings the big-hearted miner had borne the brunt of the struggle. Even when the treasure was discovered, the old man's first words were: "I'm glad for your sake, Billy."

Then he asked himself if he, too, was growing sentimental, and to-night, of all nights, on the very eve of battle.

He walked back to the hut. Tom was fast asleep. The flickering light of the lantern fell on the corner where he lay, his powerful form half swathed in the tattered blankets, his brawny arms thrown above his head. The face, from which sleep seemed to have smoothed away the deep furrows, reflected the rugged honesty of his heart. But the touching picture meant nothing to Billy, who watched the sleeper for an instant and then proceeded to put his cowardly scheme into execution.

It was but the work of a few minutes to gather together the things necessary for the short journey down the river and to secure the treasure for safe transportation. There was a look of cunning triumph on his face as he completed his preparations. He was thinking of the surprise awaiting Tom, who had been "fool enough to believe in human friendship."

He made a cautious step toward the door of the hut, when a slight noise caused him to glance back over his shoulder. The next instant the bag of gold crashed to the floor, while Billy sank on his knees, as though felled by a blow. Tom was sitting bolt upright in bed, his revolver levelled at Billy's heart.

The two gazed at each other a moment in utter silence. Billy's eyes scanned the old man's face and read there reproach and pity, rather than a thirst for swift revenge. This somewhat re-assured him, and he rose to his feet.

"Well," he said bluntly, "what do you intend to do?"

"So," said Tom, with a long breath, "I was mistook in you, after all. To think that I give you my friendship and you wa'n't worth it! What am I going to do? What do men usu'lly do when a partner turns thief?"

"You wouldn't shoot me, Tom?"

"Why not? Men's been killed for less than that, and the world was well red of 'em."

Then it did mean death.

As Billy realised this, his face turned ashen pale, while a palsying terror struck through him, rending his mask of bravado and revealing him as the pitiable dastard he was. He cowered before the old man, pleading hysterically.

"Oh, spare me, spare me, Tom. You said you cared nothing for gold, while I—I was mad with love of it! It is my idol—my everything. But take it, take it all—only give me my life—Tom—I—I—can't—die!"

"Get up,' commanded the other coldly; "don't make me despise you worse than I do. What would you do if you was in my place? Shoot, wouldn't you? You'd kill me now, if you had the chance."

"But think, Tom, what life means to me; I'm young and——"

"Think what friendship meant to me, Billy. I'm old."

In the momentary silence that followed, the pines and the river could be heard singing their old, old song, heedless of the strife of mortals for a scrap of the treasure they guarded. Tom heard the song, and his bitterness seemed to go out with the weird melody. The hand that held the weapon dropped listlessly to his side.

"I'll spare yer life," he said hoarsely; "you can go."

Billy stood a moment as though he had not heard.

"You're free. Go!" said Tom.

The boy glanced from the old man to the bag of gold, and then turned slowly towards the doorway.

"You better take yer gold now," said Tom quietly, "as I s'pose you won't be coming back."

"Do you mean it?" gasped Billy.

"Certainly; half's yourn, ain't it? There's only one thief in this camp, and it ain't me."

Tom proceeded to open the bag, and roughly divided the contents.

"You can take the boat; that goes with your half. As for me," he added, in a voice that wavered in spite of himself, "I'll do what I'd 'a' done if you'd 'a' robbed me. I'll stay a little longer with the mountains an' the river. They're uncertain sometimes, and sometimes they're dangerous, but on the whole they're better than men."

Billy vaguely appreciated the nature of the man with whom he was dealing, yet he felt that such nobleness required some acknowledgment. He sprang forward and tried to grasp the old man's hand.

"No, no—not that!" cried Tom fiercely. "Don't touch me. That gold is yourn. Take it and go. But go quickly, Billy — for Heaven knows — I'm only human."

A. G. GALE.

Untold Tales of the Indian Mutiny.

By H. HUNTER.

VI.—NÁNÁ SAHIB'S RUBY.

He was undoubtedly a grand old man, Ahmad Dutt, ex-trooper in the 2nd Native Cavalry. Fierce-eyed, clean-limbed, and with a length of arm which in his fighting days had often carried death to the heart of his enemy, he was now peacefully smoking his huka as a "pension-wallah" under the shade of his own fig-tree, waiting patiently till Allah should summon him to join the ranks of the Faithful in the Paradise of the Prophet.

On his chin he wore a flowing beard of snowy whiteness, on his head an enormous turban of orange silk.

Yes, I could well believe that Ahmad Dutt, once a trumpeter in the famous 2nd Cavalry, which had mutinied at Cawnpore, and offered their services to Dundue Pant, the Nána Sahib, who had many a story of the "terrible year" locked away in the secret chambers of his retentive brain. For the old sowar had a wonderful memory, and a marvellous skill in draping his figures and arranging his scenes.

He seemed to have the faculty of seizing by natural intuition upon the true dramatic moment for the presentation of his pictures and the exhibition of his portraits.

Ahmad was one of the few men of the cavalry corps who had remained faithful to the Company's salt. But it was now only at rare intervals that the ex-trooper could be induced to talk.

"Can I tell the Huzoor the story of the Flaming Eye, of the Burning Heart, of the Great Ruby of Sulieman, which Bajee Rao had from the Nabob of Oudh and bestowed upon Dúndu Pant, when he made him his son, and gave him Bithoor for his portion and inheritance? Can I tell his honour the story of the Nána's Sirpésh, the amulet which he wore in his turban to protect him from the evil eye, and the pestilence, and the power of his enemies? Yea, truly I can," said the ancient warrior with a low salaam, "if the Huzoor will condescend to listen.

"But the tale is long, O master. It hath as many chapters and divisions as the book of the Prophet—the blessed Koran itself. It belongeth to the past as well as to the present, and the end thereof knoweth no man; for the Ruby, which of a truth possesses mystic and talismanic virtues, hath not been seen by mortal eye, save once, since the night when the signal light of the Nána was extinguished in the waters of the Ganges at Fathgarh.

"But sure, Huzoor, I am telling the tale as one of the foolish might tell it, and not like Ahmad Dutt, the son of Hassan Ali, in whose family it hath been told from generation to generation, even from the days of the Great Mogul, Shah Jehan, before ever the Peacock Throne, of which Sulieman's Ruby was the most precious ornament, had been carried from Agra to Delhi, before the Persian had crossed the Great River, or the Sahibs come over the Black Water.

"From his father Hassan Ali it was that thy servant heard the tale of the famous Ruby which Sulieman wore on his finger and the Nána wore in his turban.

"Hassan was Duffadar in a Mahratti troop in the time of Bajee Rao, and would tell the tale round the camp fire on the plains or in the courtyard of the serai, while the horses were resting and the food was being cooked. And when the dawn began to glimmer in the east, lo! the story would be still unfinished, for there was much to tell.

"I know not," muttered the old man solemnly, after a pause during which he puffed the smoke from the huka slowly through his nostrils, "whether tis fitting to speak of the old ways in the new days. But the Huzoor wants to hear what perhaps the old Sowar alone can tell him? Be it so, my son. I, Ahmad, will tell of my father's story so much as concerns the Huzoor to know, and no more. For the sahibs are not as we, who will listen to a story for the sake of the story till the stars begin to fade and the light of the coming day is seen in the sky.

"The white faces from the west are ever thinking how it will end, no sooner than the tale is begun. They would have us tell our stories as they ride their races; and are less anxious about how a story runs than how it finishes.

"Well, Allah's above all; and for the rest, it will be my own mouth that speaketh, Huzoor. And by the beard of the Prophet, the son of Hassan Duffadar will tell his honour nothing but truth—plain truth, which is what the fewest in this world can recognise when they see it; for, in sooth, 'tis much of a stranger amongst the children of men.

"Know, then, that in the days when Agra was still the capital of Shah Jehan, there came to that city a certain blind fakir, who had travelled to India with a caravan from Bagdad. His long wrap was of green, which showed that he had made the Holy Pilgrimage and was a worthy man.

"He asked to see the King's Chamberlain, and on being led into the presence of that officer requested to be taken before the Emperor. To him he made known that his youth and strength had been spent in searching for the Great Ruby which the Queen of the East had given to King Sulieman, and the King had caused to be engraved with certain secret talismanic characters which gave the possessor of the stone power over the servants of Eblis, over the messengers of evil, over the malignant spirits who are the enemies of man, and over the lower angels who minister to his comfort.

Digitized by Google

"He re-counted all the perils and privations he had passed through, the ordeals he had undergone, the vows he had taken, the oaths he had sworn.

"'True, O King!' said he. 'I am now old and blind. But the morning of my days, the flower of my years, was surely well given to obtain that, the like of which for beauty and power, for value and excellence is not to be found elsewhere on this earth, save in one small corner of my poor girdle.

"'Surely there is none that can say that thy servant hath wrought unwisely or spent his strength for naught; for, though his days be consumed and his flesh faileth, yet hath he obtained the desire of his heart.

"'One generation followeth another, but the King liveth for ever; and in him shall the people put their trust.

"'The Ruby, O Father of the Faithful! is a King's amulet.

"'Allah never made but one such.

"'Sulieman never put the master-word of the wisdom which he had from Heaven upon any other.

"'There is none, O King! that is like unto it. Though ye search the uttermost parts of the earth, ye shall not find it.

"'The light of ten thousand years is flashed forth from every line. The fire which from the beginning of Time has burnt at the heart of all things is reflected from every face. Was it not through gazing too long and ardently at the splendour of its glory, which, like another sun, illuminated the darkness of the dread chamber, where, at last, I uncovered it that the light of my own eyes was put out. But the brightness of its beams remains to console me, for I was blinded by excess of light.

"'Now, of a truth, O King! many and marvellous are the prophecies which have been written; and amongst them, is that which a holy man out of the north west, yea, from the land of the Five Rivers, declared no less than five hundred years ago.

"'"The Nazarene"' said he, '"will come to this land of Hind; by force and fraud they will possess themselves of principalities and powers. And they will seek to drive out the old faith and establish a new. But they shall not succeed; nay, though they hold the land in irons and occupy it for one hundred years, they shall be driven out in the end, even by the edge of the sword. And ye shall smite them, O men of Hind, they and their little ones, with a great slaughter. Nevertheless, for one hundred years the shall rule in the land."'

"That, Huzoor, was the old prophecy," said Ahmad, probably thinking some explanation necessary, "which the Panjabee fakir delivered, seven hundred years before the lotus was seen in the cantonments, or the chupatties appeared in the villages; and it was often repeated by our Moulvies amongst the people.

"'Behold now,' said the finder of the Ruby; 'my time draweth nigh, and there is but one thing left for me to do before Al Sijil closes my account and rolls up the scroll.

"'There is no God but God, who hath brought me from a far country, even from El Kuds which is beyond Baghdad; and into thy hands, O King! I deliver the Great Ruby of Sulieman—thy wise men will tell thee the meaning of the inscription thereon—enjoining on thee to cherish and preserve it against the time when the Nazarene shall be lord in the land.

"It will not be in thy day, or in the day of the Prince, thy son; but it will surely come to pass, for it is written. Then shall they that follow the Ruby talisman have no fear, for their enemy, though he spend blood and treasure, shall not be able to overthrow them.

"But thou must swear, O King, to build in thy chief city a mosque to the praise and glory of Allah, and the everlasting honour of his prophet. So much thy servant asks of thee in return for the Ruby, which has cost a lifetime to win, but will be a priceless possession to him who is faithful in the days which are to come.'

"So the Ruby passed to Shah Jehan, and the famous mosque at Delhi rose to witness to the King's faith in the fakir's story.

"The stone—these eyes have seen it, Huzoor—was the largest and chief jewel in the Peacock Throne, which Abdool the Persian, of accursed memory, carried off with him into Iran. But it would weary thy ears to listen were I to tell the tales concerning the wonderful red crystal which Hassan, my father, had upon his tongue.

"Well, by the will of Allah, without whom nothing can happen that does happen, the Great Ruby of Sulieman had got into the hands of Bajee Roa, the last of the old Mahratti chiefs, about the time that Wajid Ali, who was the last of the Kings of Oudh, got into trouble with the sahibs at Lucknow.

"Bajee had done Ali Shah a service, that some day I will tell the Huzoor if he pleases, for 'tis a good story though not for all ears to hear; and for payment the Mahratti demanded the Ruby, which was now looked upon with jealousy by every ruler, and whose virtues were known in every bazaar.

"The Rajah on whose person glittered the Talisman of Sulieman, when the hour of the fakir should arrive, was certain to end Emperor of India. That was the belief of the bazaar.

"Bajee did not get the Ruby out of Wajid without—but that also must stay for another telling. If once we get amongst the Begums, the Queen and Princesses, we shall never reach the Náná, on whom Bajee Rao bestowed the Ruby when he adopted Dúndú Pant as his son.

"Said I not the tale was long? So, it took the Mahratti three years to obtain the jewel from the King. And was there no plotting in the women's quarters? Yea, there was more than plotting," and Ahmad made a very significant gesture which left no doubt that there was murder.

"Well, at last the Náná was the owner of the Ruby, and a mighty fine fellow he thought himself. True, it made a magnificent sir-pésh for his turban, in which it blazed like a flaming eye, flashing its burning rays on all it touched. It shone with a brilliancy that dazzled and a potency that confused; while the Náná smiled to see men blinking and winking under its glitter and glare. It made him vain and puffed up his heart with pride—and, of a truth, it was a very king of gems, that Ruby.

"There was a fire in it that was in no other stone that had ever been seen in Hind. There was a power in it that no other ruby had ever been found to possess. I can believe the old fakir who said that the brightness of its beauty had deprived him of his sight.

"The Náná wore the stone upon all great occasions. He was fond of trying its effect upon the sahibs. They would praise its purity, its size, its colour, and most of all the living fire at its heart which the longer one looked the fiercer it blazed, till one could have sworn it was burning into one's vitals. Oh! it was no common ruby.

"When the 'great agony' began, you may be sure that the Ruby was not forgotten, either by us behind the intrenchments on the Allahabad Road, or by that crafty son of perdition, Tantia Topi, the Náná's butcher. Dundu Pant saw his father's son already sitting as Great Mogul in the Palace at Delhi, when, pointing to the flaming jewel in his turban, he swore by his head to the men who had marched to Kulianpore that victory would ever follow where the Ruby shone, and persuaded the sowars to return to Cawnpore instead of rushing on to Delhi as they were minded to.

"But when the sahibs saw the Ruby gleaming in the front they gave praise to Allah for sending them an easy prey, and the Náná soon had a score of shots whistling about his ears. They didn't harm him, however and the men cried: 'Ajaib!' a miracle! But that was the first and last time the Rajah of Bithoor exposed himself in the field.

"The Ruby might have all the virtues which the old fakir claimed for it, but, I suppose the Náná thought it was hardly playing fair to invite attention that was not convenient.

"When we had a dozen men die from sunstroke, it was the Náná's Ruby which got the credit of it.

"It was all over the place, that the Ruby was killing off the Feringhees like sheep, by burning them up in its fiery rays.

"Well you may laugh, Huzoor, but I, Ahmad Dutt, believe the Ruby was a true wonder stone; but the Náná was no better to begin with than a budmash and didn't understand how to work the charm or it wouldn't have fared so ill with him. And then even the sahibs must allow that 'twas the Ruby which saved Dúndú Pant from the fate of the Moulvie of Fizabad.

"The Huzoor does not think so? Well, that is because he is not of the race.

"No, the Ruby did not bring the Náná the luck he expected; but the fault, Huzoor, was in the man and not in the stone. There were no wise men at Bithoor to interpret the writing—the dark saying of Sulieman.

"Azimullah was a cunning plotter, who made love to the mem-sahibs that he might the more easily draw them into his net; but wisdom was a stranger to his lips.

"Bábá Bhat and Tantia Topi were men of blood, who hated every white face and urged the Náná forward whenever his courage cooled.

"'Tread them down, tread them down!' they cried continually in his ears

"'A people terrible from the beginning. Let them not take root in the land. As with the husband so with the wife, as with the mother so with the child. Dost thou wear the Ruby for naught, O Dúndú, son of Baee? Surely thou puttest thy father to shame before these white scum.'

"But though the Ruby kept away the Evil Eye and was a charm against Black Magic, yet did fortune forsake the arms of the Náná.

"Then they who had followed him believing in the Ruby of Sulieman, began to reproach and revile him, and clamour for their pay.

"'By the soul of my father,' said one, 'I am a fool to follow a man whom Allah despiseth—a man too mean for Allah to notice, a man left to his own devices and whose expectation hath perished.

"'Full surely this Rajah of Bithoor is not he whom Heaven intended should wear the Ruby; and of a truth 'tis little we see of him or of it now,' and they began to desert him, for the sahibs were only a day's march from Cawnpore, and the Náná had fled to his palace at Bithoor after giving orders for the killing of the English ladies who were shut up in the city. But the Sepahis, Huzoor, said they were soldiers and not slaughtermen, and refused the work; so Tantia sent for butchers from the bazaar, and there came three black-browed sons of Eblis. . . . .

"Yea, truly, as thou sayest, it was a devil's deed, and of a surety the Devil hath taken all concerned in it—though I speak not for the Náná, since he had the Ruby. . . . .

"Everywhere, up and down through every chamber, in and out the corridors, along the terraces and below the verandahs of the Zenana at Bithoor, the sahibs searched for the Rajah. Many things they found in the Palace, things brought from over the Black Water, for the Náná had been in the country of the sahibs. Race-horses and dancing girls were on the walls, and English furniture in many of the rooms. But the man himself they found not, neither him nor his wives, nor the famous Ruby, of which even the sahibs had heard tell.

"He had gone up the Ganges to Futtehgarh; and because of the Ruby which he wore no man laid hands on him, though the sahibs offered a big price for his head.

"His people said afterwards that he had committed his body to the holy River; and, when the signal light was extinguished in the middle of the stream, they all lifted up their voices and wept. But the sahibs who searched long for him, and raised his price to a lakh of rupees, (£10,000) say, that he only crossed the river, coming out again on the Oudh side.

"Yet was he never seen more by the Englishmen, though they sought for him diligently; since they knew he was alive and had the Ruby with him.

"It was the Ruby, Huzoor, to which he owed his life. The Moulvie was an honest soldier who fought fairly and did no murder; and, for him the sahibs offered only half a lakh, yet it was enough. But even a lakh failed to bring in the Náná, because of the Ruby of King Sulieman which he wore. The stone protected the bearer though he was without the wisdom to work the charm."

* * * * *

Only once, it seems, has the Ruby been seen again; since, as the Náná's sirpesh, it blazed in his turban on the banks of the Ganges at Futhgurh.

One evening in January, 1870, a stranger muffled in a Cachmeri veil entered the shop of Mohamed Ali, jeweller in the Thumbi Bazaar at Delhi. He asked him to look at a very fine ruby which had formerly belonged to the Shah of Persia and had been purchased by the stranger at Shiraz as an investment.

Mohamed opened the paper containing the jewel, and instantly recognised the famous Ruby of Sulieman.

The stranger, possibly reading something in the other's eye which determined him, tore the veil from his face and disclosed the features of Náná Sahib, but with an expression of such malignant hate that the jeweller, paralysed with terror, was unable to move a finger.

When he recovered his faculties, the Náná and the Ruby had both disappeared; and Mohamed, frightened out of his five wits by the adventure, never spoke of it till months afterwards.

The end of the Náná is wrapped in mystery; and that of the story of the Náná's Ruby, as my friend Ahmad Dutt put it, "knoweth no man," for the Great Ruby of Sulieman, better known to us as Náná Sahib's Ruby, hath not been seen by mortal eye since Dundú Pant was recognised in the Delhi Bazaar.

Next Week we shall begin a series of Stories by LEVIN CARACAC, under the general heading, "Homespun Yarns."

A BACHELOR'S MISTAKE.

MR. JOHN CLARK, the hero of this sketch, had lived fifty years alone, when he might have been blessed with "God's best gift to man—woman."

Still, as Clark was decidedly a wealthy man, his friend, Arthur Gould, thought he would make an excellent husband for his sister, who was slightly on the shady side of thirty. So one evening, finding Clark in his solitary apartments, looking downcast and miserable, Gould said:

"Clark, I know what ails you."

"What makes you think anything ails me?" gruffly inquired Clark.

"Because you are not lively and happy. You are lonely and want society. No one can enjoy life without companionship. In short, you want a wife."

"I've got along all these years without one, and I can finish the same way."

"Because you have been a fool all these years is no reason why you should continue one."

"True!" said Clark. "Had I taken a wife twenty years ago I should have been happier to-day. But who would marry an old fellow like me now?"

"Many a nice girl would jump at the chance."

"I don't want an old maid," said this particular old bachelor. "Some pretty, bright girl might tempt me. But, then, this courting business I know nothing about, you see, and taking it on the whole I might pay too dearly in advance."

"Well," said Gould impatiently, "on the whole, if the truth was known, I think you are a trifle too lazy to live."

"Why, I'm quite ready for a bargain. Show me some of these nice girls you seem to think are so plentiful."

"If you please to visit my family you will have an opportunity of meeting many ladies. I will introduce you to my sister, for one; she will introduce you to others, and——"

"Good! I'll spend to-morrow evening with you."

"We shall be glad to see you."

They parted, and Clark's thick head was full of new ideas. At six o'clock next night he stood before his looking-glass trying necktie after necktie, and carefully parting what remained of his hair. At last he was fully equipped and started.

On his arrival he found none but the family present, and being introduced to the ladies, passed a pleasant evening.

He watched every movement of the younger lady, and before leaving had concluded to seek no further for a wife, providing the charming Miss Gould could be persuaded to become Mrs. Clark. She was attractive, pleasing in conversation, and graceful in manner.

"She is the woman for me," thought the bachelor, as he said "Good night," promising to call again soon.

He went home from his second visit happier than from the first, for, in addition to his increasing admiration for the lady, he felt assured, by her evident exertions to entertain him, that his feelings were reciprocated.

One unfortunate circumstance must be explained before proceeding. Owing partly to Mr. Gould's carelessness in presenting the ladies as his wife and sister merely, and partly Clark's confusion in confronting two women at once, he had mistaken one for the other, and fallen in love with Mrs. Gould (decidedly the prettier of the two), and who, perfectly innocent of his error, strove to make matters pleasant on behalf of her sister-in-law. She noticed once or twice that he addressed her as Miss Gould, but let it pass for a slip of the tongue consequent upon Clark's confusion and bashfulness.

Time passed, and the bachelor determined to speak. One evening he found Mrs. Gould alone, and was informed that "Arthur and sister" had gone to make a call, but would soon return. Clark expressed a little sorrow at their absence; now was his time, he thought; so summoning all his courage, he commenced:

"My dear lady, forgive me for speaking my mind frankly when I assure you that the happiest hours of my life have been passed in your society."

"Why, thank you for the compliment," said Mrs. Gould. "It gives me great pleasure to welcome you here, and you will enjoy life better than in the solitary existence you have hitherto led. Arthur has a deep interest in you, and I shall always be pleased to entertain you to the best of my ability."

"Thank you," said Clark. "I feel that a single life is an unhappy one, and if not too late I propose to amend."

"Indeed! Then you think of marrying?" said Mrs. Gould, glad for the sake of her sister-in-law. "I congratulate you. May I ask who is to be the honoured lady?"

"That depends upon you. I have never met with one who inspired me with such esteem, such love, as yourself. All I have I lay at your feet. Will you be my wife?"

He paused and wiped the perspiration from his forehead. Mrs. Gould, utterly confounded, sprang to her feet, exclaiming:

"Me your wife! Why, Mr. Clark, explain yourself!"

Her husband, just entering, caught the last words.

"What is the matter?" asked he, gazing alternately from his wife to Clark.

"That matter!" replied the astonished suitor. "You know as well as I do. Your sister appears to have taken fright at something—I don't understand what."

"My sister! Why, that is my wife!"

"Your wife!" screamed Clark. "Why have you deceived me in this way?"

"No one has deceived you, my dear fellow. You must have deceived yourself. That is my wife. This is my sister," pointing to the other lady now entering the room.

Poor Clark was struck dumb. He rose, seized his hat, made a low bow, and annihilated space between the Goulds and his own "bachelor's hall," where, in a short time, he was seated before a fire made of fancy neckties, sachet bags, light gloves and other superfluous articles of an old bachelor's toilet.

As to what he thought, said, or did after that time there is no account, but Mrs. Gould was his first love, and without doubt she was his last.

Football Players Competition!

OPEN TO EVERYBODY. £10 IN PRIZES. OPEN TO EVERYBODY.

Below will be found ten sets of words, each of which indicates the name of some well-known football player.

The first, for example, is "A young goose." This signifies, of course, Gosling.

Ten names will appear each week for five weeks, making fifty names in all.

Keep all your lists by you until you are told to send them in.

To the person who succeeds in solving the greatest number we will give

A CRISP £5 NOTE.

TO THE NEXT, £2; TO THE NEXT, £2; AND TO THE NEXT, £1;

while consolation prizes will be awarded to the extent of twenty handsome volumes which competitors may select for themselves from the catalogue of books issued by this firm.

If you are weak in the names of football players, your brother, or cousin, or male friend will give you a helping hand.

The Summary will Enable You to Begin this Magnificent Serial To-day.

THE FINAL WAR

BY

LOUIS TRACY.

Author of "The Shadow Hand," "An American Emperor," "The Lost Provinces," etc.

SUMMARY.

Time 1898. Irene, daughter of Lord Eskdale, Ambassador at Paris, is engaged to Captain Edward Harington, Lord Eskdale's military attaché, and Lieutenant Rodney of H.M.S. Magnificent to Harington's sister, Ethel.

France and Germany declare war against Great Britain.

An attempt to land at Worthing is made by a combined French and German fleet of 36 ironclads, 40 troopships, and 100 smaller boats. The local volunteers hold them in check till the regulars arrive from London.

An inventor secures an audience with the Prince of Wales and demonstrates to him the utility of a new weapon, with the result that steps are immediately taken to manufacture an enormous number of them.

The Hornet, a torpedo boat, commanded by Rodney, blows up the Suez Canal. Paris is in a state of excitement owing to the repulse of the Allied fleet.

Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour's fleet gains a decisive victory over the Allies off the Rock of Gibraltar.

A representative of the New York World interviews Lord Salisbury on a matter that is not yet made public.

CHAPTER XI.

A Proclamation.

The gallant deeds of the Mediterranean Fleet found fitting counterpart in the national enthusiasm which prompted England to cheerfully embark upon an enterprise chiefly remarkable for its spirit of heroic self-sacrifice.

None knew so well as the leaders of the people the desperate nature of the struggle to which they were committed. Men and money must be lavished in the attempt to crush, once and for ever, the gigantic confederacy which had so suddenly sprung into existence.

The Council of National Safety early decided that the public must be made to realise fully the tremendous odds against which they fought, believing that this step would render clear the necessity there was for the drastic and far-reaching methods of organisation which alone might serve to assure the ultimate victory of the United Kingdom.

At a meeting, therefore, over which Lord Salisbury presided, the Prince of Wales being present as an ordinary member, the following proclamation was drawn up.

"To the People of Great Britain and Ireland.

"The declaration of war by France and Germany is an open avowal of the determination of these two countries to destroy the Empire of Britain. This wholly unjust and iniquitous conflict has been forced upon us in a manner which has already called down the vengeance of the God of Battles.

"On land and sea we have, by the mercy of Providence, been able to defeat our foes and to save our beloved country from the horrors of invasion.

"England is still as she has been for many centuries, Mistress of the Seas, and, in any ordinary European complications it would have been her duty and her solemn interest to preserve that predominance for the benefit of mankind, whilst not otherwise interfering in the strife.

"But, unfortunately, it is impossible to pursue such a peaceful and beneficent course.

"The chief statesmen and the principal newspapers of the Allied Powers have candidly declared their action to be the prelude to a war of extermination! Great Britain, they say, must be reduced to the level of Iceland, stripped of her dignity and vast possessions, and her people ruined and disintegrated. These are no idle boasts. They are backed up, as we have seen, by a terrible purpose and concentration of aim which have been stayed alone by the invincible courage of our gallant soldiers and sailors.

Lord Salisbury presided.

"In plain and sober earnest we are fighting for our lives, our liberties, our homes, for all that we hold dear on earth, for all that has raised Britain to the proud position she occupies among the nations.

"Under such conditions our duty as citizens of the British Empire is unmistakable. We must resolve to crush those who would crush us, and not desist from our task until we have effectually secured the peace of Europe upon a permanent and proper basis.

"The Council of National Safety believe that the most effective method of illustrating the magnitude of the task imposed upon England is to set forth in simple figures the war strength of the Allied Powers so far as their land forces are concerned. At sea, England has shown that she can deal with them, but the necessity for invading both France and Germany make it imperative that there should be no under-estimation of their fighting establishment.

"France, then, has an army of two millions of men, with nearly 150,000 horses, and 3,000 guns. Half a million of her troops are actually under arms; the balance will probably be called upon the moment we assume the aggressive, and by summoning her territorial reserves she can place 3,000,000 of men in the field.

"The army of Germany in the field consists of over half a million of men, which can at once be increased to 1,500,000, with 312,000 horses and 2,800 guns. The mobilisation of the reserves more than double her fighting force.

"We are therefore called upon to face six millions of trained soldiers, with 462,000 horses and 5,800 guns.

"At this moment there are under arms in Great Britain and Ireland some 500,000 men, including regular troops, volunteers, militia and army reserves, with 1,000 guns and 15,000 horses.

"It is proposed to forthwith double the number of men, guns, and horses. The guns are in store, the horses are being purchased, and we call for 500,000 young men, between the ages of eighteen and thirty, to volunteer for war service immediately.

"The Commander-in-Chief estimates that he will thus be enabled to land expeditionary forces of sufficient strength for the first advance on the shores of France and Germany within a few days.

"We also call upon the nation to enroll three millions of men in addition to the expeditionary forces already detailed, in order to reinforce the armies abroad to such an extent as may be deemed necessary, and to provide for the defence of the United Kingdom in case of further attack.

"It will be the duty of lord lieutenants of counties to act with local authorities in selecting from registers of all men capable of bearing arms, first, the local levies for the immediate strengthening of troops under orders, and, in the second place, the further mobilisation of the Auxiliary Army of three millions.

"Sir Redvers Buller is charged with the conduct of this further mobilisation, and each line regiment in the service will provide a complete company of selected non-commissioned officers and men who will supply the nucleus for the officers and non-commissioned officers of the Auxiliary Army.

"All local authorities should be guided by the following supreme considerations in discharging the onerous task imposed upon them:

"1st. The able-bodied unemployed should be drafted into the ranks of the army forthwith.

"2nd. Single men should next be selected in preference to married men.

"3rd. Care should be taken to interfere as little as possible with manufactures which by their nature contribute to the food supply and clothing of the nation.

4th. Selected officers and men of the police force should be utilised to extend the supply of regular troops drafted for drill purposes into the Auxiliary Army.

"5th. Special local measures must be taken for the adequate preservation of law and order.

"Inland Revenue and Customs officers will abandon their ordinary duties and devote themselves wholly to the commissariat and transport requirements of the troops, and for this purpose will act with Post Office officials, three-fourths of whom will at once be nominated for this work by the Postmaster-General.

"We cannot too strongly emphasise the fact that Great Britain is now fighting for her life, and that it is the duty of all her sons, without distinction of class or position, to devote every energy towards bringing the war to an early and successful termination.

"It should be added that it is the intention of her Majesty's Government, at the conclusion of hostilities, to recommend that the pay of all ranks of mobilised troops shall be continued for three months, to enable the officers and men to resume their positions in civil life with the least possible disruption or personal loss.

Signed { Salisbury. / Albert Edward. / Wolseley."

"There," said the Commander-in-Chief, as he laid down the pen, "that proclamation means conscription."

"No," exclaimed Lord Salisbury. "Conscription is compulsion. This is the call to arms of a free people. It is another prayer to the Almighty to set back the sun until we have conquered the enemies of human progress."

"Whatever it may be termed, I get the men," replied Lord Wolseley, "and I feel certain that we can beat the allies on their own ground."

"Who leads the expeditions?" inquired Lord Salisbury.

"Lord Roberts commands the attack on France, and Sir Charles Dilke has asked to be appointed on the staff. His aid will be extremely valuable, as no other Englishman knows more about French affairs or is so well versed in the composition of the French army. Sir Evelyn Wood is intrusted with the control of operations against Germany."

"Have you formed any definite plan?" asked the Prince.

"Yes, sir, I am acting largely upon the lines laid down by the small committee which sat during the winter after we had received the news of a threatened hostile combination last November. We then thoroughly overhauled the schemes prepared by the Intelligence Department and the chief modification in the method of pending operations has reference to Germany. We abandoned the project of an attack by way of Belgium."

"Why?" inquired Sir William Harcourt. "It has always seemed to me that Belgium would be an excellent base for an advance against either country."

"True, but in such a gigantic business as this we must look somewhat to moral effect, and I believe it is possible for our troops to be simultaneously at the gates of Paris and Berlin."

"When do we move?" said the Premier.

"I hope to receive intelligence of the occupation of Havre on Saturday morning," was the quietly confident reply of the Commander-in-Chief.

"Havre!" cried several voices together, whilst the members of the Council exchanged looks of astonishment.

"Yes, Havre," exclaimed Lord Wolseley, speaking with unwonted energy. "The Seine is our road to Paris, and Havre is the first fortification in the way. I regard this as our least difficult task," he added, "and I am glad to be able to say that Lord Roberts fully concurs with me."

"Are you satisfied with the Admiralty arrangements for transport?" inquired Mr. Goschen.

"Perfectly. I wish I had the men to fill the ships your department has placed at my disposal. By the way," continued the Commander-in-Chief, who appeared to be anxious to escape further questioning, "what progress does your Royal Highness's inventor make?"

"Excellent," said the Prince of Wales. "He is a wonderful fellow. His men turn out 2,000 articles each day; I have actually made three myself, and am becoming quite an electrical expert. I am thinking of preparing a paper for the United Service Institution on the true inwardness of an ohm."

The Prince's eagerness roused the curiosity of the other members of the committee. They asked him to describe the invention, concerning which very contradictory rumours were afloat, and their request was acceded to. Very clearly did his Royal Highness set forth the principle of the electrical apparatus in which he was so interested.

In the drawing-room of a house in Mayfair two girls were smiling through their tears whilst reading for the fiftieth time a pencilled note which had just reached them from Plymouth by the kindness of the captain of the Peninsular.

"I am quite sure that Frank is safe, dear," said Irene Vyne as she sank on her knees by the side of Ethel Harington. They were laughing and crying together over Rodney's letter from Malta.

"I am hopeful myself," replied her companion, "but I don't see how we can do more than hope. It was such a terribly dangerous undertaking."

"Oh, of course. I know that. But naval officers are accustomed to explosions. Boilers and guns and things are always bursting. Besides, he is so full of resource. You remember how rapidly he disposed of that Frenchman who was in our service at the Embassy. Father afterwards discovered that he was a most skilful spy in the employ of the French Police, and that he had found out the secret of the Foreign Office cypher. Only yesterday I ascertained how it was I had such a curious notion of having seen him before."

"How was that?"

"Lady Grasmere called, and then I remembered where I had met him. It was at a musicale she gave last November in town, and the wretched creature was masquerading as a Russian tenor. He sang divinely, too. What a pity he should be only a mouchard."

Lady Irene Vyne would have been even more surprised and disgusted had she seen M. Pochowski, ex-singer, ex-valet, at that moment, sitting on a magnificent horse at the head of a squadron of the Imperial Guard, drawn up for inspection by the Tsar of all the Russias.

Captain Harington entered the room, hot, excited, and too full of his news to properly hook up his sword, which slipped and clanked against his spurs as he strode towards them.

"Give me a cup of tea, girls," he cried. "I'm choked with dust and news. Rodney has blown up the Suez Canal and I have been appointed to Roberts's staff. We'll be in France before the week is out."

Digitized by Google

Ethel looked at Irene to see how she would receive this momentous intelligence, but the girl's face only flushed a little, and her hand did not tremble as she brought the tea to her lover.

"I wish I were a man that I might also go," she said, "Anyhow, I will never forgive you if you don't send more lucid epistles than Frank has favoured your sister with." And she showed him the now almost illegible letter.

"Hello!" he said. "Poor old chap! He wept so copiously over the note that his tears haven't dried yet."

Ethel snatched the paper from him, and Irene coolly ignored his remark.

"How many men go with you?" she inquired.

"We start with 150,000. Once a landing is effected, 200,000 more follow. Then we make a forward movement. The advance will be along the line of the Seine. How jolly glad I am that I did the trip from Paris to Havre last summer in a canoe."

"Will such an army be strong enough to act effectively?" said Irene, who, it must be remembered, was an ambassador's daughter, and knew exactly the numbers and efficiency of the French forces.

"To conquer France we will need ten times as many," replied Harington, rising to depart. "But Lord Roberts thinks that the allies are hardly prepared for such a bold counter-move on our part. You must not forget that they lost the pick of the army of the north in the fight off Worthing, and our expedition, once it gains a footing, will be quite able to deal with the remainder of that Corps d'Armée at the outset. Of course, they will try to smother us afterwards, but they may not succeed. Pobs will work off a few tricks on them that he learnt in Afghanistan."

"This will be a war of men, not of tactics," exclaimed Irene.

"Perhaps both," cried Ethel Harington. "Frank, I am sure, will fight well, but it was by cleverness that he was able to destroy the Canal." She was so desperately in earnest that the others laughed.

"Teddy Harington," said Irene, amusement struggling with emotion in her tremulous tones, "your sister will blow up that wretched streak of water ten times every day for the next month. If you don't go and do something big I will jilt you and marry Mr. Briggs, who actually left cards on us the day after we all came back from Paris."

* * * * *

And Briggs. William Briggs, of Catford—where was that cycling expert during these troublous times?

He was the hero of the Cat and Anchor, the lion of the cycling club, the darling of every new woman in that town on wheels.

But his soul had been fired by the events of that memorable night in the Gare du Nord and the Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré. The placid joys of puncture-proof tyres and lever chains fascinated him no longer. Lord Eskdale's words rang in his ears. "You have indeed done your country a good turn," said the ambassador, and the phrase haunted him. Could he not do England another—a million—billions of good turns—thought Mr. Briggs, by organising a corps of Catford cyclists, and offering their services to the expedition?

A list opened in the Cat and Anchor soon had fifty names. In the club it was quadrupled. Armed with this document he sought out Lord Eskdale, who brought this offer to the notice of Sir Redvers Buller, and ere many days were past his eyes danced in his head as they read the following extract from the Gazette: "To be Captain in the Auxiliary Army, William Briggs, cycle manufacturer, Catford, commanding the Catford Cycle Corps."

CHAPTER XII.

The Capture of Havre.

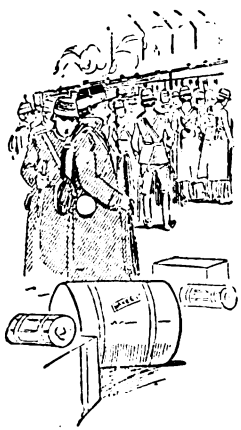
"Combien?"

"Il y a onze cuirassés, cinq croiseurs, vingt-trois canonnières et—tonnerre de Dieu—plus de cent bâtiments de transport——"

"Yes, yes," interrupted General de Rosny impatiently, turning to the naval officer who was supplying him with this information. "How many men? They cannot land their ships."

Lieutenant Lelièvre shut his glass with a snap, and an angry light came into his eyes as he fiercely inquired if Monsieur le Général intended to convey any slight to the French navy by his remark.

For a moment the soldier felt inclined to strike to the ground the irritable fool who chose such a moment for the nice consideration of phrases, but he mastered the impulse and explained that nothing was further from his thoughts.



Train after train started for Havre.

Whereupon the mollified lieutenant informed him that by packing men on board ship to the utmost capacity, the English pigs could not stow away more than 150,000 troops on the armament, then some eight miles out at sea off the Cap de la Hève, and de Rosny forthwith rode off to the Fort de Frileuse where his staff were assembled.

Telegrams were promptly dispatched to the Second and Third Corps d'Armée at Amiens and Rouen. In both towns everything was in readiness, and train after train started for Havre conveying some 200,000 troops to the locality. Some 50,000 men were quartered in the barracks and fortifications of the town itself, whilst the others were split up into two army corps, the first resting on Montivilliers and the second on Harfleur, both towns being within an hour's march from the outskirts of Havre, and connected therewith by two lines of rails.

Havre stands on the north side of the estuary of the Seine and is very strongly fortified. The western, or sea face of the town, is protected by the powerful fort of Ste. Adresse and a redoubt near the Jetée du Nord. The harbour and docks are guarded by the Citadel, Bastion de la Floride, and Fort de l'Heure, whilst the Fort de Tourneville and Fort de Frileuse, not to mention swarms of small redoubts and earthworks, provide serious obstacles in the way of a land attack.

But Lord Roberts, who was standing on the quarter-deck of the Majestic, to which fine vessel the Admiral of the Fleet, Lord Charles Beresford, had transferred his flag since the disablement of the Magnificent, had discussed every item of his programme in the office of the Commander-in-Chief before his departure, and was now engaged in giving his final instructions to generals of divisions and brigadiers. For the present the information was not to be imparted to any other members of the expedition, but prior to actual operations every officer and private were to be made clearly cognisant of their individual posts in the collective programme.

It was Thursday afternoon, the day following the fight at Gibraltar, of which no tidings had yet been received by either party.

In his latest general order to the troops, Lord Roberts, whose official title was "Field-Marshal Commander-in-Chief of the French Expedition," exhorted all ranks to remember that the safety of England lay in their hands.

"I ask you," he said, "to combine rigid obedience with unalterable resolution. To you is intrusted the honourable duty of taking the first forward step on behalf of your country, and I would remind you that this will not be the first time British soldiers have occupied Havre. Your forefathers stormed the town nearly three hundred and fifty years ago, and I am firm in the belief that the flag unfurled by those glorious progenitors will again be seen dominating the heights which command the entrance to the Seine—the road to Paris."

Six of the eleven ironclads, the Majestic leading, entered the ten-metre channel and steamed slowly onwards until within two miles' distance from the Fort de l'Heure. The other warships at considerable intervals formed a cordon round the flotilla of transports and Cunard and White Star liners which had conveyed the troops from Southampton, and were now anchored in the roads out of range of practical gun fire.

A wild yell of delight.

The three French coast defence vessels, and a number of torpedo boats, were seemingly under orders to remain for the present behind the guns which protected the Avant Port, and in the Bassin de l'Eure and Bassin Bellot could be seen the masts of a great company of cargo steamers, evidently freighted with war material for the subsidiary move on England if the first attack had succeeded.

A tricolour floated proudly over the Bastion de la Floride, and the gunnery lieutenant of the Majestic asked permission to direct the first shot fired in the engagement—a shell from a twelve inch gun—towards that locality.

Never was gun laid more carefully. The excellent chart of the harbour in the officer's possession enabled him to accurately verify the distance calculation, three gunners declared the training perfect, and with a thunderous roar the first avenging missile sped over the waters and hurled a cloud of dust and masses of masonry over the railway line that runs along the rear of the fortifications.

But it did more. It demolished the flagstaff and its supports, and a wild yell of delight rose from the British fleet as officers and men noted the fall of the French flag at the very outset of the engagement.

A stiff artillery duel now broke out between forts and ships, and the latter, by constantly changing their positions, were able to disconcert the aim of the gunners on land. Consequently they suffered little harm, whilst they were able to do considerable damage to the battery near the jetty and the Fort de l'Heure.

The Salamander, torpedo gunboat, early distinguished herself. Commander Eagles was ordered to make a reconnaissance up the estuary, and he actually steamed to within firing distance of Tancarville, nearly ten miles up the Channel. The Eclair and Vite se darted out of the Avant Port to cut her off, but were promptly sunk by the quick-firing guns of the Majestic, which had drawn closer in shore in anticipation of some such move, and this experience by the enemy made easy the progress of the audacious Salamander.

Lieutenant Eagles, on his return, reported the massing of French troops at Harfleur, Confreville, and Videmare, information which precisely bore out the views held by Lord Roberts.

The night was clear and starlit. The moon, in her first quarter, struggled to aid the brightness that rendered objects discernible at a considerable distance, and even through the smoke and confusion of the bombardment it could easily be seen that the enemy expected an immediate attack.

But the men on board the transports were ordered to sleep, and, after much wonderment and growling at the unexpected inactivity forced upon them, tired nature soon rendered them oblivious of the thunderous cannonade which continued throughout the night.

As day broke over the coast line several of the remaining ironclads and cruisers, together with a dozen gunboats, joined the fighting line, and vigorously shelled the immense bodies of troops which had been drawn up during the night to repel the threatened invasion. Such whole sale carnage resulted that the French commander speedily withdrew his men behind the shelter of the forts, and the latter, disregarding the heavy fire of the ironclads, did such destruction among the smaller vessels—one British cruiser and two gunboats being sent to the bottom—that the game might so far have been considered drawn.

But the forts themselves were in a sorry plight, and Lord Roberts' face wore a much more pleased expression than was warranted by the situation in the opinion of his men, stewed up as they were in the most uncomfortable fashion.

The day wore away without the slightest sign of definite movement, and beyond the knot of divisional and brigade commanders who knew the Commander-in-Chief's intentions, hardly an officer or private in the army but considered that a golden opportunity had been lost on the previous night, whilst every lapsing hour gave the enemy more time to consolidate his position.

This view prevailed amongst the Frenchmen also, and perhaps the only man on shore who mistrusted the seeming hesitancy of the British was General de Rosny.

Delay in itself was irksome. It was now fraught with foreboding.

The physical and nervous strain upon his troops was not wholly to his taste, but good and careful soldier as he was he spent the time in supervising every detail of the defence from any possible point of attack, which, he was sure, would take place that night.

About seven o'clock in the evening, signals from the flagship to the troopships caused a flutter of expectation on all hands, to be followed by a feeling of profound astonishment as the flotilla, accompanied by a strong guard of ironclads and cruisers, bore off in stately procession towards the north-west, as though bound for Cherbourg.

"It is an infamous ruse—this bombardment—to draw our troops here and lay open some other locality," cried a French major of dragoons, as the strange manœuvre became known on shore.

"Where are we a-goin', Jack?" said a Tommy in the Grenadiers to a sailor who passed him on the lower deck of the Teutonic.

"We're a-headin' for Newfoundland, just now, an' it's five days of the best," was the answer.

"Of all the bloomin' chucks I've ever seen, this is the wust," roared Tommy, and the Grenadier Guards have never been nearer mutiny than they were when the rumour went round that the expected landing was not to be made.

"Where are we a-going, Jack?"

So serious was the growl that it reached the ears of the commanding officer. He sent for the sergeant-major.

"Tell them," he said, "to eat a solid supper and smoke till they're black in the face, as they will have as good a fight before morning as the regiment has ever seen."

Then joy prevailed, and the fumes of nail-rod mingled in the breeze with the strains of "Annie Laurie."

General de Rosny was absolutely puzzled. He telegraphed to Paris, Cherbourg, Brest, and Le Mans, the headquarters of the fourth Army Corps, whilst General Mercier, at the last named place, spoilt the dinner of the officers of the 104th Infantry by an imperative message to entrain forthwith. General Saussier, the governor of Paris, did not please de Rosny by ordering an immediate preparation for assistance to be given in the West. Altogether, Havre had more than the usual mauvais quart d'heure that evening.

But the bombardment proceeded as furiously as ever.

Lord Charles Beresford and Lord Roberts, with their respective staffs, were on the Rattlesnake gun-boat, with the flotilla.

As darkness came on, the fleet now being well out at sea, a wheel to the right was ordered by a single rocket. The fresh course lay due east, and after an hour's steady steaming several rockets were sent flying into the sky.

At last, far ahead, came an answering signal, and the Rattlesnake darted to the front to slow down presently by the side of another huge flotilla of tugs, towing an immense number of flat-bottomed boats, whilst six of the tugs had in charge an immense object which looked like a gigantic pile of logs.

It was a floating pier, of which the sections had been joined together in Portsmouth Dockyard, and so fashioned at one end as to be capable of being driven a long way on to a sloping beach before it came to a standstill against the shore. Adorned with a great array of steam cranes, two lines of rails, a couple of small steam-engines and other equipments, it looked a quaint monster floating quietly on the waves.

An altered disposition having been made in the order of the fleet, the course lay S.E. by S., and by ten o'clock the light on the Cap de la Hève was seen on the starboard bow.

Lord Roberts was evidently about to land his forces on the coast at a point opposite the small village of Blèville, and attack Havre from the land.

At midnight precisely the 1st and 2nd Battalions of the Grenadier Guards, commanded by Lieutenant-General Massy, Captain Harington being his Brigade-Major, pushed off from the side of the Teutonic, not a light being visible in the entire fleet, and pulled silently towards the beach.

The noise of the guns at Havre rose high above the placid beat of the surf on the shingle, as the General sprang ashore, followed by Harington.

Without command or confusion the men at once spread themselves out over the lonely expanse of sand and pebbles, behind which rose the gloomy outlines of the neighbouring cliffs, and in a marvellously short space of time the whole of the 1,800 troops were lost to sight and sound, leaving the General and his youthful companion standing near the empty boats to await the arrival of the next contingent.

This was made up of the 2nd Battalion of the Black Watch; the 1st Brigade of the Oxfordshire Light Infantry, the 2nd East Lancashire, and the Aldershot Company of the Royal Engineers.

The three regiments, guided by Harington, and without the slightest attempt at formation, crossed the belt of shingle as quickly as possible, and soon struck a tolerably good road leading through a narrow valley to the table-land behind the cliffs.

On the way, a corporal's guard in charge of a gendarme showed clearly enough what the duty of the Grenadiers was, to which they had set themselves so quickly. They had spread like a fan over a very considerable range of country, had cut the telegraph wires along the cliffs, and had captured several coastguards and other persons who might have taken prompt steps to give an alarm to the expectant French troops five miles away.

It should here be mentioned also that telegraphic communication all over the district was greatly impeded by the fact that late on the previous evening a couple of gunboats gave special attention to the roof of the Bourse at Havre, on which hundreds of wires centred, and speedily demolished the top of that handsome edifice, although during the whole of the preceding bombardment scrupulous care was taken to fire only at forts, barracks, or troops.

It was a cheering sight to see the manner in which the sappers tackled the work of fixing the floating pier when this lumbering monster slowly bulged through the darkness and grounded one end upon the shingle, the tide being then on the ebb about two hours.

General de Rosny galloped off.

The shoreward section was hauled up by hundreds of willing arms until it was humanly impossible to bring it further; the next section was dragged up to join it, and both were then firmly stayed to prevent slipping. Smaller and more manageable pieces were drawn on shore from special lighters, and placed in position in front, and by this means a firm track was laid right up to the spot where the road led from the cliffs.

All this was accomplished in less than an hour, and meanwhile a very large number of men and horses had been landed, some 3,000 cavalry and 20,000 infantry being drawn up on the plateau a mile inland.

Attempts at concealment were now abandoned, and the electric search lights from the fleet showed every inch of the pier, the gradient of which was not so extreme as might be expected, as every artifice in construction had been used to counteract the rapid shelving of the beach.

The motive was soon apparent.

Two heavily-laden vessels came alongside, and gun after gun was hoisted from their holds, swung on to low trucks on the pier, and then hauled by the engines along the double lines of rails until the shoreward end of the pier had been reached. Here the artillery horses and gunners were waiting for them to limber up and trot off rapidly to their allotted station with the main body.

The wheels of both engines and trucks were provided with specially deep flanges, and as the gauge was a broad one, it was almost impossible for any derailment to take place.

The work went on uninterruptedly and without hitch. It was a triumph of organisation and forethought. Nothing had been forgotten, nothing miscalculated, and the senior officers in charge of the embarkation were familiar with every inch of the ground, as they had all visited the place during the winter and early spring.

By four o'clock some terrified peasants had reached the Fort de Tourneville and announced the landing of the British troops.

A telephonic message was sent to Fort de Frileuse, and General de Rosny galloped off at the head of his wearied staff to personally investigate the cause of the rumour.

He narrowly escaped falling into the hands of a scouting detachment of the 17th Lancers, and three of his aides lost their lives in stemming the rush made by the Death or Glory boys when they caught sight of the French officers.

De Rosny's frame of mind was not of an enviable cast as he raced back to Havre. He cursed himself and General Saussier and General Mercier and his cavalry vedettes with impartiality.

By the time he reached his outposts he had regained his normal senses, and promptly set about the necessary dispositions to meet the new order of things.

His men were weary after thirty-six hours of sleepless watchfulness, but the splendid spirit of the French soldier returned at the thought that at last there was something to do beyond waiting idly under an incessant artillery fire.

Marching by parallel roads to Blèville and Sanvic Graville, over 100,000 troops were soon in motion, and as the first flush of early dawn suffused the horizon with pink and gold, the British cavalry outposts retired to acquaint Lord Roberts with the tidings of the advance.

The Commander-in-Chief had now 80,000 men massed on the undulating downs at the back of the cliffs, and nearly 200 guns, supported by 7,000 cavalry, were in position.

The left wing of the British Army was the first to move. A deep ravine ran far into the land between the British position and Ste. Adresse, and it was Lord Roberts' intention to force the enemy into this difficult ground, which could be swept by the guns for a distance of nearly three miles.

The rapidity and dash of the French advance rather favoured this project. As the growing light spread over the landscape, and the masses of troops became more distinctly visible, shrapnel began to whistle through the air, whilst the ping of the tiny bullets from the Lee-Metfords, and the Lebel rifle sent a wild rush of tumultuous emotion through the hearts of those who heard the sound for the first time in actual warfare.

So far as could be subsequently ascertained, a private of the East Lancashire Regiment was the first man to give his life for his country. Ere long the casualities became more frequent, and soon a line of ambulance waggons were hastily carrying wounded to the shore, whence they were ferried to the ships.

Britain was beginning to suffer.

A Woman's Vengeance.

Ti-Rhada was only a little Nepaulese tea-gatherer. small and strong and brown, with two great braids of jet black hair coiled about her head.

Despite her dark skin she was very pretty, as Nepaulese girls go, not the least of her marks of beauty being her large brilliant eyes. But she did not know that she possessed charms uncommon to her race, for her mother and sisters were always too weary of tea-gathering to think of beauty, and Nepaulese men are not given to complimenting women.

In the tea-fields of Darjeeling, in the very heart of the Himalayas, she was toiling among the fragrant plants where for centuries her ancestors had toiled before her.

She has been there throughout every day of the tea season every one of the fifteen years of her eventless life, and the thought had never entered her head that she would ever be anywhere else, nor that there was "anywhere else," for that matter.

But this day in particular a party of tourists were wandering about Darjeeling, and they at length came into the plantation, where one of them, a young Englishman named Mainwaring, spied her out.

"Good-looking young nigger, that." he said, jerking his thumb in the direction of Ti-Rhada.

"Perhaps," remarked his companion; "but beauty in women is always a relative quality. They are or are not good-looking, according to your taste and condition of susceptibility. The divine Blanche, now, might not agree with you."

"The divine Blanche, fortunately, is three thousand miles away, so I don't see what she has to do with it."

"Try not to be impatient, Mainwaring, but the eyes of five and-forty do not see all things as do the orbs of five-and-twenty, and——"

"And what?"

"Nothing, perhaps, and perhaps a great deal. But the others are hurrying on towards supper, and we must not detain them. Come on."

The sightseers passed out of the plantation without being seen by Ti-Rhada.

Mainwaring came back to the tea-fields for another look at the "young nigger," the following morning; and he came alone. Ti-Rhada was a bit startled at finding him suddenly close beside her, with that in his gaze which she had never seen in man's eyes before.

Not wishing to alarm her Mainwaring turned away.

His friend, Colonel Fritch, was on the hotel portico when he came in.

"Been hunting up more niggers?" he inquired.

Mainwaring bowed stiffly, and entered the hotel without answering. He was not only annoyed, but indignant. Fritch was an ass. He was dignifying the the merest nothing in the world. Whom could it harm if he had gone back for a second glance at the little Nepaulese? What was she or any other Hindoo woman to him? They were interesting to look at, and he should continue looking at them all he pleased, and if Fritch had anything more to say about it, he would cut the Fritch party, stay at Darjeeling as long as he pleased, and go away when he got ready.

The next morning he made a third trip to the fields. This time, after persistent exertions, he managed to engage Ti-Rhada in conversation. That is, he prevailed upon her to listen to his questions and remarks, and to make little monosyllabic answers. This was not very edifying, and had the girl been less pretty, Mainwaring would have voted it all a bore; but it was very pleasant to see her red lips shape themselves into varying word frames, and there was a suggestion of music about the words themselves.

Mainwaring's pilgrimages to the plantation were numerous, but not another word did Fritch say about Ti-Rhada.

"I thought you people were only going to stay here a week," said Mainwaring to Fritch one afternoon, when Ti-Rhada had been particularly interesting, and her white admirer in consequence was particularly amiable.

"We find Darjeeling very pleasant and refreshing," was Fritch's reply, "and so none of us are in a hurry to get away; but if your young blood is gathering impatience for an immediate hegira, I'll call the clan together, and we will hie us hence."

"Oh, I'm in no hurry about going—or, that is, it doesn't concern me in the least whether we go or stay. But it occurred to me that your original plan was being varied."

The next day Mainwaring suspected that Ti-Rhada was glad to see him, and by the third day hereafter he was sure of it. He was pleased mightily. Surely he must have some strength of character when both heathen and civilised women were attracted by him!

In a little time a change came over Ti-Rhada. She not only listened and assented when Mainwaring talked, but talked herself, and for an uneducated little heathen she talked well.

Digitized by Google

Mainwaring was more than ever fascinated, but somehow he felt constrained to delay demonstrances of affection. Down in the dark depths of Ti-Rhada's eyes there was that which showed that love, to her, would be no light thing.

Three weeks from the day he first saw her, by which time it was her wont to greet him with a beaming smile, she met him almost sullenly one morning.

After a dint of much coaxing he wormed out of her that her dearest friend, a girl of about her own age, had lost her lover. Still worse, in absconding he had taken her future with him, for she was now an object of contempt and derision to her entire tribe.

"What will she do now?" asked Mainwaring, endeavouring to muffle the stab the disclosure was of his own purposes.

"Kill herself," said Ti-Rhada stolidly. "What else is left for her to do?"

"Why, in my country she would kill her lover."

"Yes? It is unlike India, then. I should like to live in your country."

"I'm glad you don't live there," responded Mainwaring quickly. "I—I should be afraid of you."

Silence seemed a morsel so much sweeter than speech to the girl's palate that morning, that Mainwaring soon became uncomfortable, and went away. After much ruminating, he decided to leave the hotel the next day, return to Calcutta, and thence home to England. But the following morning, when he went for a farewell glimpse of her, Ti-Rhada smiled her sweetest, and was so much more gracious than ever, that he lost his head entirely.

The weeks that followed were full of blind unreasoning joy. Not a thought did they give either to the past or to the future. The present was all sufficient.

When the autumn came, and the tea fields were no longer filled with brown-skinned folk, and there was a sharp chill in the hill air, Mainwaring got a letter from his parents. The intelligence which it conveyed filled him with dismay.

He was commanded to start for home at once, so he would be there by Christmas-time, and he was notified that he would be expected to marry his fiancée immediately upon his arrival. He was threatened with disinheritance if he ventured to deviate from this course in the slightest degree.

No mention was made in the letter of either Ti-Rhada or Fritch, but that the latter had told the Mainwarings everything in his ken about the little Nepaulese it was plainly to be seen.

Mainwaring was furious. The washed-out blonde splendours of Blanche no longer attracted him. Ti-Rhada was the only woman in the world for whom he cared. But—he must have money. Ti-Rhada and poverty was a combination which failed to conjure him with lasting spells. If he could have money in the degree of abundance essential to his tastes only by leading Blanche to the altar, why, to the altar Blanche should be led.

But he would not give up Ti-Rhada!

As tactfully as he could he told the girl his position, dilating emphatically upon the hopeless helplessness poverty would plunge them both into. There was but one thing to do, he assured her, he must go home, marry Blanch, tolerate her for a a few weeks till he could get his money affairs in good condition, then fly back to Darjeeling and his heart's darling once more.

Would Ti-Rhada trust him so much?

Long and steadily she looked into his eyes, till she seemed to have searched out his every secret hope and fear.

"Yes, I will trust you," she finally said. "You may go and—and do as you say. You love me. You will come back to me."

With every oath of constancy a frenzied lover can think of, he swore to keep faith with her. Cold and passionless with the pain of it all as the bronze she looked like, was Ti-Rhada the day after he left her; and when the train had borne him away she sank into a little pulseless heap, and neither moved nor spoke for hours. March was to have found him back in the Himalayas again, but he did not come. Nor did April bring him, nor May.

Once among people of his own kind, little by little he began wondering if he had not made a mistake in falling in love with the coarse little Nepaulese tea gatherer. At the end of two months he was certain of it.

He had been a fool.

Of course he would not go back. The girl would soon forget him for some more conveniently adjacent lover. It was the fashion of her race. Perhaps she had forgotten him already. It was silly of him to have felt conscience-stricken after all.

"Do you know, dear, that I am really beginning to doubt the justice of my first impressions, and believe that you truly do love me?" said his wife, several weeks after their marriage. "I should be the happiest of women, for I have married the rarest of treasures, a modest man—almost a shy man."

In June they went over on the Continent to a little fishing village on the coast of Normandy. This spot was now very dear to them, for it was the scene of their first meeting.

One afternoon, when the sun made the air almost sultry, Blanche drowsed off and fell asleep in her hammock, her husband sitting beside her.

He soon wearied of smoking, found reading a bore, and settled himself back in his chair for a nap.

When he was nearly asleep there came a pressure of a cold hand upon his brow. Awakening with a start, he found himself face to face with Ti-Rhada. She moved silently down the lawn, beckoning him to follow.

Terrified beyond power of resistance, he obeyed.

In the middle of a little clump of trees she stopped and faced him, fixing her great dark eyes upon his with long and searching scrutiny, the same as she had done the day he left her.

After a time a shaking sob, like a mortal convulsion was wrenched from her bosom, and the rich bronze darkness forsook her skin, and left it grey and ashen.

"I see—I understand," she said quietly. "You are all hers. Nothing within you is any more mine, nor his neither."

"His?"

"I speak of the little dead babe, lying alone under the tea-plants in the Darjeeling fields."

Mainwaring groaned, but could not move. Nor could he even raise a defensive arm, though he saw what her clenched hand held when it flashed upwards into the air before it fell with smiting force upon his bosom.

He felt the sudden sharp pain, saw the crimson answer his life-blood made to her knife, lurched, caught himself and fell backward upon the turf; but not an articulate sound did he utter, not even when he watched her turn from him and glide swiftly, noiselessly towards the sleeping Blanche.

THE CHOICE OF A LOVER.

"Two offers of marriage in one day! Well, which suitor is to receive the happy affirmative, Meta?"

The speaker, a middle-aged woman, regarded the girl before her with evident admiration and affection.

Meta Randall's fair face wore a perplexed expression, and her sweet voice trembled as she replied:

"If I only knew, auntie!"

To one even less versed in the character of the girl than Mrs. Preston, the sincere regret in her tone would have been ample assurance that neither coquetry nor vanity had induced such a reply.

The elder lady observed her curiously for a moment, and then said:

"Since both men are handsome and equally eligible, you should trust entirely to your heart to decide."

"But, auntie dear, my heart speaks as favourably for one as the other. Harry and Phil have been my friends, my cavaliers, from childhood. It would seem unnatural not to love them both. I feel that I could marry either to-morrow and never regret my choice. I am sure I love them equally.

"Was ever a poor girl in such a pitiable condition of uncertainty? Do choose my husband for me!" she entreated, as she dropped upon a cushion at Mrs. Preston's feet.

The aunt gently patted the head upon her lap.

"It's a great responsibility, Meta, to place upon my shoulders. What if, after all, I should choose the wrong one? But I have a plan, at least. How feasible it may prove, you are the one to determine."

As Mrs. Preston unfolded her scheme Meta's drooping head was lifted; then smiles of delight chased each other over her features; and finally, as the elder woman finished speaking, she sprang to her feet, exclaiming joyously:

"Just the thing, you dear, original auntie! Now take this, and this, and this!" And laughing merrily, she kissed her again and again.

"There, my dear, there! Better wait and learn the success of the plan," exclaimed Mrs. Preston. "Those letters must be answered immediately," she added, pointing to the crumpled missives on the floor.

"Certainly," the girl replied, as she picked up the letters. "Oh, it's too funny!" she added, as she ran gaily from the room.

That evening, in response to the invitations she had sent them, Henry Davis and Philip Stanton called upon her. Mr. Davis arrived a few minutes later than Mr. Stanton, and a look of disappointment was plainly apparent upon the face of each at the unexpected presence of the other.

Miss Randall, however, was in the best of spirits, and she talked brightly upon minor topics until a feeling of mutual fellowship was apparently established between the men. Then, with womanly tact, she gravely introduced the subject which concerned them all.

"Harry—Phil," she began, "I have invited you here, not, indeed, to answer the question which both of you honoured me by asking, but to make a proposition to you. You will think me an odd girl, perhaps, but at least you cannot reproach me for either coquetry or dishonesty when I tell you that my answer holds a condition. First I want to ask you one question: Have I ever, by word, or look, or action, signified to either that he was a favourite in my regard? In all the years of our friendship, have I ever manifested any affection for one that I have not as freely accorded to the other?"

The flush which gradually suffused her face displayed the excitement her candour had provoked, and she drew a deep breath of relief as both men simultaneously answered:

"Never!"

"Thanks. Now listen to my frank admission. As far as I have been able to analyse my feelings I am sure I love you both equally. As I can accept but one, the question must be decided for me—hence the condition. If either or both refuse to accept it I must stipulate that our past harmonious relations be sustained without any future reference to the possibility of marriage with either. And now the condition!"

"The condition!" both men quickly repeated.

"I propose a bicycle race between us three. I am to have the precedence of two minutes in starting. It is to be a three mile race upon the road between this house and old 'Bell Inn,' you know the road. The one who overtakes me before or as we reach the inn, will not only be the winner of he race, but also of a wife. If you overtake me at the same time or I reach the goal first, you will draw lots to see who is the victor."

The faces of the men wore an odd expression, but they promptly exclaimed:

"We agree."

It was a beautiful May morning, and the picturesque road leading to the Bell Inn was an appropriate one for a race which must in any case afford a romantic ending.

It was just ten o'clock when Meta Randall, neatly attired in a cycling suit of light grey, passed out of the house, with a merry laugh and a graceful toss of the head towards Davis and Stanton, at the quick ring of a bell, the signal for starting. Declining the proffered assistance of the competitors she mounted her bicycle and sped quickly down the road.

"What a glorious spin!" thought Meta, as the swift motion sent the exultant blood leaping through every artery, and every fibre of her body thrilled with the exuberant joy of living.

Faster and faster she flew along, until her efforts seemed involuntary. To herself she seemed impalpable and endowed with a freedom as perfect as the breeze which fanned her crimson cheek and tenderly lifted the curls about her face.

So completely did Nature's influence enthrall her that no thought of the ride, its purpose, or the two men who were speeding behind her, entered her mind until a shout informed her of the fact that Davis was rapidly gaining on her.

Then, quicker than a flash of light, came that for which she had previously so longed—the knowledge that one of these men was dearer to her than the other. Pure, tender and sweet, yet full of fear it came, causing a quick gasping for breath and a deepening flush upon the cheeks as she realised that perhaps the knowledge came too late, and that if Harry Davis won the race the happiness of two lives must certainly be wrecked.

With a voiceless prayer more fervent than any she had ever breathed before, she redoubled her own efforts to reach the inn as she heard the gentle whizzing of a wheel behind her.

"Philip, Philip, Philip!" appealingly resounded through her brain like a human voice. In agony she clutched the handle-bars more firmly, bent her body forward as she exerted every muscle to the uttermost and pedaled with the greatest rapidity in her determination to win the goal ahead of Davis. If she succeeded there was one more chance for Stanton to win by drawing lots.

The inn was just in sight. If Davis should win!

"Oh, no! Not that!" she whispered.

She was trembling with excitement; a sudden mist clouded her sight—a rumbling in her ears partially deafened her. A few more yards! Then there was a far off shout, a gentle touch upon her arm, and next——

A sense of dizziness and the recollection of falling from her bicycle came to her as she opened her eyes and saw—not Davis, but Philip Stanton, bending over her with tender solicitude and uttering loving exclamations.

J. G. SHORE.

SAVING A HUSBAND.

"MARION, you must do it!"

"Ernest! How can I?"

"Come, be seated. Let me finish. It is for the happiness of both of you that I come to you with a word of warning."

Her face assumed a look of alarm as her husband's cousin uttered the last words in a grave tone.

"Why, what do you mean? What has happened?"

"Nothing yet, but something may, unless you take my advice."

"Oh, Ernest, tell me what it is. Is it about Dick?"

"Yes, and you. Your baby has been dead a whole year, and still you wear these mourning gowns, and spend a great deal of time in weeping. The dear child is in Heaven; you know he is better off, and you cannot bring him back. You have been so absorbed in your grief that poor Dick has been neglected. A fellow can't stand that sort of thing for long: he must have a bright and cheery place to come to when business is over."

"Dick loves you truly, I have no doubt," he continued. "But you will go nowhere with him, and he needs amusement and companionship, and is seeking it elsewhere. Where is he to-night?"

"At the club. Oh, Ernest, you strike terror to my heart!"

"That's just what I want to—no, hardly that, but I want to arouse you from your grief for the dead, to look to the living. This great danger that threatens may be averted, but you must be brave and sensible, and I will help you."

Marion clasped her hands and waited for the rest.

"You know that Dick has spent much of his time in my office lately, far more than he used to. Can you guess why?"

"There is a lady typewriter—her name is Kate Armstrong, who works for me and the man who shares the suite of rooms with me. I have heard Dick call her 'Birdie.' My dear girl, be calm, don't start so! You need all your——"

"And you allow such things in your office!"

"How can I help it? She does not belong exclusively to me, and the other fellow is out most of the day. And if I say anything to Dick I shall offend him."

"You could get her discharged if you liked."

"What would be gained by that? It would only make matters worse, for he would sympathise with the girl and seek her elsewhere."

"Oh, that I should live to hear such things of Dick!"

She was walking the floor excitedly now, wringing her hands and sobbing.

"Marion, it seems cruel to tell you this, but you must save him."

"What can I do?" she wailed.

"In the first place stop crying, pull yourself together and face the situation. Here is my plan:

"The Arion Society will give a masked fancy dress ball at the Botanic Gardens on Thursday night, and I overheard him trying to persuade her to go with him. She has a little place part of the door, you know."

"What! And this creature that he calls 'Birdie,' is she—pretty?"

"Oh, yes, she is quite pretty. She wasn't sure of going, but told him she would call him up at his office on the telephone to morrow. Now I have learnt that she cannot go, but you must call him up, personate 'Birdie,' and make arrangements to take her place. Then you can find out the whole situation."

"Oh, Ernest, I cannot go to a masked ball! It seems too hear less after baby's death!"

"Marion, you can, and you must. Bury your grief show him that you can be as charming as you were three years ago, when you were married, and make him feel ashamed of having thought of 'Birdie' for a moment. Think how much is at stake, and that it is for the happiness of you both."

She thought of how she loved Dick, and what agony it would be to lose him, and resolutely dried her tears.

"I'll do it, Ernest!"

"Now, that's the right spirit to have! To-morrow at five minutes past one be at my office. I will send her out promptly at one o'clock for her lunch, then you can be free to talk to Dick."

"Yes, send her out, for I should annihilate her by a look!"

Marion Graham, after a night spent in devising ways and means to win Dick back, and keep him when won, followed the advice of her cousin, and was at his office at the appointed time.

As she entered the front door a very pretty girl came out, who she felt sure was Birdie. Instinctively she drew back her skirts, lest their garments should touch.

"Ernest, she's gone, is she?"

"Yes; left a few minutes ago."

"I am sure I saw her as I came in."

"Yes, probably."

Then he called up Dick, and told her what to say.

"Mr. Graham, someone at the instrument for you," said the office boy.

"Botherat on!" exclaimed Dick. "I want to finish this report without interruption. Ask who it is and what he wants."

"It's a lady, sir."

"Oh, all right! Will be there at once."

"Are you there?"

"Hallo, Dick!" came from the other end of the wire.

"Oh, is that you, Birdie?"

"Yes, how are you to-day?"

"First-rate. Can you go to-morrow night?"

"Yes, that's what I want to talk about."

"Well, I say, wait a few minutes, and I'll come round and take you out to lunch, and we'll arrange it all."

"Oh, no, thank you, Dick, I couldn't possibly go to-day, I have to hurry out, just get a little something, and come back and work all the afternoon on an important piece of business."

"Too bad; but you are going to the ball, are you not?"

"Oh, yes! And, I say, Dick, I'll look up a costume, and then write you all particulars, where to meet me, etc. But don't come to the office to-morrow. I shall be very busy in the morning for I want to get off in the afternoon Don't dare to write, either. Good-bye, you'll get my letter in the morning."

"All right—good-bye, dear."

Next morning Dick received a letter at his office—typewritten—explaining all that was necessary for their arrangements. The signature "Birdie," was typewritten.

In the evening he told his wife he was going to the club.

"Don't sit up, Marion, I may be late—going to meet some fellows there, got a big thing on hand. Good-night. Go to bed early, and don't fret."

He kissed her, and as the door closed behind him, she said:

"No, I won't fret, Dick Graham, but if I don't make you ashamed of this night's work, I'm much mistaken."

An hour later a cab stood at the corner of the street, and a woman, cloaked and veiled, entered it. The coachman drove to a fashionable club, and as it stopped, a man ran lightly down the steps and joined the other occupant. Then they drove to the Gardens.

The ball was in full swing, and Marion Graham feasted her eyes upon the brilliant scene, while various emotions filled her soul.

Ah, Marion, you forget you have been out of the field for some time! Domestic duties, ties of motherhood, and the loss of a treasure have all saddened and subdued your spirits. The atmosphere of the home has been dull and heavy with grief. But Ernest was right, she must make an effort to throw it off, and live for the living. Poor Dick, what a hard time he had of it! How different she would be in the future! She would show him that she was more companionable than any Birdie that ever lived!

The music was exhilarating, the costumes gorgeous, and new life thrilled her as she looked at the ever-changing kaleidoscope.

"You are looking simply splendid! That costume is a beauty!" said Dick.

They joined in the whirl of dancers, and her feet responded to the music with much of her former delight.

She threw herself into the spirit of the occasion, and blessed Ernest Taylor for making it possible that it was her waist Dick's arm encircled instead of Birdie's.

He praised her dancing, her figure, her costume, and showed her every attention possible.

She was careful not to talk except during the music, which effectually drowned the tones of her voice, so that he should not discover the deception being practised upon him. During the lulls she allowed him to monopolise the conversation.

At last it was over, and they entered a cab to go home. Here was to be her grand dramatic climax; the unmasking, his surprise, her accusation, his confession, her forgiveness; the exchange of promises to do better in future, and the fall of the curtain on their complete reconciliation.

She began to get nervous, and hardly knew how to begin. The excitement of the ball was over, and fear seized her.

"And has my Birdie had a good time?" he asked tenderly, putting his arm round her.

"Very," came in muffled tones from under the mask.

"I've enjoyed it immensely, and I am so glad you were with me! Let me take off that mask, I haven't seen your face to-night!"

She allowed him to raise it just a little, then leant her head upon his shoulder. He stooped and pressed his lips to hers in one long, lingering kiss.

Oh, if that kiss had been for her instead of Birdie! How well she remembered his fond caresses, and now they were intended for another. How could he so soon forget the old days!

These thoughts filled her as he held her close in a silent embrace.

"Why, what's the matter, Birdie? You are crying!"

Where was the dramatic climax she had planned? She buried her face on his breast, and sobbed like a child.

"Well, dearie, there, there, don't cry any more! It has been hard for you, I know. Is the play over?"

"Dick—I am—Mar—i—on. Don't—you know—me?"

"Why, certainly, dear, I've known you all the time. Now stop crying and I'll make my little confession."

"Why, Dick—what—do you—mean?"

"Just this, darling. I saw that you were killing yourself with grief, and I knew that something must be done. In my dilemma I went to Ernest and explained the situation, and we arranged this little plot. We decided that the best way to rouse you was to create an alarm for my moral safety, and between us we succeeded. Clever trick, eh?"

"But—Birdie?"

"Ha! ha! ha! Why, my dear, she's a myth—a pure creation of our fertile brains. The typist is a man. The girl you saw go out was Ernest's sweetheart. You are the only Birdie I've got."

The last picture in the drama was the only one true to her original plan. She threw her arms about his neck and sobbed for joy. The lost was found!

'Now, dearest, there is one thing more that I must say about our little play, which I think you will always remember: 'It might have been!'"

HIS PRINCESS.

"AND so, dear, you have decided to name the baby Ned! Was Fred quite willing?"

"It was his own suggestion. Please like it, Elizabeth."

"I do like it, little one; I love it; and I love Fred for suggesting it."

As I stood looking at the pretty maternal picture of my sister Barbara adoring her first-born, my heart was full of thankfulness and my eyes wet with tears. "Ah, my little man," I said stooping to kiss the tiny scrap of humanity, "if you are brought up as I think you will be, you will be more proud of your first name than of your last. How you came by it is almost like a story. story."

And then I suddenly thought that perhaps it was a story, so here it is.

"Blessed is the man that hath his quiver full of them," saith the Psalmist, and I think that even had my father been less happy in his family relations, he would have striven to feel "blessed," in order to fulfil the Scriptures. For there were twelve of us, all high-spirited and running over with mischief. I, Elizabeth, was the eldest daughter, and Barbara, who was ten years younger, the most beautiful and the favourite.

Why none of us were jealous of Barbara, I am sure I do not know. Perhaps it was because we all united in spoiling her. She was the only delicate baby my mother ever had, and this naturally caused a difference in the beginning. But had it not been this, some other reason would have presented itself. That old woman was a deep philosopher who said of her unmarried sisters:

"It ain't never that there be no men about—it's the winnin' ways as is wantin' in the gals."

Winning ways were not lacking in Barbara's case, and as child and woman she was most perfectly beautiful in face and form. Some few, who had not fallen under the witchery of her personality, maintained that she was too small, too fairy-like—that the soft golden hair was too fluffy and luxuriant.

Small Barbara might be, but the erect little body was a storage-house for spirit and fire sufficient for a dozen ordinary mortals. Her pretty, imperious ways gained for her the title of "Princess" with father and the boys. My mother disliked the name, thinking it not good for Barbara, and we girls never used it for quite another reason. It was our small and only stand against the absolute monarchy.

But when she was about four years old another subject was added to Barbara's list—one who was to outstrip all others in loyal devotion, and this was Ned—black, savage, untameable Ned.

His mother was a full-blooded African who had been purchased by our uncle, the owner of a sugar plantation in America. He bought her with her baby in her arms, out of pure compassion, he said; for she was as untamed as a savage and evidently untameable—utterly useless to her late master, who was trying to subdue her by methods of which we were spared the recital. But the change of masters came to her too late. Though her spirit was unbroken, it was so bruised and festering as to render her death no surprise when it occurred some months later.

The child, whose name was Ned, was brought up in the quarters with the other negro children. He developed early a wild and lawless spirit, and when he was put into the field to work the overseer complained constantly that he was a leader among the slaves and thoroughly insubordinate. My uncle's attention thus called in his direction, he found Ned a man of twenty-two years, superbly built, and apparently as much of a savage as his mother.

Remembering her history, my uncle determined to make no attempt to break the lad's spirit. He wrote at once to my mother, in England, telling her the story and saying that as he found Ned responded to kindness, he felt sure there was the making of a magnificent servant in him. He ended by begging my mother to accept him and give him the individual attention that his bachelor home could not afford, adding that if the boy proved too much for her he could be returned.

Mother and father talked the matter over, and the end of it was Ned came to our farm in Norfolk. He was almost a giant—quite six feet four, but too perfectly proportioned to show his full height, and lithe and active as a panther.

Mother decided to train him as a butler. He learnt rapidly, and though at first he lifted barrels of flour with ease and trembled under a glass of water, he soon waited with a really stately elegance. The strangeness of the new home and surroundings kept the old lawless spirit in check; but familiarity bred the usual contempt, and in a few weeks Ned was king of the kitchen as absolutely as he had been king of the Virginian plantation.

Possibly this spirit was an inheritance; undoubtedly his appearance bore out the supposition, and perhaps from the same source sprang the wild gusts of rage which seemed to possess him and sweep him along resistlessly. Mother remonstrated gently, then sternly and repeatedly—all in vain.

Pandemonium seemed to have broken loose in the regions below stairs. Early one morning the climax came. An uproar such as never was heard before rose from the kitchen, causing my father's hasty appearance there for the first time in many years. Huddled in one corner were the frightened servants, and in the centre of the room towered Ned, holding the group in subjection. Some trifle had irritated him, and this was the consequence.

Father was beyond measure angry—so angry that Ned's rage paled before his. He told the rather sobered negro that he would stand it no more. Kindness had failed with him, and he should now have the whipping he richly deserved.

"Not to be given by me, however," he added. "The constable shall do it, and I mean to send for him to take you away at once."

So saying, my father left the house in a white heat. But he was unused to interfering in what he considered his wife's department, and was also a man of quick wrath and quicker forgetfulness; so, becoming absorbed in important matters of business, he spent no further thought on Ned or his misconduct.

It was not thus at home. So severe a measure had never before been resorted to, and we were all unhappy. Mother alone, and probably because she knew what manner of man our father was, remained as placid as ever as she sat in the nursery sewing.

But her placidity was to be rudely interrupted. There was a sudden patter of feet in the hall, a scrambling up the stairway, and Susan, the old cook and whilom ruler of the kitchen, rushed into the room.

"Oh, mum, that nigger has gone up into the garret with the meat chopper and master's razor. He's going to kill someone, I'm sure.

Two bright, hard spots of colour rose in my mother's cheeks as she listened, but her manner was unhurried as she quilted her needle into her work and shook off the threads from her dress into the open fire-place. With her usual even pace she walked out of the room and up the stairway, we children with the servants who had gathered in the hall, stringing after her. On she went to the partially-closed garret door. There she paused.

"Ned!"

There was no answer.

Raising her hand, my mother struck the door lightly with her palm, throwing it wide open and disclosing Ned who stood before it. All the savage was up and looking out of the dark, scowling face, the bloodshot eyes, the drawn lips. His body was thrown back, and in one hand, raised above his head, he held the axe. In the other flashed the razor.

The servants crowded behind each other with smothered cries, but mother, with her beautiful, proud head thrown back, stepped over the threshold. She was slightly and delicately made, yet as she stood opposite the huge negro, her figure drawn up to its full height, her cheeks brilliant, her eyes flashing defiance into his, she rose above the question of brawn and muscle, to become his full equal in power, but no more.

The inflexible blue eyes and the passionate black ones looked unflinchingly into each other for what seemed to me an age. And then suddenly my mother's whole figure seemed to relax. The scornful, curling lips half smiled. The blue eyes looked infinitely soft and pitying. She stepped swiftly to Ned's side and laid her gentle hand on his shoulder. "You poor boy," she said softly, "why will you do so?"

Wonder drove possession from the dark face—wonder held Ned spell-bound as my mother took the weapons from his unresisting hands. But when she bade him return to his work he seemed to awake, and darting a furious glance round, he rushed headlong from the room and down the stairs. But then something happened which I cannot think of even now without a darting sense of horror. Half way up the stairs stood little Barbara. Her nurse had deserted her and she was following after.

Spreading out her tiny arms she blocked Ned's way.

"You is got to tarry me down 'tairs," she cried in her sweet treble. "I hurted my foot and I aren't a-doin' to walk."

Ned stopped and hesitated. I sprang forward, but mother, her face as pale as her handkerchief, held my arm in an iron grasp. I turned sick and faint; everything swam before my eyes, and when I could see again it was a strange sight that awaited me. Barbara was sitting high in Ned's arms, singing a little tune to herself and beating time on his woolly head.

He carried her down the stairs, straight to the wood-room, where they spent the rest of the morning. One minute Ned was chopping wood furiously, and the next he was sitting with Barbara on his knee, delighting her heart by strange stories and games. Mother made me peep in occasionally, but would not allow them to be disturbed.

"The child is doing him good," she said.

At last the nursery door opened softly, and Ned entered with Barbara cradled in his arm, sound asleep.

He laid her in the crib, covering her carefully, tenderly, soothing her when she half woke, and then left the room with noiseless step.

The battle was over. Ned had found his master, and that master was a baby.

There was never any real trouble with Ned after this. He now had a motive for good behaviour, and lived in deadly fear of being sent back to America, away from "de fiddle-string of his heart, Miss Princess."

When he felt his old rages coming on, he used simply to depart—where, we never knew. Sometimes he was gone for one day, sometimes for two. My mother wisely forebore asking questions, and when we children did so he would invariably reply gravely: "I was sent for suddint to go to the Islant of Dardanelles fer to wait on my Lord Concarson."

Barbara never had one atom of curiosity, so she never inquired unless we put her up to it, but even then we got no satisfaction. Ned would pick her up and carry her off, saying:

"Yes, honey, Ned's gwine to tell Miss Princess all 'bout it—jes' you come wid me."

But on her return we could never gather that she knew any more than we did. Barbara was so easily distracted and so lacking in any desire for knowledge.

In one respect Ned was very considerate. He never disappeared if guests were expected, and on one occasion he even returned hastily on remembering a dinner party! "Jes' s'pose I had a' gone on dis ememberin' dis here party," I heard him say to Susan "Dere ain't one o' you servants as knows even to set de table, an' when it comes to waitin'—Lord! I jes' run back like a har' soon as I come to think 'bout it. I ain't stop to take breff."

But these departures became less and less frequent as his adoration of Barbara grew stronger.

It was a strange sight to see the two together. Barbara's manner was as if graciously permitting affection, while Ned's was that of actual worship. Her first remark on seeing him was always, "I wants to be tarried;" and Ned knew no higher happiness than holding her curled up in his great arms.

I think she enjoyed the sense of his powerful strength. A great deal of his work was done thus encumbered, but as Ned could set a table better with one hand than anyone else with two he was allowed to do as he chose.

He was Barbara's willing slave, a slave whom no Emancipation Act could liberate, though Ned himself was a great abolitionist and fond of making speeches upon the subject in the kitchen.

Some time after this my father was obliged to settle in America. We sold up our home, and went out to Virginia. We arrived there in the early part of 1865, just before the Civil War.

When the war broke out Barbara was eight years old and was going to school with me. I was to leave at the end of the year. Our city was on the border-line, and constantly full of soldiers; so my mother preferred to send Ned to and from school with us. But one day we were dismissed a few minutes earlier than usual, and I started home alone with my little sister.

When only a square from our door, we met a Union soldier walking towards us. He looked admiringly at Barbara, and then stopped.

"Will you give me a kiss, my pretty bird?" he said.

She shrank to my side, speechless with terror. I do not believe the man meant to frighten her. He was a mild-looking little fellow, and probably had children of his own at home, but he stooped and lifted Barbara high in the air to steal the wished-for kiss. But that kiss he never got; for she was suddenly seized and whisked out of his hands and over his head, to his infinite astonishment. Ned was on the way to meet us and had flown to the rescue.

It was well for the little soldier, and perhaps well for Ned also, that Barbara required all of her faithful servant's soothing and attention. But from that moment Ned's horror of "dem Yanks" knew no bounds, and hatred of them included a hatred of their principals. His speeches in the kitchen veered in doctrine with an alarming suddenness.

He had things his own way, as usual, for the men were afraid of him and the maids admired him. Aunt Tilly, our new negro cook, alone spoke her mind, and I heard her do it from my upstairs window.

"You was a-talkin' de oder side of yer mouf," she said, as she hopped up and down in her vain endeavour to throw a dripping sheet over the high clothes-line in the yard. "You was a-sayin' dere warn't no right in a-holding de slaves."

Ned took the sheet from her with a contemptuous kindness and slung it over the line.

"Dat was before I knowed," he answered coolly, and then, emphasizing his remark by driving down the clothes-pins, he added impressively, "Dat's what niggers was made fer."

The year 1865 was soon to prove that Ned and many others were mistaken. But we children cared little for this or anything else that did not directly concern us, and so the years of childhood slipped away with only enough shadow about them to throw out the sunlight more strongly; and when Barbara's seventeenth birthday came, it was to find us children yet in many ways. Barbara was still the "Princess," but Ned was, if possible, more than ever her captive. The great change was that Barbara was engaged to be married—and engaged to an Englishman who had lately settled among us—a Mr. Fred Damer, who openly favoured the cause of the Northerners; for formality was not possible with one of his sunny nature and kind heart.

Except for her extreme youth, I think we all were satisfied with Barbara's engagement, Ned alone excepted. That Barbara should marry anybody was bad enough, but that she should marry one of "dem Yanks" was intolerable.

He waited on Fred at table with undisguised disgust, muttering and shaking his head behind his back at every opportunity; invariably beginning to wait on him from the right side, and just as Fred adjusted himself to the awkwardness, rushing round to the left. It really amounted to a petty persecution, which kept the children in delighted spasms of laughter and me in misery. My mother could not see from behind her tea-urn what was going on, and father never saw or heard anything. But at last Ned undertook to slap down as a gauntlet each plate and dish before his foe, and his mutterings began to grow audible. One day, on seeing Fred pay some little attention to mother, he spoke too loud for further ignoring.

"I sees yer, I sees yer, 'deed I does. Throwin' cobs at de cow, is yer? Yes, to make de ca'f take notice. Yer don't git dis yer ca'f, ef Ned kin help it—naw, sir."

This was too much. My patience was exhausted and I complained to father.

At the next meal my remonstrance took effect. Just as Ned was indulging in an unusually horrible contortion of his visage, and as my delighted brother John was stuffing all of his handkerchief into his mouth, my father looked up suddenly and bent his white brows on Ned until they met in a straight line over his blue eyes. Thus he continued to gaze at him until the embarrassed negro managed to get himself out of the room. Then, turning to the now sober John, father significantly motioned to the door, through which the scared boy escaped, glad to get off so easily.

My father never used unnecessary words, and as he knew none were needed to meet this occasion, none were said, and at least outward peace reigned until the inevitable first lovers quarrel arose. Then Ned was one broad grin; he seemed to scent danger for the hated intruder, and he hung about Barbara, perfectly happy in the fact that she, as in her childish troubles, seemed to prefer his constant attendance to anything else.

I was never quite able to make out what this quarrel was about, though it lasted several days, but it was not difficult to see that Barbara was behaving like the spoilt baby she was, and that Fred was very patient, more patient than I for him, for at last, finding Barbara alone in the library, I administered the good round scolding that I thought she needed. Unused as she was to any harshness, it did not take long to reduce her to floods of tears, and she was sobbing her heart out apparently, when Fred entered the room.

As I closed the library door behind me two minutes after his entrance, it was with the fixed opinion, which I have seen no reason to alter since, that the male or female who attempts to interfere with even the potentially married is a fool. What conclusion the lovers came to in their prolonged reconciliation, I do not know. When we all met in the drawing-room in the evening Barbara appeared her old bewitching self, supremely happy and contented. What arguments had been used to work the change I never asked, and Barbara never told me. However it may have been, the result was satisfactory.

Fred was a trifle more communicative, but indirectly. Taking me into a corner later in the evening, he gravely inquired if I thought my father would object to his taking Ned out into the yard and wringing his neck.

"If he did not, Barbara would," I replied. "What has poor Ned been doing now?"

"Poor Ned, indeed! He has been abusing me as usual. I was at my innocent devotions this afternoon, worshipping at my shrine in the attitude common to worshippers of every faith and clime, when he attacked me. Elizabeth, being behind the scenes, why did you not intercept the afternoon tea-try brought in by Ned with cat-like steps and handed to Barbara over my devoted head and prostrate form? I had two horrible alternatives: to rise suddenly to my feet, thereby upsetting the tray and all its contents, or to crab out sidewise. I chose the latter, and even as I emerged was offered tea by my tormentor with respectful gravity."

"What did Barbara do?" I asked, laughing heartily.

"Why, Barbara came to my rescue nobly. She reproved Ned scathingly, and with the air of an insulted princess, for putting only one lump of sugar in her tea—I think that was it."

"Reproved Ned! and before you!" I cried. "Then, indeed, she punished him. The jealous hatred he bears you is beyond words. My impression is that he is not going to put up with your presence much longer. I have been for some time expecting a messenger for Ned from Lord Concarson necessitating a voyage to the Island of the 'Dardanelles.'"

"Not he!" cried Fred. "No such luck for poor me!"

I was nearer right than I thought. The next morning brought with it the news that Ned was off again, and with no farewell message except a box of dainty sweets tied to Barbara's door-knob.

We thought a couple of days at most would see Ned in his place again. But no—Barbara had gone over to the enemy; his own eyes had seen incontestable proof of a complete reconciliation. It was not to be borne, and shaking the dust from his feet, Ned departed in earnest.

Perhaps it was for the best. Barbara missed him sadly, and grieved long over his absence, repenting often her hasty words. But as the days went by she grew more and more absorbed in her lover, and I do not think Ned's jealous heart could have borne the sight. And when Barbara's wedding-day came, and our clinging little Princess was taken from us, I thought of Ned and rejoiced in his absence, believing that his undisciplined nature would have suffered a pang ten times sharper than mine.
